LIBRARY
OF THE
UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS

052
N
v.5

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2021 with funding from University of Illinois Urbana-Champaign

https://archive.org/details/nation5190unse

The Nation

VOLUME V.

April 3rd, 1909, to September 25th, 1909.

LONDON: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

052
N
v.5

LONDON:
PRINTED BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, E.C.

The Nation

INDEX.

---

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| A Clerical Coalition ... ... ... ... ... | 411 |
| A Free Press for the Empire ... ... ... | 376 |
| American Democracy, The Holding-up of ... | 632 |
| An American Experiment ... ... ... ... | 907 |
| A Plea of Moderation ... ... ... ... | 481 |
| A Question of Crete ... ... ... ... | 270 |
| A Revolutionary Strike ... ... ... ... | 41 |
| A "Revolution" Indeed ... ... ... ... | 444 |
| A Revolution in Education. By Graham Wallas | 520 |
| Armaments, The Liberal Policy on ... ... | 77 |
| Armaments, The Malady of ... ... ... | 629 |
| Art, The Importance of ... ... ... ... | 770 |
| A Russian Dreyfus Case ... ... ... ... | 269 |
| A Strike of Half-a-Million Men ... ... ... | 702 |
| A Triumph of Character ... ... ... ... | 113 |
| A Warning from the Past ... ... ... ... | 339 |
| A War of Steel and Gold ... ... ... ... | 338 |
| A Word to Adullamites ... ... ... ... | 409 |
| Battle or Demonstration? ... ... ... ... | 112 |
| Birmingham, The Signals from ... ... ... | 904 |
| Budget, The Alternative to the ... ... ... | 186 |
| Budget, The Attack on the ... ... ... ... | 184 |
| Budget, The First Democratic ... ... ... | 148 |
| Budget, The Principles of the ... ... ... | 374 |
| Budget, The Moderation of the ... ... ... | 445 |
| Budget, Some Principles of the ... ... ... | 185 |
| Bye-Elections, A Study of the ... ... ... | 80 |
| Case of the Popham Estate, The ... ... ... | 875 |
| Case of the South African Protectorates, The ... | 595 |
| Character and Bureaucracy... ... ... ... | 874 |
| Character of the Imperial Press, The ... ... | 336 |
| Charge of Westminster Abbey, The ... ... | 304 |
| Confusion of the Critics, The ... ... ... | 700 |
| Colonies and Imperial Defence, The ... ... | 372 |
| Colonies as Units of Imperial Force, The ... | 738 |
| Coming Reality of Politics, The ... ... ... | 446 |
| Common Sense on the Navy ... ... ... | 300 |
| Congo and the Concert, The ... ... ... | 448 |
| Duke's Dilemma, The ... ... ... ... | 737 |
| Duma and the Tsar, The ... ... ... ... | 482 |
| England, The Development of ... ... ... | 804 |
| Equity of the New Licence, The ... ... ... | 233 |
| Egypt, The New Order in ... ... ... ... | 187 |
| Fate of the Censorship, The ... ... ... | 484 |
| Fight for the Balance of Power, The ... ... | 5 |
| Flight of the Opposition, The ... ... ... | 664 |
| Future of Cowper-Templeism, The. By Graham Wallas ... ... ... ... ... ... | 597 |
| German Armaments, The Aim of ... ... ... | 7 |
| Government and the Country, The. By a Radical Member ... ... ... ... ... ... | 877 |
| Greek Pronunciamento, The ... ... ... | 806 |
| Handwriting on the Wall, The ... ... ... | 769 |
| How the Land Scheme of the Budget Works ... | 450 |
| Ideals and Practice ... ... ... ... ... | 40 |
| If it be True! ... ... ... ... ... | 480 |
| Indian Self-Government, The Road to ... ... | 410 |
| Insurance and Unemployment ... ... ... | 301 |
| Is the Budget a Blow to Industry?... ... ... | 265 |
| International Law, The Growth of ... ... | 116 |
| Japan, The Ruthlessness of ... ... ... ... | 701 |
| Junker, The Voice of the ... ... ... ... | 232 |
| Labor Politics, Impossibilities in ... ... ... | 79 |
| Land Taxes in the Budget ... ... ... ... | 149 |
| Land Taxes, The Arguments for the ... ... | 408 |
| Land Taxes, The Precedents for the. I. ... ... | 667 |
| ,, ,, ,, ,, ,, II. ... ... | 703 |
| Land Taxes, The Working of the ... ... ... | 593 |
| Last of the Tyrants, The ... ... ... ... | 151 |
| Liberalism, The Re-Heartening of ... ... ... | 628 |
| License or Censorship? ... ... ... ... | 740 |
| Lord Rosebery, The Interventions of ... ... | 805 |
| Lords, The Issue with the ... ... ... ... | 768 |
| Lowering the Flag ... ... ... ... ... | 736 |
| M. Clemenceau's Fall ... ... ... ... | 594 |
| Meanness of the Reaction, The ... ... ... | 556 |
| Meredith and English Life ... ... ... ... | 264 |
| Mexican Revolution, The Chances of a ... ... | 841 |
| Minority, The Function of a ... ... ... | 668 |
| Mr. Birrell's Irish Land Bill ... ... ... | 807 |
| New Land Taxes, The ... ... ... ... | 337 |
| New Naval Charter, The ... ... ... ... | 42 |
| No Surrender on the Budget ... ... ... | 557 |
| Obligations of Alliance, The... ... ... ... | 560 |
| Origins of Wealth, The ... ... ... ... | 839 |
| Peril in India, The ... ... ... ... ... | 561 |
| Pessimism of England, The ... ... ... ... | 516 |
| Poor Law Reform and the Budget ... ... ... | 905 |
| Poor-Law, The Break-up of the ... ... ... | 266 |
| Privilege of the Commons, The ... ... ... | 592 |
| Protection of Animals, The ... ... ... ... | 518 |
| Railway Amalgamation, The Risks of ... ... | 44 |

186704

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS (continued).

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| "Rattling into Revolution" ... ... ... | 872 |
| Russia's Disloyalty to Persia... ... ... ... | 302 |
| San Graal of Adventure, The ... ... ... | 838 |
| Science, The New Optimism of ... ... ... | 772 |
| Self-Defeat of Violence, The ... ... ... ... | 517 |
| Solitary Confinement.—An Open Letter to the Home Secretary. By John Galsworthy | 158, 194 |
| Some "Experts" on Land Taxes ... ... ... | 558 |
| South African Union, The ... ... ... ... | 236 |
| Spain's Two Wars ... ... ... ... ... | 630 |
| State and its Workers, The ... ... ... ... | 235 |
| Statesmanship, The Bankruptcy of ... ... ... | 4 |
| Tactics of Violence, The ... ... ... ... | 906 |
| Taxation of Capital, The ... ... ... ... | 873 |
| "The Lords and the Land" ... ... ... | 836 |
| Tory Party, The Situation in the. By M.P. ... | 841 |
| Trade Boards and Sweating ... ... ... ... | 8 |
| Tsar's Visit to England, The ... ... ... | 373 |
| Turkish Reaction, The ... ... ... ... | 76 |
| Unearned Increment and Windfalls ... ... | 519 |
| Wail of Wealth, The ... ... ... ... | 267 |
| What is Blackmail? ... ... ... ... ... | 741 |
| Woman's War, The ... ... ... ... ... | 665 |
| Worker-Student, The Future of the ... ... | 45 |
| World's Shortage of Wheat, The ... ... ... | 114 |
| "Writing" of a Protectionist Tariff, The... ... | 303 |
| Young Turkey, The Future of ... ... ... | 150 |

LIFE AND LETTERS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| A Book of Verses ... ... ... ... ... | 11 |
| A Children's Pageant ... ... ... ... | 237 |
| A Double Standard of Moral Currency ... ... | 598 |
| "Alarm of Motherhood, The" ... ... ... | 452 |
| A Late Adventure. By Edward Thomas... ... | 346 |
| America Through European Eyes ... ... ... | 85 |
| A Mouth of Brass ... ... ... ... ... | 486 |
| Art in Crime ... ... ... ... ... | 488 |
| Art of Reading Poetry, The ... ... ... | 155 |
| A Scandal in "The Field" ... ... ... ... | 13 |
| A Sussex Hanger in Spring ... ... ... ... | 156 |
| A Trout Pool in Hampshire. By H. ... ... | 379 |
| A Turf for Manners ... ... ... ... ... | 412 |
| Backbone of England, The ... ... ... ... | 742 |
| Battle of the Faiths, The ... ... ... ... | 83 |
| Bond or Free? ... ... ... ... ... | 810 |
| Business of Marriage, The ... ... ... ... | 844 |
| Butterflies ... ... ... ... ... ... | 454 |
| Calvin. By the Dean of Ripon ... ... ... | 485 |
| Colors of September, The ... ... ... ... | 881 |
| Consolations of Science, The ... ... ... | 305 |
| "Damnable Iteration" ... ... ... ... | 453 |
| Destruction of Dialect, The ... ... ... | 415 |
| Drawn Battles ... ... ... ... ... | 562 |
| Early Masters, The ... ... ... ... ... | 845 |
| Every Idle Word ... ... ... ... ... | 12 |
| Fables of Kruilòv. Translated from the Russian by A. E. Keeton ... ... ... ... ... | 710 |
| "Fired in Anger" ... ... ... ... ... | 843 |
| Flower Gatherer, The. By Edward Thomas ... | 913 |
| Football Industry, The ... ... ... ... | 812 |
| Found at the Zoo ... ... ... ... ... | 523 |
| Fruits of Commerce, The ... ... ... ... | 673 |
| Full-Blown Summer ... ... ... ... | 308 |
| Game of Efficiency, The ... ... ... ... | 153 |
| Gastronomic Year, The ... ... ... ... | 743 |
| History by Pageant ... ... ... ... ... | 637 |
| Home of Catullus, The. By Professor C. H. Herford ... ... ... ... ... ... | 524 |
| How Ah Sin Sang ... ... ... ... ... | 47 |
| Humor of the Underman, The. By Francis Grierson ... ... ... ... ... ... ... | 706 |
| Infinite Sea, The ... ... ... ... ... | 846 |
| In Motley ... ... ... ... ... ... | 911 |
| In Peril of Its Life ... ... ... ... ... | 9 |
| In Retreat ... ... ... ... ... ... | 190 |
| "Jack Cade" ... ... ... ... ... | 741 |
| Johnson Bi-Centenary, The ... ... ... | 809 |
| John Synge's Art ... ... ... ... ... | 563 |
| Judas in Legend and Folk-Lore ... ... ... | 49 |
| Keeping a Book-Shop. By Joseph Clayton ... | 309 |
| Laborer's Listlessness, The ... ... ... ... | 120 |
| La Galera. By Mariano J. Lorente ... ... | 675 |
| Lost Art of Conversation, The ... ... ... | 908 |
| Maid, The ... ... ... ... ... ... | 117 |
| Marble's Language ... ... ... ... ... | 879 |
| Meredith and Adventure ... ... ... ... | 271 |
| Mid-Victorian Church and Chapel, The ... ... | 910 |
| Modern Hen, The ... ... ... ... ... | 240 |
| Moving of the Wheels, The ... ... ... | 50 |
| "Oh, for the Wings!" ... ... ... ... | 634 |
| On Asking the Way ... ... ... ... ... | 744 |
| One Sunrise, The ... ... ... ... ... | 86 |
| On the Decay of England ... ... ... ... | 272 |
| Ouida's Idea of Women ... ... ... ... | 342 |
| Outer Fields, The ... ... ... ... ... | 343 |
| Persian Quakers, The ... ... ... ... | 377 |
| Place of Miracle, The ... ... ... ... | 670 |
| Pockets of Spring ... ... ... ... ... | 416 |
| Poetic Diction in England ... ... ... ... | 191 |
| Poet of Pain, The ... ... ... ... ... | 82 |
| Poetry of the Early Church, The ... ... ... | 414 |
| Power of Pity, The ... ... ... ... ... | 46 |
| Power to Suppress Opinion, The ... ... ... | 522 |
| Poverty of the Cottage, The ... ... ... ... | 672 |
| Psychology and Crime ... ... ... ... ... | 238 |
| Puckeridge, The ... ... ... ... ... | 708 |
| Revolt of the Poet ... ... ... ... ... | 118 |
| Riches of Memory, The ... ... ... ... | 489 |
| Right of Plain Speech, The ... ... ... ... | 633 |
| River, The ... ... ... ... ... ... | 344 |
| Robina and Marriage. By Jerome K. Jerome ... | 192 |
| Rose and the Show, The ... ... ... ... | 564 |

LIFE AND LETTERS (continued).

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Sale of a Soul, The | 154 |
| Salmon Streams and Storage | 776 |
| Secret Race, The. By John Sanderson | 637 |
| Shakespeare and the Miracle Plays. I. | 775 |
| ,, ,, ,, ,, II. | 811 |
| Shaun. By Padraic Colum | 455 |
| Soul of Brittany, The | 273 |
| Speech of the Irish Peasantry, The | 635 |
| Spent Forces | 378 |
| Spirit of Empire, The | 306 |
| Sun, The | 774 |
| Tempter of States, The | 705 |
| Tennyson, 1809—1909 | 671 |
| "The Autocrat" | 773 |
| The Prisoner. By John Galsworthy | 380 |
| The Prophet Without Honor. By Francis Grierson | 14 |
| Thought and Instinct | 341 |
| To the Memory of Thomas Paine | 189 |
| To Vindicate Leigh Hunt. By Henry W. Nevinson | 274 |
| Town and Country Mice | 121 |
| Two Sorts of American | 878 |
| Undergraduate of 1670, The | 912 |
| Vanishing Navies | 599 |
| What He was Like | 707 |
| Whither? | 709 |
| Wild Man, The | 521 |
| Young Cuckoo, The | 600 |

CONTEMPORARIES.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Father George Tyrrell. By the Rev. Alfred Fawkes | 601 |
| Lord Rosebery | 381 |
| The Chancellor of the Exchequer | 157 |
| The Prime Minister | 242 |

ART, MUSIC, AND THE DRAMA.

ART.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| New Art Gallery, The | 124 |
| Pictures at the Royal Academy | 196 |
| Sculpture at the Royal Academy | 312 |

MUSIC.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Pelléas et Mélisande. By E. A. Baughan | 347 |

THE DRAMA.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| A Champion of the Censor. By William Archer | 813 |
| After the Censorship. By William Archer | 778 |
| America for the Americans. By William Archer | 243 |
| A Skit and an Invective. By William Archer | 348 |
| Doll's Houses. By H. W. M. | 52 |

THE DRAMA (continued).

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| "La Foi." By William Archer | 914 |
| Pamphlet Plays. By H. W. M. | 17 |
| Plays, Old-Fashioned and New-Fangled. By William Archer | 384 |
| Plutocratic Paganism. By William Archer | 848 |
| Repertory Theatres and the National Theatre. By William Archer | 277 |
| The Censor's Heroism. By William Archer | 566 |
| The First Fruits of Endowment. By William Archer | 419 |
| The "Harmsworth Brand" Again. By H. W. M. | 195 |
| The Manchester School. By William Archer | 490 |
| The Power of the Yellow Press. By H. W. M. | 122 |
| Two King Lears. By William Archer | 883 |
| Two Problem Plays. By William Archer | 456 |

SCIENCE.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| The Wonders of Radio-Activity | 382 |

PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS.

PAGE

An Academic View of Lord Curzon's Manifesto. By Dr. Hastings Rashdall ... 240, 276, 311

From Eatanswill to Tammany's ... ... ... 16

How the Country Districts Like the Budget. By a Country Candidate ... ... ... ... 526

Life in a Cavalry Regiment ... ... ... ... 882

Organised Labor and Practical Politics. By T. Kirkup ... ... ... ... 87, 160, 418

The Case of the South African Natives. By T. Tengo Jabavu ... ... ... ... ... 711

The Direction of National Energy. By Arthur Ponsonby, M.P. ... ... ... ... ... 565

The Health of Cricket. By Lancastrian ... ... 847

The Incorrigible Censor ... ... ... ... 310

The Poor Law Commission and Voluntary Agencies. By Social Reformer ... ... 51

The Warren on the Hill. By R. A. J. Walling 777

OPEN QUESTIONS.

PAGE

Religion and Conduct. By Sidney Low ... 417

COMMUNICATIONS.

PAGE

A Radical Member's View. By A Radical M.P.... 53

A Working-Class View of Lord Curzon's Manifesto. By Albert Mansbridge ... ... ... ... 527

Charles Dickens and Leigh Hunt. By Aaron Watson ... ... ... ... ... ... 350

Glastonbury as a Cemetery for the Empire. By the Rev. C. L. Marson ... ... ... ... ... 422

Roads. By Douglas Leechman ... ... ... 677

The Amendment of the Law of Murder. By G. G. Greenwood, M.P. ... ... ... ... ... 492

The Anti-War Movement in Spain. By Ramiro de Maeztu ... ... ... ... ... ... 638

The Art of Mr. J. M. Synge. By Francis Bickley 18

The Attitude of the German People. By the Rev. W. D. Morrison ... ... ... ... ... 458

The Bachelor Blue. By B. S. T. ... ... ... 605

The Carrying of the Colors. By An Old War Correspondent ... ... ... ... ... 313

The Death of George Meredith. By Richard H. P. Curle ... ... ... ... ... ... 279

The Declaration of London. By the Rev. T. J. Lawrence ... ... ... ... ... ... 88

The High Treason Trial at Agram. By J. F. Lupis 915

The Housing and Town-Planning Bill. By the Mayor of Richmond ... ... ... ... 780

The Misunderstanding of Darwin. By Anthony M. Ludovici ... ... ... ... ... ... 814

The Party and the Budget. By a Radical Member 349

The Passing of the Six-Shilling Back. By A Literary Agent ... ... ... ... ... 199

The Responsibility for the Licensing of Plays. By Bram Stoker and G. Bernard Shaw ... ... 387

The Territorial Force Under Military Law. By Verity ... ... ... ... ... ... 745

The "Times" on India's Future. By Sir William Wedderburn ... ... ... ... ... 568

Trade under Town-Planning. By George Haw ... 421

"Triangular" Cricket. By Lancastrian ... ... 459

LETTERS FROM ABROAD.

PAGE

Abdul Hamid's Plot and its Failure. By Sir Edwin Pears ... ... ... ... ... 161

The Cretan Problem. By Our Cretan Correspondent 385

The End of the Bülow Bloc? By Edward Bernstein 198

The First Year of the Turkish Constitution. By Estelle Blyth ... ... ... ... ... 603

The Meaning of the Bülow Crisis. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein ... ... ... ... ... ... 491

The Nemesis of French Bureaucracy. By Our Paris Correspondent ... ... ... ... ... 244

The New Chancellor and the Old Game. By Dr. Ed. Bernstein ... ... ... ... ... 602

The Press Law in Egypt. By Frederick Ryan ... 125

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

PAGE

The German Declaration of Intention (The Rt. Hon. Sir Charles Dilke, Bart, M.P.); "The Motives of German Policy" (R. N.); London University Commission (A Late Member of the Senate of the University of London); "The Suffragettes" (Henry W. Nevinson); Imperialism and Militarism (Douglas Fox Pitt); The Danger of a National Theatre (Euphemia Stevens); "Scenes of Enthusiasm" (E. Clerihew); Our Foreign Investments (H. W. Goldberg); The Text of Hamlet in the First Folio (Edward W. Smithson); The Fighting Value of "Dreadnoughts" (C. G. Walker); The Reform of the Death Duties (D. B. McLaren); Accuracy in Poetic Illustration (Jas. B. Winterbotham); Fashionable Cacoepy (Evacustes A. Phipson); Equality and Variety (Henry Holiday) ... 18

The Hero Cult in Modern Irish Literature (Alice L. Milligan); London University Commission (Professor Kirsopp Lake); Loyalty to Party (X.); The Art of J. M. Synge (W. B. Yeats); Votes for Women and Adult Suffrage (H. B. Dowson and Lionel Barrett); The Appeal to Force (Lover of Milton); A Secret Doctrine (Rev. F. G. Montagu Powell); Crimeless Ireland (Veritas); Differentiated Income-Tax (Ex-Teacher); Naval Expenditure and the Suffering of the People (C. E. Playne) ... ... ... 53

The Budget and the Sinking Fund (L. G. Chiozza-Money, M.P.); The Fighting Value of "Dreadnoughts" (C. E. Kelway); The War Craze (Facta non Verba); Non-resistance in Practice (Alfred Ollivant); An Indiscreet Plea for Indiscretions (W. T. Stead); Adult Suffrage (Mrs. Vaughan Nash); London University Commission (R. Shindler); "The Worker-Student" (C. E. Maurice); Robertson of Brighton (A. de Bavier); Sir George Clarke's Daughter (Henry W. Nevinson); Resistance to Panic (Charlton Wilkinson); The Snowdrop and the Bee (Rev. D. K. Auchterlonie and Emily R. Wicksteed); The Anglican Church and Nonconformity (Everard Wilson); "Deirdre Wedded" (R. Anthony Gibbs) ... ... ... ... ... 89

The Declaration of London (Arnold Herbert, M.P.); The Anglican Church and Nonconformists (Richard Mudie-Smith, D. Eastham Auty, and the Rev. A. Norman Rowland); "A Study of the Bye-Elections" (John H. Humphreys); Adult Suffrage (Catharine Ryle and B. Blagg); Form in Poetry (J. C. Graham); The Medical Value of Sunlight (George Burford, M.B.); Poets and Children (B. Brooksbank); Gogol's Centenary (Constance Garnett); The Fighting Value of "Dreadnoughts" (C. G. Walker) ... ... ... ... ... ... 126

The Declaration of London (Rev. T. J. Lawrence); The Defects of Liberal Propaganda (W. M. T.); The Unfortunate Argyll (Rev. John Willcock); The Salvation Army's Social Work (Ronald H. Kidd and Social Reformer); The Object of German Expansion (Yorkshire Radical); The Small Holdings Act (A. E. R. Gill); "The Growth of International Law" (D. M. Mason); The Papacy and Joan of Arc (G.); Concerning our Frivolous Stage (Austin Harrison); London University Commission (Professor Kirsopp Lake); Swinburne and the Sea (Richard H. P. Curle) ... 162

"The Mills of God" (Professor L. T. Hobhouse); M. Loisy's Inaugural Lecture (R. E. D.); Concerning our Frivolous Stage (William Poel); A Question of Ideals (Immo S. Allen); The Small Holdings Act (Montague Fordham); "The Defects of the Liberal Propaganda" (W. R. Snow); Deer and the Cruelty to Animals Act (G. G. Greenwood, M.P.); The Anglican Church and Nonconformists (Charles J. Magrath); Adult Suffrage (B. Blagg) ... ... ... ... 200

To the Memory of Thomas Paine (Joseph Clayton); Solitary Confinement (St. John Hankin); The Anglican Church and Nonconformists (Richard Mudie-Smith and George Whale); The Small Holdings Act (A. I. Tillyard); Is Golf a Game? (Penguin); The Budget and the Brewers (H. Peter Bone); A Question of Ideals (Eliza Delf and Ernest W. Leighton); A Misquotation (P.); The World's Shortage of Wheat (R. Shindler); The Object of the German Navy (J. F. Collier) 245

"The Object of the German Navy" (B.); The Anglican Church and Nonconformists (J. R. Chitty, A. Neave Brayshaw, and Charles J. Magrath); A Suggestion for the L.C.C. (John Lewis); The Salvation Army's Social Work (Ronald H. Kidd and Social Reformer); Is Golf a Game? (Arnold F. Jones); Thomas Paine (W. Wyse); "Glimpses of the 'Twenties" (William Toynbee); The Snowdrop and the Bee (N. W. Hill); The Defects of Liberal Propaganda (Frederick Tombs); The Budget (J. Houston Fulwood) ... ... ... ... ... 279

George Meredith and the Abbey (C. S.); Fox and Patriotism (J. L. Hammond); Fire Brigades and Insurance Companies (Insurance Manager); The Cause of the Liberal Set-back (D. P. Coulton); A Question of Ideals (Immo S. Allen); Inequalities of the Income Tax (Income-Tax Reformer); "The Break-up of the Poor Law" (Mrs. C. D. Rackham); The Anglican Church and Nonconformists (Leyton Richards, Richard Mudie-Smith, and X. Y. Z.); "To Vindicate Leigh Hunt" (R. H. B.) ... ... ... ... 314

The Break-up of the Poor Law (Mrs. Sidney Webb); The Imperial Cable Service (Professor Edward Shann); The Incorrigible Censor (A., S., and C. E. Maurice); The Johnson Bicentenary Celebration (Mayor of Lichfield); "The Consolations of Science" (J. Allanson Picton); Fire Brigades and Insurance Companies (S. J. G. Hoare and A. E. Brown); Abbey—or Pantheon? (Rev. T. Hill); The Anglican Church and Nonconformists (Charles Magrath); Inequalities of the Income Tax (St. John G. Ervine) ... ... 351

South Africa and the Color Question (Rev. R. Balmforth); The Incorrigible Censor (D. R. and Isobel Hecht); Pain and the Theatre (C. E. Maurice); The Vista of Science (T.); Fire Brigades and Insurance Companies (Insurance Manager); Re Inequalities of the Income-Tax (B. H. C. Currie); The Imperial Cable Service (Keith A. Murdoch); Feminist Argument (E. Belfort Bax); "I Agree with Every Word" (A Liberal Elector); The Break-up of the Poor Law (C. H. Norman) ... ... ... ... 388

The Incorrigible Censor (A.); A Persian Quaker (M. H. L. B.); The Intellects of Men and Women (Edith Hunter); Women and War (Henry W. Nevinson and Hilda A. Walker); Ministers and the Party (John B. Martindale); The Tsar's Visit to England (J. Allanson Picton); Reason and Instinct (A Student of Bergson); The Break-up of the Poor Law (George

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (continued).

PAGE

Lansbury and St. John G. Ervine); A "Daily Mail" Expert (An Old War Correspondent); Fire Brigades and Fire Insurance (A. E. Brown); The Defects of the Liberal Propaganda (G. Wallace Carter) ... ... ... ... ... 422

Religion and Conduct (John Drinkwater, J. Allanson Picton, V.P., F. S. Montagu Powell, and Joseph Fletcher); The Fight for the Budget (Rev. Th. Hill); The Services of Miss Colenso (A. Werner); Esperanto (J. Gourlay); "The Destruction of Dialect" (Neal Green, R. W. J., and David Wilson); "The Feud" (Edward Garnett); "The Intellects of Men and Women (E. Sykes and Mrs. F. Travers); Feminist Arguments (E. Belfort Bax); Fire Brigades and Fire Insurance (Insurance Manager); The Incorrigible Censor (C. E. Maurice); The Alleged "Cave" (Right Hon. Thomas Lough, M.P.) ... ... ... ... 459

Faith and Conduct (Canon Scott-Holland, G. K. Chesterton, A. de B., E. Stapledon, K. Morley Horder, Geo. Croswell Cressey, and D. Hamilton); Miss Colenzo and the Defence of Dinizulu (Rev. Norman Bennet and Douglas Fox Pitt); The Lords and the Finance Bill (Cleveland Fyfe); The Effect of the Land Taxes R. C. Phillimore and Fred J. H. Herle); "The Break-up of the Poor Law" (Mrs. C. D. Rackham); "Our Old Nobility" (John Lewis); The Destruction of Dialect (J. Slater and G. L. Browne); "The Coming Reality of Politics" (John McCulloch); A Correction (H. T. Poole) ... 493

Calvin (J. Allanson Picton); The Visit of the Tsar (A. MacCallum Scott); Faith and Conduct (Elizabeth Cobb and J. Henry Hocken); Feminist Arguments (Emily Tomlinson and Josephine Evans Williams); The Official Valuation of Ireland (Murrough O'Brien); Charles Dickens and Leigh Hunt (B. W. Matz); One Way of Paying Budget Duties (S. L. H.); The Destruction of Dialect (T. Maben and D. H. Kemp); Mr. Hudson's Butterflies (G. G. Desmond) ... ... 528

Faith and Conduct (Sidney Low, George Hicks, and J. M.); The Break-up of the Poor Law (Beatrice Webb); The Policy of Deportation (Frederic Mackarness, M.P.); The "Revolution in Education" (Professor J. H. Muirhead and T. Edmund Harvey); "The Power to Suppress Opinion" (Sydney P. Turnbull); The Chinese and Militarism (E. W. Sawdon) ... ... ... 568

Lord Lansdowne's Doctrine of Common Sense (H. W. V. Temperley); The Case of the South African Natives (Dewdney W. Drew); The Suffragettes at Bye-Elections (Mrs. Brailsford); Father Tyrrell's Position (F. R.); "Wild Men" (Arnold Lupton, M.P.); The Destruction of Dialect (Duncan R. Leitch, John R. Clark Hall, and Georg Brochner); "Revolution in Education" (Alice Gardner); "What the Public Wants" (Arnold Bennett); The Assessment of Land in the United States (Geo. Whitney Moore); Faith and Conduct (W. J. B.) ... ... 606

The Working of the Land Taxes (Leodiensis); A Revolution in Education (Professor J. H. Muirhead); Father Tyrrell's Position (C. Delisle Burns and James A. Walker); Taxing Superfluities (M. A.); The Suffragettes at Bye-Elections (J. Fergusson Roxburgh and Wm. S. Campbell); The American College for Girls at Constantinople (Lt.-Col. Alfred S. Jones); The Inscriptions in Westminster Abbey (S. J. Hutchinson ... ... ... ... ... 639

PAGE

The Troubles in Spain (David Hannay); Religious Education in the Schools (Catherine Ryle and Graham Wallas); The Working of the Land Taxes (G. A. Seebohm and Leodiensis); The Tactics of the Suffragettes (S., Leslie Stannard Hunter, and J. E. M. Brailsford); The Young Cuckoo (G. G. Desmond); "Disaffection" in India (J. Page Hopps); Shakespeare and Beethoven (William Poel)... ... ... ... 678

The Troubles in Spain (Ramiro de Maeztu); "Not as These Publicans!" (R. B. Cunninghame Graham); The Government and the Suffrage Movement (F. W. Pethick Lawrence); The Women's War (John M. Hogge, Erie Evans, J. Fergusson Roxburgh, W. R. Snow, Arthur Brenton, A Liberal Woman and "How It Strikes a Contemporary"); Russian Liberals and the Tsar's Visit (A. MacCallum Scott); The Future of Religious Education (J. H. Muirhead); "The Lost Liberty of the Road" (Betsy Hobson); The Break-up of the Poor Law (Mrs.) C. D. Rackham (P.L.G.)); Father Tyrrell's Position (F. R.); Emile de Girardin (N.); "The Poverty of the Cottage" (James C. Mackenzie and Senex Quidam Presbyter) ... ... ... 713

The Gorringe Case (Leodiensis); The National Valuation of Land (John McCulloch and George Whitney Moore); Father Tyrrell's Position (William Scott Palmer and H. C. Currance); A Memoir of Father Tyrrell (M. D. Petre); The Prevention of Cancer (Hon. R. Russell); Slave Labor on the Portuguese Cocoa Plantations (Travers Buxton); "The Government and the Suffrage Movement (Mrs. B. Brooksbank); The Women's War (H. B. Dowson and I. Mackenzie); Russian Opinion and the Tsar's Visit (C. E. Maurice); The Poverty of the Cottage (Elton Claridge) ... ... ... ... ... ... 746

Russian Liberals and the Tsar's Visit (C); A Blot on the "Act of Union" (Mrs. Saul Solomon); The Real Jack Cade (Joseph Clayton); Scotland and the Finance Bill (Thomas Ogilvy); Suffragette Tactics ("Medium Templum" and Henry Clay); "Lowering the Flag (Margaret Clark Gillett); The Women's War (Richard R. Meade-King); The Resignation of the Neergaard Cabinet (A. Dane); The Gorringe Case (James H. Robertson); Asking the Way ("A Would-be Habitual Topographical Enquirer"); "The White Prophet" (G. J. Foulis) ... ... ... 781

The Gorringe Case (Leodiensis, F. U. Laycock, and John Lewis); "The Territorial Force Under Military Law" (W. E. Sykes); The Budget Increment Concession (H. Horner); Landlords and Laborers (R. W. J.); The Proposed Motor Roads (Joshua Brookes); The Poverty of the Cottage (A Wanderer and The Writer of the Article); "Suffragette Tactics" (E. M. White); The Importance of the Stage (J. S. R. P.); A Warning from the United States (H. O. Sturgis) ... ... 815

The Views of Russian Liberals (A Group of Russian Liberals); The Set-back to Women's Suffrage (S. A. B.); The Gorringe Case (James H. Robertson and Leonard J. Clegg); The Motor Roads (R. W. J. and Joseph E. Southall); Rights of Way Frederick Whelen); German and British Arma-

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (continued).

PAGE

ments (Reformer); The Monopoly of Giving (J. Edward Francis); "Asking the Way" (V. I.); China and Japan (D. M. Stevenson); Malta Fever (E. Douglas Hume); The Government and the Lords (H H. Robson) ... ... ... ... 849

The Gorringe Case (F. U. Laycock and A. J. Marriott); The Unearned Increment (R. B. Cunninghame Graham); An Experiment in Rural Housing (Country Vicar); The Set-Back to Women's Suffrage (E. M. White, Wm. S. Campbell, and J. Rankine Finlayson); The Haymarket Lear (H. W. M.); If the Lords Reject the Budget? (Joseph A. Leckie) ... ... ... 884

"The Set-back to Women's Suffrage" (Mrs. S. A. Byles, H. N. Brailsford, and Clementina Black); The Inspection of Roman Catholic Schools (Mrs. Sidney Webb); The Gorringe Case (Leodiensis and a London Leaseholder); Dante's System of Morals (W. H. V. Reade); New Income-tax Notices (R. M. Currie) ... ... ... ... 917

DIARY OF THE WEEK.

1, 37, 73, 109, 145, 181, 229, 261, 297, 333, 369, 405, 441, 477, 513, 553, 589, 625, 661, 697, 733, 765, 801, 833, 869, 901.

FINANCE: THE WEEK IN THE CITY. BY "LUCELLUM."

32, 68, 104, 140, 176, 212, 256, 292, 328, 364, 400, 436, 472, 508, 548, 584, 620, 654, 692, 728, 760, 796, 828, 864, 896, 932.

THE WORLD OF BOOKS AND BOOKS TO BE READ.

23, 57, 94, 131, 168, 250, 285, 318, 356, 393, 427, 465, 611, 644, 751, 786, 820, 855, 889, 922.

POETRY.

PAGE

A Dancing Song to the Mistral Wind (from Nietzsche). By M. D. P.... ... ... ... 249
An Old House. By William H. Davies ... ... 888
A Song of Life. By David Wilson... ... ... 130
A Sussex Churchyard. By A. H. B. ... ... 610

Blossoms (From the Chinese). By L. Cranmer-Byng ... ... ... ... ... ... 355

Clouds. By William H. Davies ... ... ... 284

Death. By John Drinkwater ... ... ... 532

In Cobbett's Country. By J. S. Phillimore ... 499
In the Cool of the Evening. By James Stephens 854
In the Dutch Garden, Hampton Court. By C. Kennett Burrow ... ... ... ... ... 392
In the South (from Nietzsche). By M. D. P. ... 93

Knitting. By William H. Davies ... ... ... 426

My Lady of Dreams. By Frederick Niven ... 750

PAGE

Nothing at All. By James Stephens ... ... 854
Now. By William H. Davies ... ... ... 720

Ode in April. By R. C. K. Ensor ... ... 167
Opportunity. By James Elroy Flecker ... ... 682

The Ballad of O'Farrell. By C. H. Bewley ... 56
The Message. By Edward S. Tylee ... ... 22
The Picture. By R. C. K. Ensor ... ... ... 921
The Town Without a Market. By James Elroy Flecker ... ... ... ... ... ... 204
The Way of Life. By St. John G. Ervine ... 317
To Dora. By Thomas Burke ... ... ... 643

Victoria Street. By Lucy Lyttelton ... ... 464

What the Devil Said. By Lucy Lyttelton ... 854
Where to Go. By Rosalind Travers ... ... 785
Wild-Rose Time. By R. C. K. Ensor ... ... 573
Wolf's Eyes. By John Palmer ... ... ... 819

REVIEWS OF BOOKS.

PAGE

A Bishop in the Rough. By the Rev. D. Wallace Duthie ... ... ... ... ... 28
A Change in the Cabinet. By H. Belloc ... ... 468
Acropolis of Athens, The. By Martin L. D'Ooge 96
A Dickens Dictionary. By Alexander J. Philip 290
Adventures in Contentment. By David Grayson 436
Adventures in London. By James Douglas ... 760
A Few Lyrics. By Laurance Alma Tadema ... 576
Afoot in England. By W. H. Hudson ... ... 489
Age of the Enlightened Despot (1660-1789), The. By A. H. Johnson ... ... ... ... 928

PAGE

A History of English Cathedral Music. By J. S. Bumpus ... ... ... ... ... 758
A History of Theatrical Art in Ancient and Modern Times. By Karl Mantzius. Volume V., "The Great Actors of the Eighteenth Century" ... ... ... 320
A Holiday in Connemara. By Stephen Gwynn... 254
A Literary History of Persia. By E. G. Browne 688
A Literary History of Rome. By Professor Wight-Duff ... ... ... ... ... 879
A Little Maryland Garden. By Helen Ashe Hans 652

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

A Lute of Jade. By L. Cranmer-Byng ... ... 48
Ancient Greek Historians, The. By J. B. Bury. [Gilbert Murray.] ... ... ... ... 219
An Empire in Pawn. By A. J. Wilson ... ... 705
A New History of Methodism. Edited by Dr. Townsend, Dr. Workman, and G. Eayrs... 466
A New Light on the Renaissance. By Harold Bayley ... ... ... ... ... 287
An Irish Precursor of Dante. By C. S. Boswell 723
An Introductory History of England. Vols. 3 and 4. By C. R. L. Fletcher ... ... ... 500
A Plain Guide to Investment and Finance. By T. E. Young ... ... ... ... ... 723
A Pluralistic Universe. By William James ... 502
Artemis to Acteon, and Other Verse ... ... 576
Artemision: Idylls and Songs. By Maurice Hewlett 613
Arrows from the Dark. By Sophie Cole ... ... 27
A Scots Earl in Covenanting Times. By John Willcock. [Andrew Lang.] ... ... 95
A Short History of English Agriculture. By W. H. R. Curtler ... ... ... ... ... 720
As Others See Us. By John G. Brooks ... ... 85
A Summer Garden. By Annette Furness ... ... 582
Austria-Hungary. By Geoffrey Drage ... ... 891
Avenging Children. By Mary E. Mann ... ... 824
A Vision of Life. By Darrell Figgis ... ... 789
A Wanderer in Paris. By E. V. Lucas ... ... 758

Bancrofts: Recollections of Sixty Years, The. By Marie Bancroft and Squire Bancroft ... 792
Banzai. By "Parabellum" ... ... ... 396
Barbary Sheep. By Robert Hichens ... ... 288
Bargain: A Story of Love, The. By Theodora Wilson Wilson ... ... ... ... 540
Beethoven's Letters. Critical Edition, with Explanatory Notes. By A. C. Kalischer ... 613
Betelguese. By Jean Louis De Esque ... ... 576
Books for Schools. (Various.) ... ... ... 928
Botticelli. By Mary L. Bonnar ... ... ... 68
Bretons at Home, The. By Mrs. Gostling ... 273
Bride of the Mistletoe. By James Lane Allen ... 616
Brighton: Its History, Its Follies, and Its Fashions. By Lewis Melville ... ... 171
British and Foreign Arms and Armor. By C. H. Ashdown ... ... ... ... ... 66
British Birds in Their Haunts. By the Rev. C. A. Johns ... ... ... ... ... ... 140
Brittany to Whitehall. By Mrs. Colquhoun Grant 582
Brush, Pen, and Pencil. Mr. Tom Browne, R.I. By A. E. Johnson ... ... ... ... 546

Cage, The. By Harold Begbie ... ... ... 544
Carlyle's First Love, Margaret Gordon, Lady Bannerman, an account of her life, ancestry, and homes, her family, and friends. By Raymond Clare Archibald ... ... ... 925
Centenary of Gogal, The ... ... ... ... 61
Central Period of the Middle Age (918-1273), The. By Beatrice A. Lees ... ... ... ... 928
Century of the Child, The. By Ellen Key ... 452
Chapters on Spanish Literature. By James Fitzmaurice. [R. B. Cunninghame Graham.] ... 220
Characters and Events of Roman History. By G. Ferrero ... ... ... ... ... 537
Chats on English Earthenware. By Arthur Hayden ... ... ... ... ... 398
Chip. By T. Mills Young ... ... ... ... 100
Christian Minister and His Duties, The. By Dr. Dykes ... ... ... ... ... ... 436
City of Beautiful Nonsense, The. By E. Temple Thurston ... ... ... ... ... 100
City of Jerusalem, The. By Colonel C. R. Conder 794
Collected Poems of Dora Sigerson Shorter, The... 576
Colonel Kenyon-Slaney, M.P.: A Memoir ... ... 582
Commonwealth of Australia, The. By B. R. Wise 791

PAGE

Condition of England, The. By C. F. G. Masterman 357
Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire, The. By T. R. Glover ... ... ... 83
Contemporary France. By Gabriel Hanotaux. Vol. IV. ... ... ... ... ... 683
Court of Louis XIII., The. By K. A. Patmore ... 822
Cousins and Others. By Katherine Tynan ... 542
Curious Case of Lady Purbeck. A Scandal of the Seventeenth Century, The ... ... ... 256

Dante in English Literature, from Chaucer to Cary. By Dr. Paget Toynbee ... ... ... 434
Daphne; or Marriage à la Mode. By Mrs. Humphry Ward ... ... ... ... 324
Davina. By Frances G. Burmester ... ... 542
Dawn of Medieval Europe (476-918), The. By J. Howard B. Masterman ... ... ... 928
Day Dreams of Greece. By C. W. Stark ... ... 430
Days in Hellas. By Mabel Moore ... ... ... 506
Decay of the Church of Rome, The. By Joseph McCabe ... ... ... ... ... 788
Dictionary of the Bible. Edited by James Hastings, D.D. ... ... ... ... 615
Disappearance of the Small Landowner, The. By A. H. Johnson ... ... ... ... 720
Douris and the Painters of Greek Vases. By M. Edmond Pottier ... ... ... ... 28
Dublin Castle and the Irish People. By R. Barry O'Brien ... ... ... ... ... 98

Early Christian Hymns. Translations of the Verses of the most notable Latin writers of the Early and Middle Ages. By Daniel Joseph Donahoe ... ... ... ... 98
Early History of the Church, The. Translated from the French of Monsignor Duchesne... 758
Economic Heresies. By Sir Nathaniel Nathan ... 467
Edward Macdowell. By Lawrence Gilman ... 582
Egoists: A Book of Supermen, The. By James Huneker ... ... ... ... ... 503
El Greco. By F. A. Calvert ... ... ... 66
Elisabeth Davenay. By Claire de Pratz ... ... 324
Eliza Brightwen. The Life and Thoughts of a Naturalist. Edited by W. H. Chesson. With an Introduction by Edmund Gosse ... 468
Enchanters of Men. By Ethel Colburn Mayne... 650
End of the Middle Age (1273-1453), The. By Eleanor C. Lodge ... ... ... ... 928
England and the English. By Price Collier ... 272
English Costume. By George Clinch ... ... 753
English Grammar Schools to 1660: Their Curriculum and Practice, The. By Foster Watson 26
English Heraldic Book Stamps. By Cyril Davenport ... ... ... ... ... 618
English in China, The. By J. Bromley Eames... 754
English Literature in the Nineteenth Century: An Essay in Criticism. By Laurie Magnus 859
Essai sur Leconte de Lisle. Par Jean Darnis ... 537
Essays in Freedom. By H. W. Nevinson. [E.] 394
Eumenides of Aeschylus, The. With an Introduction, Commentary, and Translation. By A. W. Verrall ... ... ... ... ... 396
Europe in Renaissance and Reformation (1453-1659). By Mary A Hollings ... ... 928
Everybody's Secret. By Dion Clayton Calthrop 544
Evolutionary Socialism. By Ed. Bernstein ... 652
Exile of St. Helena, The. By M. Philippe Gormard 434
Experiences. By Katharine Tynan ... ... 430
Fads and Feeding. By Dr. Stanford Read ... 29
Famous Women of Florence. By Edgcumbe Staley 580
Fancy O'Brien. By Ella MacMahon ... ... 504
Fair Women at Fontainebleau. By Frank Hamel 176
Fifty Years of It: The Experiences and Struggles of a Volunteer in 1859. By Sir John H. Macdonald ... ... ... ... ... 506

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

Florentine Sculptures of the Renaissance. By Wilhelm Bode ... ... ... ... 64
Foundations of the Origin of Species, The. Two Essays by Charles Darwin ... ... ... 646
"Frank Burnet." By Dorothy V. Horace Smith. [W. Hale White.] ... ... ... ... 532
French Gardening. By Thomas Smith ... ... 924
French Revolution: A Short History, The. By R. M. Johnston ... ... ... ... 826
Fresco Painting. By James Ward... ... ... 102
From Village Green to Downing Street. By Hugh Edwards and Spencer Leigh Hughes ... 157
Fulness of Christ, The. By Dr. Talbot ... ... 894

Galicia: The Switzerland of Spain. By Annette M. B. Meakin ... ... ... ... ... 138
Gallio. By St. John Lucas ... ... ... ... 576
Gay Paradines, The. By Mrs. Stephen Batson... 542
Geoffrey Cheriton. By John Barnett ... ... 226
George Bernard Shaw. By Gilbert K. Chesterton. [G. B. S.] ... ... ... ... ... 787
George Brown, D.D., Missionary and Explorer ... 134
George Sand: Sa Vie et Son Œuvre. Par René Doumie ... ... ... ... ... 758
George Selwyn and the Wits. By S. Parnell Kerr 24
Glimpses of the Twenties. By William Toynbee 254
Gospel According to St. John, The. By the late Dr. Brooke Foss Westcott ... ... ... 726
Gospel of Human Needs, The. By Dr. Figgis ... 670
Greek Versions of the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, The. Translated by Dr. Charles 66
Green Curve, and Other Stores, The. By Ole Luk-Oiè ... ... ... ... ... 396
Green Finch Crime, The. By the Rev. F. C. Kempson ... ... ... ... ... 548
Guiseppe Baretti and His Friends. By Collison Morley ... ... ... ... ... 864

Haileybury College. By the Rev. L. S. Milford 582
Half-Moon, The. By Ford Madox Hueffer ... 136
Hampshire. By Wilfrid Ball and the Rev. Telford Varley ... ... ... ... ... 506
Happy Elopement, The. By E. H. Lacon Watson 226
Heart of a Gypsy, The. By Rosamund Napier... 100
History of Art. By Dr. G. Carotti. Vol. II. ... 470
History of Belgium. Vol. II. By Demetrius C. Boulanger ... ... ... ... ... 328
History of German Literature, A. By Calvin Thomas, LL.D. ... ... ... ... 286
History of the Church of England. By M. W. Patterson ... ... ... ... ... 864
Holy Mountain, The. By Stephen Reynolds ... 925
Humors of the Country ... ... ... ... 932

Ideas of a Plain Country Woman, The ... ... 398
Immortal Hour, The. By Fiona Macleod ... 430
Industrial System: An Inquiry into Earned and Unearned Income, The. By J. A. Hobson 319
Infamous John Friend, The. By Mrs. R. S. Garnett 208
Inns of Court, The. By Cecil Headlam and Gordon Home ... ... ... ... ... ... 470
In re Shakespeare. Beeching v. Greenwood. By G. G. Greenwood ... ... ... ... 58
Insect Stories. By Vernon Kellog... ... ... 176
Inspired Millionaires. By Gerald Stanley Lee. [G. Lowes Dickinson.] ... ... ... 204
Insurrections. By James Stephens ... ... 857
In the Heart of Democracy. By Robert Gardner 32
In Tuscany. By Montgomery Carmichael ... 652
In Unknown Tuscany. By Edward Hutton ... 578
Iron Cardinal, The. By Joseph McCabe ... 360
Italy from 1494 to 1790. By Mrs. H. M. Vernon 256

Jimbo: A Fantasy. By Algernon Blackwood ... 27

PAGE

Johannes Brahms: The Herzogenberg Correspondence. Edited by Max Kalbeck. Translated by Hannah Bryant ... ... ... ... 133

Kincaid's Battery. By George Cable ... ... 226
King's Favorite: The Love Story of Robert Carr and Lady Essex ... ... ... ... 221

Ladies Fair and Frail: Sketches of the Demi-Monde During the 18th Century. By Horace Bleackley ... ... ... ... ... 138
La France Economique et Sociale à la Veille de la Révolution: Les Campagnes. Par Maxime Kovalewsky ... ... ... ... ... 645
Lancelot and Elaine. By Morley Steynor ... 576
Last Days of Papal Rome, 1850-1870, The. By R. de Cesare ... ... ... ... ... 646
Last King of Poland, The. By R. Nisbet Bain... 923
Laurus Nobilis. By Vernon Lee ... ... ... 686
Leaves from a Madeira Garden. By Charles Thomas Stanford ... ... ... ... 862
Le Dix-huitième Siècle. Par Casimir Stryienski 612
Letters from Malabar. By Henry Bruce ... ... 580
Letters of a Remittance Man to His Mother, The. By W. H. P. Jarvis ... ... ... ... 32
Letters of Diana, Lady Chesterfield, to Her Daughter and Sister. By Mrs. Crackanthorpe ... ... ... ... ... 796
Letters of Percy Bysshe Shelley, The. Collected and Edited by Roger Ingpen, with Illustrations. [Professor Edward Dowden.] ... 890
Life and Times of Master John Hus, The. By Count Lützow ... ... ... ... 430
Life of Friedrich List. By M. E. Hirst ... ... 429
Life of Sir John Ardagh. By the Countess of Malmesbury ... ... ... ... ... 290
Life of Sir Robert Hart. By Juliet Bredon ... 251
Little Devil Doubt. By Oliver Onions ... ... 432
Lives of the Hanoverian Queens of England. By Alice D. Greenwood ... ... ... ... 796
Lola Montez: An Adventuress of the 'Forties. By E. B. d'Aubergne ... ... ... ... 470
London's Forests. By P. T. S. Perceval ... ... 618
Love Affairs of Napoleon, The. By M. Joseph Turquar ... ... ... ... ... 434
Ludwig van Beethoven's Leben. Von A. W. Thayer ... ... ... ... ... 613
Lyrical and Other Poems. By John Drinkwater 430

Magnificat. By Vincent Brown ... ... ... 224
Making of Species, The. By Douglas Dewar and Frank Finn ... ... ... ... ... 646
Man and the Bible. By J. Allanson Picton ... 574
Mansfield College Essays ... ... ... ... 322
Margaret Hever. By Elizabeth Martindale ... 893
Marriage as a Trade. By Cicely Hamilton ... 844
Marriage of Hilary Carden, The. By Stanley Portall Hyatt ... ... ... ... ... 724
Memoir and Letters of Francis W. Newman. By I. Giberne Sieveking ... ... ... ... 923
Merry Moments. By Henry J. Barker ... ... 29
Mesmerism and Christian Science. By Frank Podmore ... ... ... ... ... 894
Mexico. By C. Reginald Enoch, F.R.G.S. [R. B. Cunninghame Graham.] ... ... ... 535
Mirabeau and the French Revolution. By C. F. Warwick ... ... ... ... ... 894
Mistress Art, The. By Reginald Blomfield ... 821
Morals in Modern Business ... ... ... ... 598
Moral System of Dante's Inferno. By W. H. V. Reade. [P. H. W.] ... ... ... ... 856
Motor Tours in Yorkshire. By Mrs. Rodolph Stawell ... ... ... ... ... 174
Mountaineering in the Land of the Midnight Sun. By Mrs. Aubrey le Blond .. ... ... 726

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

Mount, The. By C. F. Keary ... ... ... 859
M.P. for Russia, The. Reminiscences and Correspondence of Madame Olga Novikoff. Edited by W. T. Stead ... ... ... ... 25
Much Ado About Something. By C. E. Lawrence 544
Multitude and Solitude. By John Masefield ... 579
My Life as Farmer's Boy, Factory Lad, Teacher and Preacher. By Adam Rushton ... ... 828
My Restless Life. By Harry de Windt ... ... 212
Mystery of Golf, The. By Arnold Haultain ... 206
Mystery of the Myrtles, The. By Edgar Jepson 226
My Story. By Hall Caine ... ... ... ... 224

National Gallery, The. Vol. I. By P. G. Konody, M. W. Brockwell, and F. W. Lippmann ... 174
Negro in the South, The. By Booker Washington and Professor Du Bois ... ... ... 810
Nelson and Other Naval Studies. By James R. Thursfield ... ... ... ... ... 684
New Andromeda, The. By Carlton Dawe ... 226
New Nation, The. By H. E. S. Fremantle ... 534
New Poems. By John Marjoram ... ... ... 789
New Things and Old in Saint Thomas Aquinas. By H. C. O'Neill ... ... ... ... ... 400
Nineteenth Century Teachers and Other Essays. By Julia Wedgwood ... ... ... ... 59
Notes from a Painter's Life. By C. E. Hallé ... 580
Notes of a Botanist on the Amazon and Andes: Being Records of Travel during the Years 1849-1864. By Richard Spruce, Ph.D. ... 823

Old English Towns. By William Andrews ... 692
Old Home, The. By Gerald Bendall ... ... 542
Olive in Italy. By Moray Dalton ... ... 540
On the Tracks of Life. By Dr. Leo Sera ... ... 174
Origin and Development of the Moral Idea, The. By Edward Westermarck ... ... ... 222
Origin of Christianity, The. By the late Charles Bigg ... ... ... ... ... ... 358
Oxford Lectures on Poetry. By A. C. Bradley... 395

Panama Canal and Its Makers, The. By Vaughan Cornish ... ... ... ... ... 254
Papacy: The Idea and Its Exponents, The. By Gustave Krüger ... ... ... ... 930
Parenthood and Race Culture. By Dr. Saleeby 452
Passing English of the Victorian Era: A Dictionary of Heterodox English, Slang, and Phrase. By J. Redding Ware ... ... ... ... 174
Penelope Ann. By J. Henry Harris ... ... 542
Personae of Ezra Pound ... ... ... ... 789
Peter Homunculus. By Gilbert Cannan ... ... 253
Philanthropy and the State. By Benjamin Kirkman Gray ... ... ... ... ... 755
Philosophy of Long Life, The. By M. Finot ... 305
Philosophy of Self-Help, The. By Stanton Davis Kirkham ... ... ... ... ... 582
Physical Science and Christianity. By E. K. Bates 932
Pilgrim's March, The. By H. H. Bashford ... 540
Place of History in Education, The. By J. W. Allen ... ... ... ... ... 546
Poems of Louise Chandler Moulton ... ... 576
Political History of England, The. Vol. IV. From 1702-1760. By I. S. Leadam ... 612
Pools of Silence, The. By H. de Vere Stacpoole 544
Porcelain of All Countries. By R. L. Hobson ... 29
Portugal, Its Land and People. By W. H. Koebel 823
Precious Metals, The. By Dr. T. Kirke Rose ... 650
Principal Story: A Memoir by his Daughters ... 398
Problems of the Middle East. By Angus Hamilton 398
Prophecies of the Brahan Seer, The. By Alexander MacKenzie ... ... ... ... ... 501 Psyche, and Other Poems. By John Garth ... 576

PAGE

Psyche's Task. By J. G. Frazer, D.C.L. ... ... 576
Psychology and Crime. By Professor Münsterberg 239

Rambles in Sussex. By F. G. Brabant ... ... 618
Recollections of a Long Life. By Lord Broughton (John Cam Hobhouse). Edited by his Daughter, Lady Dorchester ... ... ... 575
Religion and the Common Mind. Ten Lectures ... 690
Remaking of Modern Europe (1789-1878), The. By J. A. R. Marriott ... ... ... ... 923
Richard Savage: A Romance in Biography. By Stanley V. Makower ... ... ... ... 580
Roads to Riches. By Thornton Hall ... ... 29
Romance of Fra Filippo Lippi, The. By A. J. Anderson ... ... ... ... ... 650
Romances on the French Revolution. From the French of G. Lenotre by Frederic Lees ... 252
Roses and Shamrock. By L. Aron Cunnington ... 576
Round the Lake Country. By Canon Rawnsley 546
Round the World in a Motor Car. By Antonio Scarfoglio ... ... ... ... ... 648
Royal End, The. By Henry Harland ... ... 27
Royal Lovers and Mistresses. By Dr. Angelo S. Rappoport ... ... ... ... ... 29
Rubens. By E. Dillon ... ... ... ... 794
Russian Army and the Japanese War, The. By General Kuropatkin. Translated by Captain A. B. Lindsay. Edited by Major E. D. Swinton ... ... ... ... ... 170

School of Madrid, The. Translated from the Spanish by Mrs. Stewart Erskine ... ... 434
Scare, The. By Lucas Malet ... ... ... 688
Secret History of the Court of Spain During the Last Century, The. By Rachel Challice ... 930
Selected Poems. By Laurence Housman ... ... 576
Servia and the Servians. Edited by Alfred Stead 290
Shadow of the Cathedral, The. By Vincent Blasco Ibañez ... ... ... ... ... 649
Shelley: A Dramatic Poem. By C. E. Foster ... 430
Side-Tracks and Bridle-Paths. By Lionel James 396
Silent Ones, The. By Mary Gaunt ... ... 226
Sir Guy and Lady Rannard. By H. N. Dickinson 360
Sisters of Napoleon: Elisa, Pauline, and Caroline Bonaparte. After the Testimony of their Contemporaries, The. By Joseph Turquan. Translated and Edited by W. R. H. Trowbridge ... ... ... ... ... 28
Sixty Years in the Wilderness. By Sir Henry W. Lucy ... ... ... ... ... 470
Some Pages from the Life of Turkish Women. By Demetra Vaka ... ... ... ... 892
Some Theological Books ... ... ... ... 860
South Africa. By Ian D. Colvin ... ... ... 930
Sparrows. By Horace W. C. Newte ... ... 100
Speeches. By the late Joseph Cowen ... ... 29
Splendor of God, The. By Eric Hammond ... 377
Spiritual Guidance in the Expedience of the Society of Friends. By Wm. Charles Braithwaite 721
Stained Glass Tours in England. By C. H. Sherrill 826
Starbrace. By Sheila Kaye-Smith ... ... 540
Stendhal et L'Angleterre. Par Doris Gunnell... 503
Stories from the Greek Legends. By C. Gasquoine Hartley ... ... ... ... ... 256
Stories of the English. Told to a Child by F. ... 652
Story of Amaryllis, The. By Viola Taylor ... 430
Street of Adventure, The. By Philip Gibbs ... 925
Studies in Mystical Religion. By Rufus M. Jones 169
Studies in Wives. By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes ... 538

Third French Republic, The. By Frederick Lawton ... ... ... ... ... 138
Three Plays by Granville Barker: The Marrying of Ann Leete—The Voysey Inheritance—Waste ... ... ... ... ... 891
Threshold, The. By Winefrid Trafford-Taunton... 226

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

PAGE

"Times" History of the War in South Africa, 1899-1902, The. Vol. VI. Edited by L. S. Amery ... ... ... ... ... 534
Towards the Uplands. By Lloyd Mifflin ... ... 430
Town Planning in Theory and Practice: An Introduction to the Art of Designing Cities and Suburbs. By Raymond Unwin ... ... 858
Town Planning: Past, Present, and Possible. By H. Inigo Triggs. [Professor Patrick Geddes.] ... ... ... ... ... 752
Trials of Five Queens, The. By R. Storry Deans 546
Trollope's Barchester Novels ... ... ... 910
Turkey in Revolution. By Charles Roden Buxton 60

Quaint Subjects of the King. By John Foster Fraser ... ... ... ... ... 324

Una Libera Chiesa Catholica. By J. M. Lloyd-Thomas. [Rev. G. Tyrrell.] ... ... 536
Uncle Gregory. By G. Sandeman ... ... ... 171
Undine. By Whitworth Wynne ... ... ... 430

Valley of Shadows, The. By Francis Grierson ... 62
Veil, The. By E. S. Stevens ... ... ... 538
Venice—The Decadence. By Pompeo Molmenti. Translated by Horatio F. Brown ... ... 428
Viscount Castlereagh. By Arthur Hassall ... 132
Voice of the Orient, The. By Mrs. Walter Tibbitts 896

PAGE

Walks in Paris. By Georges Cain ... ... ... 286
Wanton, The. By Frances Forbes-Robertson ... 540
Wealth and Want. By W. B. Northrop ... ... 508
We Two in West Africa. By Major and Mrs. Guggisberg ... ... ... ... ... 254
When a Woman Woos. By Charles Marriott ... 288
White Prophet, The. By Hall Caine ... ... 755
William Callow, R.W.S., F.R.G.S. Edited by H. M. Cundall ... ... ... ... 68
Wind and Hill. By Geoffrey Winthrop Young... 789
Wits, Beaux, and Beauties of the Georgian Era. By John Fyvie ... ... ... ... 614
Women Bonapartes. The Mother and Three Sisters of Napoleon I., The. By H. Noel Williams ... ... ... ... ... 28
Worcestershire. By Thomas Tyndale and A. G. Bradley ... ... ... ... ... 650
Works of Aristotle Translated into English, The. Vol. VIII., "Metaphysics" ... ... 469
Works of Mark Rutherford, The ... ... ... 910
Wreathed Dagger, The. By Margaret Young ... 542

Yellow Rose, The. By Maurice Jókai ... ... 288

Special Fiction Number ... ... ... ... 513

Magazines, and Short Notices ... 66, 210, 256, 292, 362, 725, 864

AUTHORS' INDEX.

PAGE

Archer, William. The Drama ... 243, 277, 348, 384, 419, 456, 490, 566, 778, 813, 848, 883, 914.

Baughan, E. A. Pelléas et Melisande ... ... 347
Bernstein, Edward. The End of the Bülow Bloc? 198
The Meaning of the Bülow Crisis ... ... 491
The New Chronicle and the Old Game ... 602
Bewley, C. H. The Ballad of O'Farrell ... ... 56
Bickley, Francis. The Art of Mr. J. M. Synge... 18
Blyth, Estelle. The First Year of the Turkish Constitution ... ... ... ... ... 603
Burke, Thomas. To Dora ... ... ... ... 643
Burrow, C. Kennett. In the Dutch Garden, Hampton Court ... ... ... ... ... 392
Byng, L. Cranmer. Blossoms ... ... ... 355

Clayton, Joseph. Keeping a Book-shop ... ... 309
Colum, Padraic. Shaun ... ... ... ... 455
Curle, Richard, M.P. The Death of George Meredith ... ... ... ... ... 279

Davies, William H. Knitting ... ... ... 426
Now ... ... ... 720
An Old House ... ... 888
Clouds ... ... ... 284
Dickinson, G. Lowes. The Socialised Millionaire 204
Dowden, Professor Edward. Shelley's Letters ... 890
Drinkwater, John. Death ... ... ... ... 532

Ensor, R. C. K. Ode in April ... ... ... 167
Wild-Rose Time ... ... ... ... ... 573
The Picture ... ... ... ... ... 921
Ervine, St. John G. The Way of Life ... ... 317

Fawkes, Rev. Alfred. Father George Tyrrell ... 601

PAGE

Flecker, James Elroy. The Town Without a Market ... ... ... ... ... 204
Opportunity ... ... ... ... ... 682

Galsworthy, John. Solitary Confinement: An Open Letter to the Home Secretary... 158, 194
The Prisoner ... ... ... ... ... 380
Geddes, Professor Patrick. Town Planning and Town Planners ... ... ... ... 752
Graham, R. B. Cunninghame. Spanish Literature 220
Mexico ... ... ... ... ... ... 535
Greenwood, G. G., M.P. The Amendment of the Law of Murder ... ... ... ... 492
Grierson, Francis. The Prophet Without Honor 14
The Humor of the Underman ... ... ... 706

Haw, George. Trade under Town-planning ... 421
Herford, Professor C. H. The Home of Catullus 524

Jabavu, J. Tengo. The Case of the South African Natives ... ... ... ... ... 711
Jerome K. Jerome. Robina and Marriage ... 192

Keeton, A. E. Fables of Kruilov ... ... ... 710
Kirkup, T. Organised Labor and Practical Politics ... ... ... ... 87, 160, 418

Lang, Andrew. The Unfortunate Argyll... ... 95
Lawrence, Rev. T. J. The Declaration of London 88
Leechman, Douglas. Roads ... ... ... 677
Lorente, Mariano J. La Galera ... ... ... 675
Low, Sidney. Religion and Conduct ... ... 417
Ludovici, Anthony M. The Misunderstanding of Darwin ... ... ... ... ... 814
Lupis, J. F. The High Treason Trial at Agram 915
Lyttelton, Lucy. Victoria Street ... ... ... 464

AUTHORS' INDEX (continued).

PAGE

Maetzu, Ramiro de. The Anti-War Movement in Spain ... ... ... ... ... ... 638
Mansbridge, Albert. A Working-class View of Lord Curzon's Manifesto ... ... ... 527
Marson, Rev. C. L. Glastonbury as a Cemetery for the Empire ... ... ... ... 422
Mayor of Richmond, The. The Housing and Town-Planning Bill ... ... ... ... ... 780
Morrison, Rev. W. D. The Attitude of the German People ... ... ... ... ... 458
Murray, Gilbert. The Ancient Greek Historians 219

Niven, Frederick. My Lady of Dreams ... ... 750
Nevinson, Henry W. To Vindicate Leigh Hunt 274

Palmer, John. Wolf's Eyes ... ... ... 819
Pears, Sir Edwin. Abdul Hamid's Plot and Its Failure ... ... ... ... ... 161
Phillimore, J. S. In Cobbett's Country ... ... 499
Ponsonby, Arthur, M.P. The Direction of National Energy ... ... ... ... 565

Rashdall, Dr. Hastings. An Academic View of Lord Curzon's Manifesto ... 240, 276, 311
Ripon, The Very Rev. the Dean of. Calvin ... 485
Ryan, Frederick. The Press Law in Egypt ... 125

Sanderson, John. The Secret Race ... ... 637
Shaw, G. Bernard. The Responsibility for the Licensing of Plays ... ... ... ... 388
Chesterton on Shaw ... ... ... ... 787

PAGE

Stephens, James. In the Cool of the Evening... 854
Nothing at All ... ... ... ... ... 854
What the Devil Said ... ... ... ... 854
Stoker, Bram. The Responsibility for the Licensing of Plays ... ... ... ... 387

Thomas, Edward. A Late Adventure ... ... 346
The Flower Gatherer ... ... ... ... 913
Travers, Rosalind. Where to Go ... ... ... 785
Tylee, Edward S. The Message ... ... ... 22
Tyrrell, Rev. G. The Free Catholic Church ... 536

Wallas, Graham. A Revolution in Education ... 520
The Future of Cowper-Templeism ... ... 597
Walling, R. A. J. The Warren on the Hill ... 777
Watson, Aaron. Charles Dickens and Leigh Hunt 350
Wedderburn, Sir William. The "Times" on India's Future ... ... ... ... 568
White, W. Hale. "Frank Burnet" ... ... 532
Wilson, David. A Song of Life ... ... ... 130

M. D. P. In the South (from Nietzsche) ... ... 93
A Dancing Song to the Mistral Wind (from Nietzsche) ... ... ... ... ... 249
A. H. B. A Sussex Churchyard ... ... ... 610
H. W. M. The Drama ... ... 17, 52, 122, 195
B. S. T. The Bachelor Blue ... ... ... 605
P. H. W. Dante's System of Morals ... ... 856
E. Mr. Nevinson's Prose-Writing... ... ... 394
H. A Trout Pool in Hampshire ... ... ... 379

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 1.] SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Diary of the Week ... ... | 1 |
| Politics and Affairs:— | |
| The Bankruptcy of Statesmanship ... ... ... ... | 4 |
| The Fight for the Balance of Power ... ... ... ... | 5 |
| The Aim of German Armaments ... ... ... | 7 |
| Trade Boards and Sweating ... | 8 |
| Life and Letters:— | |
| In Peril of its Life ... ... | 9 |
| A Book of Verses ... ... ... | 11 |
| Every Idle Word ... ... ... | 12 |
| A Scandal in "The Field" ... | 13 |
| Short Studies:— | |
| The Prophet without Honor. By Francis Grierson ... ... | 14 |
| Present-Day Problems:— | |
| From Eatanswill to Tammany | 16 |
| The Drama:— | |
| Pamphlet Plays. By H. W. M. | 17 |
| Communications:— | |
| The Art of J. M. Synge. By Francis Bickley ... ... | 17 |
| Letters to the Editor:— | |
| The German Declaration of Intention. By the Rt. Hon. Sir Charles Dilke, Bart., M.P. | 81 |
| "The Motives of German Policy." By R. N. ... ... | 19 |
| London University Commission. By a Late Member of the Senate of the University of London ... ... | 19 |
| The Suffragettes." By Henry W. Nevinson ... ... ... | 19 |
| Imperialism and Militarism. By Douglas Fox Pitt ... ... | 19 |
| The Danger of a National Theatre. By Euphemia Stevens ... ... ... ... | 20 |
| "Scenes of Enthusiasm." By E. Clerihew ... ... ... | 20 |
| Our Foreign Investments. By H. W. Goldberg ... ... | 20 |
| The Text of Hamlet in the First Folio. By Edward W. Smithson ... ... ... ... | 20 |
| The Fighting Value of "Dreadnoughts." By C. G. Walker | 21 |
| The Reform of the Death Duties. By D. B. McLaren ... | 21 |
| Accuracy in Poetic Illustration. By Jas. B. Winterbotham ... | 21 |
| Fashionable Cacoepy. By Evacustes A. Phipson ... | 21 |
| Equality and Variety. By Henry Holiday ... ... ... | 22 |
| Poetry:— | |
| The Message. By Edward S. Tylee ... ... ... ... | 22 |
| The World of Books ... ... | 23 |
| Books to be Read ... ... | 23 |
| Reviews:— | |
| The World of George Selwyn... | 24 |
| "O. K." ... ... ... ... | 25 |
| The English Grammar Schools | 26 |
| Current Fiction ... ... ... | 27 |
| An Uncomfortable Family ... | 28 |
| Books in Brief:— | |
| Painters of Greek Vases ... | 28 |
| A Bishop in the Rough ... ... | 28 |
| Royal Lovers and Mistresses ... | 30 |
| Porcelain of All Countries ... | 30 |
| Fads and Feeding ... ... | 30 |
| Roads to Riches ... ... ... | 30 |
| Merry Moments ... ... ... | 30 |
| Speeches of Joseph Cowen ... | 30 |
| In the Heart of Democracy ... | 32 |
| The Letters of a Remittance Man to his Mother ... ... | 32 |
| The Week in the City. By Lucellum ... ... ... ... | 32 |

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Last winter the financial seers all prophesied that Mr. Asquith's estimates of revenue would prove far too optimistic. Certainly the example of all the other great countries would have led us to expect a very heavy deficiency. But fortunately our case is unlike that of Germany and the United States. Our revenue does not fluctuate very widely in times of trade depression; for we do not depend in the same way on the customs. The income tax is our great stand-by; and it has come in so well during the last few weeks that it has yielded almost a million more than Mr. Asquith anticipated. It is believed also that merchants interested in sugar, tea, and spirits have taken the precaution to lay in heavy stocks of these articles in case the Chancellor of the Exchequer should find it convenient to increase the existing scale of taxation. As regards tea and sugar the apprehension is probably ungrounded. An increase might easily lead to a Government defeat, just as last year Mr. Asquith was unable to resist party pressure for a reduction in the sugar tax. It is very likely also that old age pensions have increased the consumption of tea and sugar amongst the poor.

* * *

Although every newspaper makes a different estimate it seems pretty certain that the realised deficiency (after allowing for some savings in expenditure) will be about three-quarters of a million. If Mr. Lloyd George bases his estimate of next year's revenue on the realised revenue of the financial year which closed on Wednesday night, he will have to fill up a deficiency of some fourteen millions, thanks mainly to the enormous additional sums that are required for old age pensions and the Navy. We are inclined, however, to think that the trade outlook offers a more hopeful prospect, although something must be allowed for a further loss on the sugar duties. Probably the deficiency may be about twelve millions, of which four, it is feared, will be abstracted from the Sinking Fund. The simplest and, perhaps, the best way of getting the remaining eight millions would be by means of the licence duties, the estate duties and the income tax. The principle of graduation is certainly the right principle to go upon, and there is no reason why it should not be carried up into the higher reaches of income and capital. But if Mr. Lloyd George has the courage to be bold, he will have been studying the history and present state of the ancient land tax. Other sources of revenue may be found in the increased taxation of Stock Exchange transactions, and possibly in a small duty on newspapers or advertisements.

* * *

On Monday Prince Bülow delivered a long and elaborate address to the Reichstag on foreign affairs. He began with a defence of his Morocco policy, and the Franco-German agreement, the object of which was to substitute for antagonism co-operation in opening up Morocco. He admitted some inconsequence in regard to Morocco, but declared that an audacious opportunism was the best foreign policy. Turning to the Balkan crisis, he stated that from the very beginning Germany had announced her resolution to support Austria, a course imposed by treaty obligations and necessary for the maintenance of Germany's influence in Europe. Germany had offered her mediation wherever practicable, but she remembered that her mediation at the Berlin Congress had put her in the black books of all the Powers, and she held that, in so far as Servia was concerned, Austria's right was beyond question.

* * *

Prince Buelow read his statement with regard to England, every word of which was carefully weighed. The exchange of views, he said, between England and Germany with reference to an agreement for the restriction of their naval programmes had been wholly informal, and England had never put forward a proposal which could constitute the basis of official negotiations. The German fleet was not designed to rival the English, but solely to protect the German shores and German commerce. The German programme had been made public; there was no dissimulation and no intention to accelerate construction beyond the rate laid down in the navy law. Every report to the contrary was false. In the autumn of 1912 at the earliest Germany would have ready thirteen "Dreadnoughts" and "Invincibles."

* * *

Since the Hague Conference no disarmament formula had been devised which took account of the very divergent interests of the various nations and offered a favorable basis for negotiation. As long as that was lacking, the German Government would maintain its point of view; namely, that all negotiations for a limitation of naval construction, whether entered upon by two or more Powers, offered no hope of practical issue. The Imperial Government's intentions were humanitarian and peaceful, and it would continue to cultivate friendly relations with England. Admiral von Tirpitz, the Naval Secretary, speaking after Prince Bülow, elaborated his account of the present position of German construction. Private yards in Germany, he said, could build a battleship in thirty-six months, Imperial yards in forty months, and to this period several months must be added for trials. Two ships of the 1909 programme had been ordered last autumn from private yards at a low price, subject to the Reichstag's approval, to prevent a ring of the private yards sending up prices if four had been ordered all at once. These two had only been promised. No contract had been made nor would be signed until after the estimates were voted. The period for building them was thirty-six months, beginning April 1st, 1909, and not a farthing would be paid until April 1st. The tenders for the other two would not be asked for till the end of summer, and the orders not given till some months later. In autumn, 1912, Germany would have ten "Dreadnoughts" and three "Invincibles," thirteen big ships in all, not seventeen.

* * *

The vote of censure, moved on Monday night by Mr. Arthur Lee, in a mild edition of his scare speeches, was rejected by 353 votes to 135. Only two so-called Liberals, Mr. Bellairs and Captain Kincaid-Smith, voted with the Opposition. The speech of the debate was Sir Edward Grey's, which deeply impressed its hearers by its power of statement, its gravity of tone, and its very pessimistic statement of the European situation. The Foreign Secretary justly charged the Opposition with making the Navy a party question, which he called a "criminal" proceeding, and he repudiated their call for the immediate construction of eight "Dreadnoughts." As for the Government, they asked not for a party victory, but for national "confidence." The German creation of a fleet of thirty-three "Dreadnoughts" imposed on us the necessity of rebuilding the whole of our fleet, but he affirmed our superior building capacities on every point but that of gun-mountings, where we were prepared to retain our old advantage. The Government were not therefore afraid of a contest in armaments.

* * *

Sir Edward's view of the immediate prospect in diplomacy was fairly hopeful. Our relations with Germany had improved since Algeciras, and now there was a "wide space" in which both Governments could walk in "amity and peace." The conditions were, first, that we should not try to "isolate" Germany; secondly, that Germany should not isolate us by trying to "dominate and dictate the policy of the Continent," a phrase, we are afraid, which lends itself to a wide interpretation by a British statesman of the "forward" school. He doubted whether an arrangement as to naval expenditure with Germany was feasible on the only possible basis, namely, a superior British fleet, and he had not had a "whisper" from Germany that this might be brought about if we changed our view of the capture of private property at sea.

* * *

As to programmes he stated that the four conditional "Dreadnoughts" did not necessarily imply a limitation of next year's programme. Neither, we imagine, do they forecast an addition to it, the Cabinet being free to build either two or four or more "Dreadnoughts" next year, as it thinks necessary. If in future there was a "doubt" as to German intentions and actions, the Government would give the benefit of it to "national security." Half the revenues of the great European peoples were now being spent on preparations to kill each other, and national burdens were tending to national bankruptcy. But the danger could not be averted by one country alone, and we in particular could not afford to become the "conscript appendage" of some stronger Power. Mr. Asquith practically repeated the pith of this argument. He added that our productive naval capacity was being increased, though on this point his statement that orders to this effect were given to the big shipbuilding firms in January has been contradicted by a member of Armstrongs. He said that if necessary the Government would not hesitate to lay down four extra "Dreadnoughts," and, treating the Vote of Censure as a mere party move, said contemptuously that it merely indicated the Opposition's belief in their own superior powers and patriotism.

* * *

Meanwhile Mr. Balfour has frankly turned the Navy into a Tory asset. He has made three speeches, at the House of Commons, at the Agricultural Hall to the National Conservative Union, and in a so-called citizens' but obviously Tory gathering at the Guildhall. For each of them he and the nation, should he ever return to power, will have to pay dearly. The first effect of his conduct was seen in Australia's withdrawal from a tentative proposal by New South Wales and Victoria to offer a second "Dreadnought." The Federal Government's opposition—Mr. Deakin, by the way, appears to be friendly—and Australia's fears of being drawn into British party conflict were plainly responsible for this decision. Mr. Balfour's tone has been strongly anti-German. He insisted, at the Guildhall, that Germany was building against us, adding, untruthfully, that her power of production was as great as our own, and insisting that in return we should "build without delay, without hesitation, without waiting for contingencies, for obscure circumstances, for future necessity"—senseless words which will come back heavily on their author.

* * *

Abandoning his calculations of 21 or 26 German "Dreadnoughts" in 1912, he suggested that the danger lay in the creation of new German ships of a superior type, which might be rapidly multiplied in 1913 and 1914. Thus, unlike our ancestors, who fought and destroyed actual Armadas without an Armada of their own, we fear Armadas that have not been built, or even begun. At the Agricultural Hall he openly linked his naval policy with Protection, declaring that the one was a complement of the other. On the other hand, Lord Brassey, who has forgotten more about ships than Mr. Balfour ever knew, stated at the Guildhall meeting that the Government were wise in going slow with the "Dreadnought" type, and that money had been wasted on cruisers and vessels of small fighting efficiency.

* * *

The Austro-Servian conflict has been settled, and with it the Balkan trouble is practically over. During last week Sir Edward Grey was trying to arrange joint intervention at Belgrade by the Powers in terms quite satisfactory to Austria. Russia stood in the way, but on Thursday Russia's resistance collapsed, and she announced that she was ready to give immediately her individual sanction to the annexation of Bosnia. An agreement was then speedily reached. It took the form of an undertaking to Austria by the Powers to recognise the annexation of Bosnia and the presentation to Servia of a Note for submission to Austria. Servia, of course, was compelled to accept the Powers' advice, and the Note drafted by them was, equally of course, pronounced thoroughly satisfactory by Austria. By its terms Servia acknowledges that the fait accompli in Bosnia did not affect her rights, and promises to abandon her hostile attitude, to change her policy, and to reduce her armaments to a peace footing. It will be seen that Austria has been completely victorious, and secured everything she wanted. Some French papers and the anti-German papers in England declare that Russia gave way before the threat of a German attack. There is no evidence of this, and it has been semi-officially denied in Germany. Russia doubtless gave way because she found that Austria was determined to hold her ground, while she herself was unwilling to make any sacrifices for Servia, and had already cut the ground from under her feet by recognising King Ferdinand.

* * *

Sir William White, one of the ablest naval constructors of our times, has an instructive and very reassuring article in the "Nineteenth Century and After" on the naval situation. We set out his main conclusions:—

(1) That now and for some years to come the main strength of the Navy will consist, not in "Dreadnoughts," but in pre-"Dreadnought" vessels.

(2) That Mr. McKenna's statements as to German acceleration were not a "fact" as regards two of the ships, and not "a new fact" as regards the other two.

(3) That the so-called secrecy of the German Admiralty was brought about by the secrecy of our own.

(4) That it is not wise, until we know more about "Dreadnoughts," to go on building them "on an increasing scale of size and cost."

(5) That this country has still a distinct superiority over Germany in the manufacture of materials for war vessels, and that Mr. Lee's statements on this point are not credible.

(6) That Mr. McKenna underestimated the number of slips in this country capable of receiving "Dreadnoughts."

(7) That the method of laying down a great number of ships simultaneously is useless as a device for stopping German competition.

(8) That there is no justification for the scare, and that our naval supremacy will be in no danger three years hence.

We hope that Sir William White's article will be read by those whom it closely concerns. They, we are afraid we must add, include most of our leading statesmen.

* * *

The House of Commons passed the second reading of the Indian Councils Bill on Thursday without a dissentient voice, Mr. Asquith contributing a stout and powerful defence of the Bill, and Mr. Balfour solemnly washing his hands of it. The clause excised by the Lords is to be restored. The Prime Minister strongly defended the appointment of Mr. Sinha to be a member of the Viceroy's Executive Council, on the ground that, if on personal grounds the choice was thoroughly fit, race could not, under the King's Proclamation, act as a disqualification. It is clear, in view of Mr. Balfour's attitude, that the Bill will now pass intact through the Lords—a great triumph for Lord Morley.

* * *

Mr. Birrell moved the Second Reading of the revived Irish Land Bill on Tuesday, and on Wednesday Mr. Campbell's proposal to reject it was defeated by 275 to 102. It will be carried to a Committee of the whole House, not to a Grand Committee. The debate showed the terrible extent of Mr. Wyndham's miscalculation of the cost of buying out the Irish landlords. The cost will not be a hundred millions, but 204 millions, and the bonus to the Irish landlords will be not twelve millions, but seventeen millions, while the taxpayer will have to pay twenty-seven millions for discount. No wonder that the "Freeman's Journal" says: "The adventurers of Cromwell and the followers of William received no such rewards as Mr. Wyndham achieved by his legerdemain for their descendants." Mr. Birrell's proposed amendment of the Treasury's plan of cutting down the bonus from twelve to three per cent. is to add three millions to the total, and to pay it out under a scale proportionate to the price of the land. Landlords will be able to get payment partly in cash and partly in stock at 92. The House of Lords will do well to accept this for its Irish friends. They will never get such terms again.

* * *

Mr. Raphael's plucky fight in Croydon against the cry of "Eight 'Dreadnoughts'—won't wait," was unsuccessful, but he slightly increased the good Liberal poll of 1906, securing 8,041 votes, against Sir R. Hermon-Hodge's 11,989. Mr. Smith's tactless and pointless Labor candidature was almost ignored by the electors, who only gave him 836 votes. This is a direct intimation of the obvious fact that in times of Tory reaction Labor shares and does not gain by Liberal losses.

* * *

The trading community has been very much alarmed by the terms of the Bill which amalgamates the G.N., G.C., and G.E. Railways. We do not suppose the Board of Trade likes it. Mr. Churchill would probably have preferred to introduce a railway nationalisation Bill, and in his speech on Wednesday he hinted significantly that such groupings paved the way and proved the case for "much more extensive groupings." But we doubt whether traders and passengers, remembering the fatal case of the Chatham and S.E. amalgamation, will accept the Board of Trade clauses as adequate. These provide for the calculation of rates on the three railways as if they were one railway, protect existing facilities for passengers and merchandise in transit, and forbid the joint companies to dismiss any of their servants within three years of the passage of the Bill in consequence of economies in management. But the Government have not thought it wise to put their Whips on to the division, and Mr. Mond, in a brilliant speech, declared the fear and horror of the traders at this tremendous combine—a prelude to a huge railway monopoly. It looks as if the democratic House would reject the Bill, which practically annuls competition, the condition on which all the great railway companies have got their powers.

Politics and Affairs.

THE BANKRUPTCY OF STATESMANSHIP.

In an able and exceedingly grave speech in defence of the Government on Monday night, Sir Edward Grey asserted the failure of European statesmanship. Half the national revenue of the great countries of Europe is, he tells us, being spent on preparations to kill each other. The expenditure has grown, is growing, and will grow. "Not in our generation, perhaps, but if it goes on at the rate at which it has recently increased, sooner or later I believe it will submerge civilisation." Already it is a standing menace to public credit, and if it goes on unchecked, it must lead to national bankruptcy. The best men in all countries are desirous of checking it, but no country will, or, according to Sir Edward Grey, can, lead the way. To do so is to court slavery. "If we fall into a position of inferiority, our self-respect is gone." We must be able to repel force by force, or we shall cease to count for anything among nations, and in the end shall be fortunate if "we do not become the conscript appendage of some great Power." Thus, in language which might be deemed sensational if it came from a journalist seeking to depict the evils of militarism, does Sir Edward Grey paint for us the international situation. Here are from three to four hundred millions of men, organised in different nations. All are progressing rapidly in the arts of peace. On all sides material comfort is extending, and within each State with few exceptions the hundred years that have passed since the Revolutionary wars have seen important steps in the direction of social progress. Education spreads, the principles of freedom and social justice are slowly but surely making their way. Violence diminishes, public health rapidly improves, and within the borders of each State a better order is maintained. Doubtless grave problems remain, and what has been done is but a fraction of that which remains to do. Nevertheless, if each State of Europe, with perhaps the single exception of Russia, were left henceforward to work out its own salvation unhindered, there would be no reason to fear the result.

It is when we turn from the progress of internal order to international relations that the whole prospect undergoes a change. For the thirty-eight years since the siege of Paris the great Powers have been at peace. In the ninety-four years since Waterloo wars among them have been exceedingly rare as compared with those of any former period since their rise into great States of the modern type. But though war becomes less, the dread of war becomes keener, the rumors of war thicker, the preparations for war daily greater. They absorb a larger proportion of the national resources; in rich countries they skim off all that surplus of wealth that might go to education and to the direct relief of poverty; in poor countries they inflict a crushing burden on the people; in all the interest which they excite, the panics and rumors to which they give rise, repeatedly distract attention from peaceful progress, and offer a useful weapon to unscrupulous politicians.

What is the cause of this violent contrast between the internal progress of each nation and international retrogression? Are we to sit down helplessly before it, to watch the progress of the armed peace rolling in its inevitable course towards general bankruptcy or internecine war? Can we believe that a situation so poignant in its contrasts is founded on permanent realities? May we not rather be sure that, in so vast a system of mutual fear, there is an element of the illusory and the unreal, and can we suppose that the conscience and the common sense of mankind are so permanently enfeebled that they cannot get below this web of Maya to the solid realities? To begin with, as a matter of fact, we can trace, with some clearness, the causes of the trouble. We know the effect of Bismarck and his demonstration to Europe that, in international relations, force and fraud, if thorough-going enough, could be carried through to the culmination of a brilliant political success. The triumph of Bismarck, unpunished by any apparent retribution, sowed the seeds of mutual suspicion, and they fell on the fertile ground of minds prepared to believe in the value of force by the universal acceptance of the conception of the struggle for existence as the law of life.

But behind these apparent forces, lay social conditions on which still more depended. The educated classes, coinciding too closely with those who own property and have a material stake in the established order, found themselves menaced by the newer ideals of social justice and internal progress. They were glad to accept new weapons of defence, intellectual and social. They were not averse from emphasising the value of force, of race, of aristocracy, of military discipline, of all that maintains a set of exclusive social hierarchies and may serve as a bulwark against democracy and internationalism. Their attitude constituted an atmosphere in which ideals of militarism and "real-politics" could flourish. The ground was thus made ready for those whose interest in militarism and in military preparations is no sentiment, no piece of misplaced idealism, but a matter of pure business, whether they are contractors or workmen employed on shipbuilding or in gun foundries, or whether they are concession-hunters in every part of the globe to which the mission of civilisation is being carried. Sometimes it is one, sometimes another, but there are always men who have an interest in war or in preparations for war, and they have permanent allies in those whose interest is rather in rumors of war; that is to say, in the Press which finds "Eight 'Dreadnoughts'" as good a cry as a first-class murder. Between them all, the contractor with his experts, the Press with its headlines, ably seconded by its congeners over the water, the mob—of all classes—with its mouth gaping for a sensation to distract the half-hour in train and tram-car, they have the country for the moment in their hands. Only a strong man who bears in mind that if he holds on for a week or two, all this froth will be bubbling round some other excitement point, can stand against them. Lastly, in every country there are the same or similar elements, and they call to one another across land and sea.

Such is the disease. In itself it is not deadly, given the doctor with courage to apply the remedy. Such remedy must consist in essentials in appealing to the permanent moral forces, the reason and good sense of humanity. Such forces are never extinct, and, as all that we have said of domestic progress shows, they are on the whole stronger and more active in our time than in most earlier phases of history. Taking the modern world through, say from the 17th century onwards, it reveals a progress not continuous, not rapid, but on the whole clear beyond doubt, massive and fundamental in the rational control of life. Is it to be believed that in the end it will fail at this obstacle, this barrier of national distrust, which is three-fourths compounded of mere air-bubbles of sensation, suspicion, and sheer lies? In the end it will not fail, but its success is to be won by trusting not only to the diffused good sense and upright feeling of individuals, but to their organised expression. Sir Edward Grey shows that the modern statesmen have failed. Well, they did not always fail. There were those who made a real impression on the Europe of their day, and who by mere force of personality raised the standard of nations. As long as Gladstone lived it was felt throughout the world that in every crisis there was one voice that would be raised for the righteousness which in international relations is the sole alternative to force and fear. Gladstone could make his protest not only because he was a man of great powers—powers which it is not in men to command—but far more because he had a trust, which is not beyond the capacity of contemporary statesmen. He trusted the British people, and among them above all he trusted British Liberalism to respond to his call, and he was rarely deceived and never wholly disappointed.

While Gladstone lived the great Liberal Party of this country was an organised expression of the moral force which alone can break through the meshes of militarist delusion. On his departure from politics the organisation crumbled, and the way was made straight for Imperialism. Yet the bulk of Liberals quickly learned their lesson, and from the moment when Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman boldly challenged the policy and the methods of the South African War, his supremacy, and the renewed vitality of the party, were alike assured. For Liberalism lives by moral force, by humanitarian feeling, and by the bracing tonic of the conflict. When its own leaders call in the enemy to suppress the more ardent of their followers, what chance has such a party of presenting a solid front? But of one thing we may be sure. There exists in the Liberal Party of to-day, and in the ranks of organised labor all the world over, latent but real, the same feeling for peace and the things that make for peace, the same readiness to respond to guidance in the paths of international sanity, to weather the storms of the Press and the pavement, the same willingness to maintain, and the same capacity to carry through to success, the old battle against international hatred as the main obstacle to domestic progress. The forces are there. They need only the inspiring voice and the guiding hand.

THE FIGHT FOR THE BALANCE OF POWER.

The Balkan crisis is apparently at an end, and after six months of unrest and alarm the peasants who were called to the colors, wondering why there should be war, are trooping back to their villages wondering as helplessly why there has been no war. There will be marriages and betrothals instead of funerals, and if incidentally "the balance of power" is altered, and a disreputable Servian Prince is made to shake upon his throne, no real human interest will suffer much thereby. Indeed, when one surveys the long risky entanglement, which for half a year has agitated a continent, it is hard to realise that any real human interest ever was at stake. When Austria tore up the Berlin Treaty to annex Bosnia and Herzegovina there was, to our thinking, only one vital interest concerned, and that has not even been considered. Bosnia means to our minds the two millions of men and women who inhabit it and till its fields. Theirs was the only opinion which seriously mattered, and theirs was the only opinion which was never sought. All through the crisis they sat gagged and silent, producing from time to time those eloquent newspapers with the blank censored spaces for which editors are "doing time" in Austrian gaols. If any Power had dared to suggest that the annexation must be undone, if any Power had proposed that the Bosnians should be empowered to decide their own fate by a plébiscite, if even, failing these heroic courses, guarantees had been asked for the establishment in these provinces of elementary civil rights, one would have felt that the crisis with all its risks was morally justifiable

But the annexation was never for a moment in question. The theory of sovereignty on which all the Powers reasoned was a pedantic and anti-popular doctrine. Bosnia was for them simply an estate of which the Sultan of Turkey was the titular landlord, while the Emperor of Austria was a lessee who had gradually acquired proprietary rights by long possession and costly "improvements," consisting mainly in barracks, military roads, and strategic railways. Queen Victoria, arguing against her Whig Ministers in 1848, declared that it would be a disaster for all time to come if populations were allowed by their own free will to transfer their allegiance from one sovereign to another. That "disaster" is unthinkable to-day; our Whigs have abandoned their fathers' thesis. The only rights seriously considered were the paper rights which the Sultan of Turkey possessed over an alien race which thirty years ago had revolted against his misrule. These rights were assessed at two millions sterling, and the Bosnians sold at twenty shillings a head. For the rest Servia has been forced by the Powers to declare that she "abandons her attitude of protest and opposition" to an annexation which the Powers themselves have declared to be a violation of public right, and compelled to disarm, while Austria maintains her armaments on the common frontier. That any principle has been established, save the right of the stronger and an anti-popular theory of sovereignty, no one can maintain. We are glad that the Young Turks managed to levy a fine upon the aggressor, and it is salutary that the offending Power has paid heavily for its enterprise. Peace, after all, has been maintained at some cost to principles, and the credit for that achievement must be divided between Sir Edward Grey, who drafted the Servian renunciation, and Prince Bülow, who coerced Russia. The climax makes a pitiable end to a crisis which began with a bold declaration of this country's intention to vindicate the sanctity of treaties.

This conflict between bad law and good armaments has established only one indisputable fact—the distressing weakness of Russia. It is still rather uncertain what argument it was which brought about M. Isvolsky's sudden surrender to German pressure last week. A Russian paper has talked of German mobilisations on the frontier, for which there is no other evidence. The "Times" on Wednesday, eager, as usual now, to make bad blood with Germany where, in all conscience, enough is flowing, referred to an "ultimatum" of which it gave no particulars. The "Temps" declares that the decisive fact was a letter from the Kaiser to the Tsar. In one form or another German pressure was used. It is also generally understood that M. Isvolsky at a few hours' notice accepted the annexation of Bosnia, without so much as consulting the two Powers which were acting with him. He abandoned the Servians to their fate; he also deserted his ally and his friend. It is true that Russia is quite unable to face a German army, but such precipitancy argues something worse than weakness. It suggests disloyalty, insincerity, and divided counsels. Throughout the crisis M. Isvolsky was in contradiction with himself, and he was also in contradiction with his colleagues in the Foreign Office and with the Court. Some weeks before the annexation took place he assured Baron von Aerenthal at Buchlau that he would not regard it as a casus belli. But he did not share his foreknowledge either with London or with Paris. His first instinct was to claim compensation for Russia in the Dardanelles. The Pan-Slavist pose was a later phase, imposed on him by others. From those others the Servians must also have derived the disastrous conviction that if they were attacked Russia would fight. In the last phase of all—that of surrender to Germany—it must have been the Court, always sensitive to influences from Berlin, which asserted itself—precisely as it was the Court which recognised Prince Ferdinand as a minor Tsar, also without consulting London and Paris. Russia has been throughout the weak and divided anarchy which she is both at home and abroad. Her Court and her Ministry are agreed neither when they are slaughtering Jews, nor when they are aiding the Persian Shah, nor when they are running in harness with civilised Powers. Sir Edward Grey aimed at restoring Russia to her place as a Great Power. He has discovered that she has neither an army, nor a treasury, nor a diplomatist. Nor will she have any one of these things until she has first set her own house in order. It takes more than a royal visit to make a Great Power.

The European situation which emerges from this struggle has none of the elements of stability. Our influence is still strong at Constantinople, though it is not what it was before the fall of Kiamil Pasha, when British official opinion almost declared war on the Committee of Union and Progress. Bulgaria has returned from her Austrian flirtation to her traditional Russian allegiance. Servia has been taught the folly of leaning on Russia, and must now accept the brutal fact of Austrian supremacy. The larger aspects of the question are more doubtful. The central fact is the affirmation of the solidity of the Austrian-German Alliance—to speak of a Triple Alliance is hardly accurate, for Italy stands aloof, weak but suspicious. France is manifestly on better terms with her powerful neighbor than at any moment since 1903. The Moroccan question is, happily, settled. Prince Bülow is all suavity, and there are even rumors of a meeting between the Kaiser and President Fallières. Of Russia's attitude it is premature to speak. People and Press are ashamed and indignant, and only confirmed in their traditional dislike to Germany. But the bureaucracy is no more obliged to follow public opinion in its foreign than in its domestic policy. Subjects who may be exiled and hanged without trial may also be disregarded. M. Stolypin has never forgotten that the friendship of Germany is necessary for the coercion of Poland. The Tsar leans, naturally, to the only other European monarch who claims to rule by right divine. The probability is that Russian diplomacy has returned to its opportunist courses. From France it will take what she can give—loans. From us it will take what we can give—Persia. From Germany it will accept what she alone can bestow—peace. And the last of these gifts is the chief.

The total result will be to bring Germany much nearer than she has been, since we entered into Continental combinations, to the position of an arbiter. Two things Sir Edward Grey has declared to be intolerable, that we should isolate her, and that she should isolate us. But what does isolation mean? Germany felt herself isolated when we improved our relations with France and Russia. Should we feel ouselves isolated if she, in her turn, were to improve her relations with them? In this incessant struggle to achieve a balance of power there can be no finality. Each crisis leaves a new bitterness behind it, and each registers its influence on the progression of European armaments. It was, we were told, the weakness of Russia which disturbed the balance and forced us to intervene. That weakness is proved to be permanent; must our intervention be yet more strenuous? Sir Edward Grey has appealed to the traditional policy of Britain in resisting the attempt of any single Power to obtain a supremacy on the Continent. Has civilisation then learned no lesson since the days of Marlborough? It is an impossible rôle which we have set ourselves. Neither sea power nor a long purse can weigh in the Continental balance against the compact weight of the two German armies. Blenheim was fought before the days of conscript armies, and the "Observer," which pointed out that for this game a conscript force is necessary, was perfectly logical. Not all the "Dreadnoughts" in Mr. Balfour's programme would have enabled us to protect Russia against the ultimatum which she is said to have received. Our policy has outrun our armaments. If we aspire to play the part of a Continental Power, we must have a Continental army. From that conclusion

Mr. Balfour would recoil no less than Sir Edward Grey. This foreign policy of the balance of the power must be abandoned, if Liberalism is to maintain its opposition to the acquisition of the instruments which are necessary to its success.

THE AIM OF GERMAN ARMAMENTS.

> "An England pacific, Gladstonian, free trading, relying upon voluntary service for her armed force—such an England may have as large a fleet as she pleases without exciting any alarm. But an England that is aggressive, Protectionist, armed to the teeth by conscription, is another proposition altogether. Against the latter England we must, in self-defence, push on our naval forces with the utmost rapidity."—"Michel," on "The German Naval Case," in the "Contemporary Review."

We are afraid that the British public does not realise how gravely the words and acts of the last fortnight have influenced for evil the future relationships between this country and the German Empire. Those relationships have for long been discussed as if they were a mere problem in mathematics or in naval construction, or, as a paper which calls, and doubtless imagines itself, Liberal remarks, a matter of pure "science," to which "democracy," its ideas and mental habits, must "give place." No shallower or falser calculation could be made. The problem is a human, not a material one. Germans, strange as it may appear, can feel, and resent, and suspect, and fear, much as we do. The number of German "Dreadnoughts" does not depend, as Sir Edward Grey truly said, merely on the number of English "Dreadnoughts"; it depends, in a large degree, on the view which their statesmen take of the tendencies of our foreign and domestic politics, the developing character of our people and statesmen, and the use that they are likely to make of the enormous material forces they control. An England in which the Maxses and Harmsworths are forces of any account may seem right to its own special world; to the German observer of the Jameson Raid, of the South African War, and of the Chamberlain-Balfour coalition it appears, in the words of the writer we have already quoted, "the old grey wolf of the Northern seas," "ruthless and hungry as in the days of the Vikings." Is that a caricature? To the average right-thinking Englishman or Scotchman it is. But not to the German reader of Mr. Lee's and Mr. Balfour's speeches, of the "Observer," or of the article in last week's "Spectator," which, while it calls upon the nation to prepare for war "on the largest scale," plumes itself on the national grace that makes us shrink from an immediate attack on the German fleet while it is still comparatively weak. It is in such utterances, and the thoughts and passions that lie behind them, that the measure of German preparations must be sought. When Sir Edward Grey records with astonishment the German theory of a sudden British descent on their coasts and ports and their now widespread mercantile marine, he forgets that the fears that dictate such plays as "An Englishman's Home" are daily borne, with far greater force, to millions of owners of German homes.

This is not an academic matter; it is a vital point of practical politics. The Government have set up a contingent programme of shipbuilding—a programme whose execution clearly depends on whether the German programme is to be accelerated or not. It is of the highest importance to the country to spare it the cost of hurrying forward these four "conditional" "Dreadnoughts." Hitherto Germany has been most explicit, most lavish, in her assurances on points of fact. She has declared that her programme is open to the world, that so far as the dates of completion are concerned, there has not been and cannot be any such acceleration as Mr. McKenna suggested. These declarations, if the Government and the country would only see it, are at least consistent with her naval policy. Germany wants a strong fleet. Why? The preamble of the Navy Bill states the reason with sufficient frankness. "Germany," it says, "must have a fleet of such strength that even for the mightiest naval power a war with her would involve such risks as to jeopardise its own security." In a word, she is afraid of us, and she wishes to be strong enough on the seas to make us pause once and twice before we attack her or use a powerful diplomatic screw against her. She admits one aim—a powerful checking force. She denies another aim—the only one which need concern us—that of upsetting our naval supremacy. The end that she avows is at least in harmony with the balance of "Dreadnoughts" which she says she will secure in 1912—11 and later 13, to our 18 or 22. But if she counts all the unfavorable British factors—the Government's cold scepticism, the unmeasured anti-Germanism of the Tories and their leader, the cries for a crushing programme of "Dreadnoughts"—we cannot be surprised if she hurries and conceals, and conceals and hurries. She does not know our party politics as we do. She does not realise that the statesman who betrayed Free Trade while he still believed in it, is equally capable of making a passionate party cry of national defence for the mean end of winning a by-election and the selfish end of getting back to power. Foreign nations take unprincipled party manœuvres for more than they mean; and we confess that when Germany surveys the mass of lies, abuse, suspicion, exaggeration, and flat discourtesy that make up three-fifths of British opinion about her, she has at least a superficial cause to fear and beware.

Let us turn, therefore, to Sir Edward Grey's speech, and see what chance of amelioration lies in it. Its tone is admirable, in every way a contrast to Mr. Balfour's. But we will say at once that we wish that our statesmen would do Germany the common justice of supposing that she does not say black when she means white. We are getting rid of some of the misconceptions. We no longer talk of two years as the term of German shipbuilding. We no longer affirm that her general building capacity is equal to ours. The fable of twenty-one "Dreadnoughts" in the spring of 1912 is gone, that of seventeen "Dreadnoughts" is going. Ministers do not talk as if the contest in naval power were a mere affair of "Dreadnoughts," and calmly overlook our fleet of forty pre-"Dreadnoughts." But why, when the Germans say that they can only have thirteen "Dreadnoughts" by 1912, and prove that, if anything, they are well behind time with their ships, does Sir Edward Grey inform us that he accepts this statement merely as proving that they will not have thirteen in 1910? And why, when Admiral von Tirpitz expressly states that Germany's building period of thirty-six to forty months is exclusive of a further period for trials, does Sir Edward insist that it must be inclusive of them? Cannot we even take a simple statement of detailed fact as if it possessed an element of truth? Our statesmen must recognise that, on this basis of distrust, no chance of accommodation exists. Flying high or flying low, the anti-Germans always find a way of escape. Repulsed on 1911 and 1912, they have recourse to 1913 and 1914. If the Germans are not advancing whole ships, they are advancing gun-mountings. If we can meet them on the present scale of "Dreadnoughts," they will yet beat us by building still bigger and stronger ones.

We hope that our statesmen will now quit these nightmare calculations, and looking not to what is base or foolish in our surface politics, but to their own wiser thoughts, and to the deep needs of the two peoples, betake themselves to the ground of reason. Sir Edward Grey detailed, with his usual care and moderation of style, the several hopes of an agreement with Germany on naval matters. A superficial view of his speech might incline men to say that he had rejected them all. There cannot, he says, be a general naval agreement on respective strengths, because Germany could not meet us on the only basis we can accept—namely, a permanently superior navy. Secondly, the Government had had no "whisper" from Germany that an arrangement might be arrived at on the basis of a British change of view on the question of the capture of private property at sea. Thirdly, German suspicions stood in the way of a mutual exchange of information as to programmes. This seems forbidding, but we observe with satisfaction that the reference to the capture of private property, unlike most of the speech, has been well received in Germany, and is interpreted as a possible hint of a change of British policy. We think this interpretation not improbable. Our authorities are undoubtedly shaken in their earlier opinions on this question, and it is impossible to say that if Great Britain's vote at the second Hague Conference were reversed, Germany's view of the whole naval problem as between the two countries would remain the same. At least, we are bound to test this point. Hitherto we have made this great amelioration of naval war impossible, and we cannot be sure that Germany will shake her head over a proposition that we have never made to her. As to the exchange of programmes, Germany has been extremely frank with us during the last few weeks, and we have not been backward with her. It is surely incumbent upon us to aim at realising the unanimous vœu of the Hague Conference. Had such an arrangement been made, the alarms of the last few weeks might have been spared. It is in this direction that Sir Edward Grey is called on to act equally in the spirit of Liberalism and of his own plain and most solemn responsibility to his country, and to the cause of peace and civilisation. That duty he cannot evade, cannot ignore. Negative talk behind massed and ever-increasing squadrons of "Dreadnoughts" will not do. Liberal statesmanship, Liberal policy, Liberal feeling, Liberal hopes for the world, cannot live upon it; and if this is all the Government have to offer us, everything that is sound and strong in the party will turn to richer sources of inspiration.

TRADE BOARDS AND SWEATING.

The introduction of Mr. Churchill's Trade Boards Bill last week, and the debate which followed two days after upon the Sweating Industries Bill, are of historical importance, as indicating that all parties in the State are committed to the principle and policy of a legal minimum wage to be measured and enforced by public authority. It is true that both proposals are limited in immediate scope and tentative in application, and, in view of the delicacy of the task which they essay, such moderation is felt to be befitting. But Mr. Churchill's Bill contains, in embryo, the boldest and most far-reaching of all the social reforms which separate modern constructive Liberalism from the older policy that bore that name. Based on a plain public recognition of the utter failure of the competitive wage system in low-skilled unorganised trades, it empowers the Board of Trade to organise these trades on a representative basis, and to endow these organisations with power to secure rates of pay for workers which are fixed by considerations of human needs. The trades selected for the first experiment are notorious sweating trades, the ready-made and wholesale bespoke tailoring, cardboard boxes, machine-made lace and net-finishing, and the ready-made blouse industry. A very large part of such work is done at home or in small workshops, and most of the victims of such sweating are women: the rates of pay and the conditions of work vary enormously with firms, localities, and classes of employers; employment is, in most instances, irregular, many of the trades fluctuating with season and fashion.

These conditions make it evident that the task Mr. Churchill is essaying is one of uncommon difficulty, and it is no matter of surprise that, even in the ranks of labor, there are a few, like Mr. J. R. Macdonald, who repudiate action by Wage Boards as impracticable. But while it may be true that Australasian experiments, successful during a period of advancing trade development, furnish no sufficient warrant for sanguine expectations here under conditions of depression, they cannot properly be used to deter us from all direct attacks upon our parasitic industries. For the principle invoked by the present measure is not the supersession of private bargaining throughout the industrial system by State arbitration, but the necessity of stamping out certain pestilential practices injurious to sections of our working population and to the body politic.

Mr. Churchill's measure has been subjected to considerable criticism by some friends of Wage Boards who find it too timid and too dilatory for their taste. The wage rates are at first only to be obligatory upon public contractors, who are to be used to entice "good employers" to come under the standard rate, though after six months the rate may be made obligatory upon all the trades, if the Board of Trade, "having regard to the general opinion of the trade and to the other circumstances of the case," think it expedient. Labor men not unnaturally kick against this "permissive" character, which, as they rightly urge, has proved exceedingly obstructive in many cases of industrial legislation. And if the measure were intended to be confined to the particular trades scheduled in the Bill, we should endorse this criticism. But it must be remembered that the Board of Trade is empowered to apply the provisions of the Bill to an indefinite number of unspecified trades. If effective, it is intended to extend its operation to a great variety of industries. Now, if it must be made at once obligatory upon the whole of every trade to which it is applied, ordinary motives of caution are likely to restrict its application far more narrowly than would be the case under its present permissive character. There will be some trades the uncertain state of which renders it most desirable that Governmental interference should go slow, proceeding as far as possible by persuasion and inducement rather than by sudden force. The advisability of this discretion rests upon the complexity of the economic reactions which such public fixing of wages involves. It will be found that the legal minimum will operate very differently in different trades. In some cases, enforced throughout the trade, it will simply bring up the worse employers to the level of the better ones, the higher wage bill coming, partly out of the increased productivity of labor, partly out of the sweating profits. In other cases a higher price for the goods can be got from the consumer without any considerable shrinkage of the market.

But there will remain some cases where the sudden application of compulsion throughout the trade will mean either the abolition of out-work in favor of the factory or the disappearance of the trade from this country. Now, either of these consummations may be most desirable, for it is the fundamental assumption of this legislation that a sweating trade is a source, not of wealth, but of "illth" to the nation. If a trade cannot afford to pay a standard wage, we should not desire to retain it in the country. But the adoption of this position does not warrant us in preferring sudden blows to persistent pressure. Until our other schemes of social reform, in particular our unemployed policy, are sufficiently advanced to furnish a sure and adequate support to workers displaced from sweating trades, it would be most undesirable to deprive the Government of the option of proceeding slowly where there is danger of a sudden wholesale operation thrusting into deeper misery the very victims whom it seeks to rescue. For these reasons we are disposed to retain the permissive character of the measure until experience has shown how far and how fast it can be applied with safety, and until our housing, unemployed, Poor Law, and other remedial measures are brought into organic relation with this wage law. For similar reasons we feel disposed to defend the central control by the Board of Trade, which is also made the object of attack by certain critics of the Bill. Local administration, though perhaps more energetic, would involve greater risks: disturbed in one district, a sweating trade would seek another hiding-place where administration was more lax, while the reactions of one process on another, one trade upon another, are so important and so intricate that the supervision and control of a single trade authority should be recognised as essential. How far such central control can be made consistent with elasticity of local administration is matter for experiment. Both are necessary to any real succcess in enforcing wage rates and other minimum conditions; but we are convinced that any weakness of the central authority would soon discredit the whole course of anti-sweating legislation.

On one other point we would say a word, viz., the contention of Tariff Reformers that, because we prohibit sweating here we should exclude the alleged products of a foreign sweating system. Why should we do so? If we do our best to ensure that all the work done in our country conforms to a reasonable standard of wages and other industrial conditions, why should we attempt to do the same for Holland or Germany? The obligation to protect their country from this industrial degradation rests with them, not with us, for they alone can make the requisite inquiries, they alone are able to apply the remedies. We do not possess the means of ascertaining the facts about "sweated goods" in other countries, nor, if we did, have we the power to interfere effectively. The claim that we should prohibit imports which we may believe to be produced under sweating conditions, because we have stopped their manufacture here, is simply one more instance of the muddle-headedness which proceeds from tariff-mongering.

---

[We are obliged to hold over till next week our article on the highly important conclusions embodied in "The Declaration of London."]

---

Life and Letters.

IN PERIL OF ITS LIFE.

"Roll up the map of Europe"—so ran the most famous of historic declarations. "It will not be needed for a generation." "Roll up the map of Social Progress" is the command from whatever malign spirit broods over Europe a century afterwards, "and for an indefinite future concentrate your energies upon the apparatus of war." Nothing new to the student of present affairs has been revealed by the debates and alarms of the past fortnight. That competition in armaments is spreading from the land to the sea, that the nations of Europe are confronting each other across frontiers mined with explosives and bristling with bayonets, that one half the national expenditure of all the peoples is devoted to the apparatus of destruction, that a whole civilisation, subtle and cunning in invention, is moving along the pathways of Fear and Hatred towards bankruptcy or some cosmic catastrophe—these are facts which the prophets of modern days have emphasised with mournful iteration. But they are facts specially brought home in such moments as the present, when one particular people is compelled to take stock of its own position. In each human life the individual is running a losing race with death. Sooner or later will come an end of the struggle which each day brings nearer. But, for the most part, he pursues his business undisturbed, thinking that he will endure for ever. Only occasionally—in the loss of a friend, through the warning of disease, by some arresting accident—he is brought sharply into contact with reality: into the sudden realisation of his hazardous and transitory condition. Something similar to this sharp contact with reality in the life of the individual has happened to-day in the life of the nation. We face a cross section of a race to ruin. Liberal statesmen, heirs of Gladstone, and Cobden, and Bright, can but proclaim melancholy forebodings and warnings of disaster, such as those which this week in the British House of Commons, a Liberal Foreign Secretary has proclaimed to an attentive Europe. All those unclean forces which flourish upon confusion and hatred rejoice in the triumph of their cause. The prospect of peace and good-will, and the effort towards making the life of the laboring populations something removed from an unintelligible struggle in the darkness against hunger and cold, vanish before the vision of the nations concentrating their energies and aims, with treasure wasted as water and all invention directed towards one end, the elaboration, for the destruction of their fellows, of more certain instruments of death.

The actual wealth expended is perhaps the least of the losses involved. Yet this wealth, in the main mulcted from the working peoples, is itself becoming an intolerable burden. Of all the necessary arts of government—education, social reform, adventure against disease, maintenance of public order, encouragement of industry and trade—one half the total amount extorted from the people with less or greater unfairness between class and class, is to-day devoted to military and naval armament. And the result—in Germany, in England, in Russia, even in that America which was to reveal a "new start" in the "progress of humanity"—is the exhibition of huge financial deficits, which the wealthy manage steadily to edge off on to the shoulders of the poor. What alternative were possible, if men, as in the romance of a modern novelist, were, through the advent of some kindly comet, suddenly to become sane and kindly and courageous? In these islands alone the liberation of sixty millions a year—now as completely wasted, for all humane and rational purposes, as if spilt in the gutters; a sum which it is scarcely too much to say, if wisely used, would effect almost the complete abolition of "poverty" as it exists to-day amongst those who inherit little or nothing of the advantage civilisation is supposed to bring. But beyond the actual waste of material resource there is the far more deplorable damage in the deflection of intelligence and the highest skill into the ingenuity of destructive weapons. "In the arts of life," is the boast of the Devil to Don Juan, "man invents nothing; but in the arts of death he outdoes Nature herself, and produces by chemistry and machinery all the slaughter of plague, pestilence, and famine." "In a battle two bodies of men shoot at one another with bullets and explosive shells until one body runs away, when the others chase the fugitives on horseback and cut them to pieces as they fly. And this, the chronicle concludes, shows the greatness and majesty of Empires and the littleness of the vanquished. Over such battles the people run about in the streets, yelling with delight, and egg their Governments on to spend hundreds of millions in the slaughter, while the strongest Ministers dare not spend an extra penny in the pound against the poverty and pestilence through which they daily walk." That "Devil" might find a special cause for merriment in the estimates of the British Government of last month—a decrease in the expenditure upon education, an increase of three millions upon armaments.

"So it has been from the beginning," the plain man may say with a shrug of the shoulders; "so will it be to the end." This is a misunderstanding of the situation. So has it never been from the beginning. Wars and rumors of wars have, indeed, scourged mankind since the dawn of history. But never, at least in European history, has there been exhibited the condition of the past thirty years, with—in practice—every male citizen a soldier, and no limit possible or conceivable to the multiplication of the instruments of war. From big ship to bigger ship, from gun of two miles to gun of ten miles range, from battle on land to battle on sea, from the surface to underground, soon from war in the ocean to war in the air, the process is never backward or stationary. It is always advancing to more complex, more costly, and more universal absorption in armaments. Where is it all going to end? Or, if it is to have no end, but to be prolonged as a kind of indefinite nightmare, who is to estimate the cost, upon each successive generation, in a burden ever increasing in weight, laid upon nations already troubled by a social discontent which they can neither appease nor forget? And all on such a thin plank of security together, at best like shipwrecked mariners floating on an uncharted sea, the prey to inimical or indifferent natural forces, an earthquake which in five seconds will make an end of a hundred thousand, pestilence, famine, gaunt poverty, an uncertain future, death so speedily coming to each, to make an end (for him) of all labor and delight under the sun.

The Governments and the Governing Classes have failed. That is the lesson of the present controversy. Some speak to-day in more amicable, others in more truculent accents. The decent, bewildered peasant and artisan populations look on, helpless, while those who stand for their interests glare and gibber at each other across artificial frontiers, encourage the "martial spirit," crimp and conscript them into enormous armies, suck out the fruits of their hard labor to pay for floating islands and sea monsters of destruction. "We can scarcely hesitate to conclude universally," declared Godwin, "that law is an institution of the most pernicious tendency." The East still prays for delivery from pestilence, robbery—and Government. And the East which, until now, had let the thundering legions pass, in an indifference to things so irrelevant in life, so limited and austere, may—in any final estimate—have given at least a forecast of a way of escape. "Ces diables de rois," said Panurge of the "Roi Anarché," "ne sçavent ny ne valent rien, sinon à faire des maulx es pauvres subjectz, et à troubler tout le monde par guerre pour leur inique et détestable plaisir." It would be interesting—and humiliating—to read those pages of history, written as to-day the history of declining Rome is written, by a generation detached and impartial, telling the real, intelligent, human verdict upon twentieth century Europe. It will be the story of a civilisation in bondage to Governments and governing classes absorbed in their foolish diplomacies, the "game" that they play so assiduously and so clumsily, only revealing at times, as in the memoirs of a Hohenlohe or a Bismarck "with how little wisdom the world is governed." To-day, in the announcement made from every capital that Fear is master, and that this race to ruin must continue in blind senseless competition towards bankruptcy, the Governing Classes proclaim their impotence. Is there more hope from the "intellectuals": the classes which in early Victorian England stood most completely for the attainment of sanity in international friendliness and agreement? From these, it must be confessed to-day, least of all. The German "professors" outrival in truculence the intellectuals of our older Universities, and descend even to the platforms of the hated Socialists to plead for increase of Naval Armaments. The high priests of the new religion of humanity excel even the official heads of the Established Church in the appeal to panic fear. The lunacy of the halfpenny Press pales before that of the sixpenny review or the half-crown magazine. Commercial and financial interests perhaps present a bigger hope for the future. Prince Bülow struck a real blow for peace when he emphasised the tenacious web of trading connections which were binding England and Germany together: and although Commerce has not altogether fulfilled the high hopes expressed in such poems as those of the early Tennyson, undoubtedly it offers through the time of the present confusion the best guarantee that, though war is always "inevitable," war may never come.

But it is not only war, but the preparation for it which weighs to-day so heavily upon mankind; and against this preparation commerce is no protector. The "common people" alone would seem to be the real hope of averting this gigantic cataclysm. There is a sentiment and a determination growing up independent of Governments and in the heart of all Governments which will one day surely declare that this hideous progress must cease. Those who have nothing to gain from any conceivable conflict may be found, to the consternation of all who delight in war, to declare that wars shall cease: that the price paid for the pleasure of this entertainment is more than intelligent human life will continue to pay. In the "Solidarity of Labor" between nation and nation would seem to be bound up all the hope for the future of the world. It may mean revolt, denunciation, sacrifice, individuals in passive resistance, perhaps a "martyr" nation. It may only come from some renewal of a spiritual faith, a new vitality for a religion which in its older forms amongst the industrial peoples is dying or not yet born. "The cause of the wretched condition of the Christian nations," says Tolstoy, "is the absence of a supreme conception, common to them all, of the meaning of life, of faith, and of guidance for conduct resulting from faith." Il n' y a plus d'Europe is a cry which has been raised this week in face of a particular unpleasant diplomatic incident. Il n' y a plus d'Europe may be a permanent verdict upon a Europe fissuring ever deeper into vertical divisions between nation and nation and horizontal divisions between class and class. It is something if we can still strongly hope, in face of these staggering realities, that the common sentiment of the industrial peoples will come to arrest a progress before which the present governing classes acknowledge their helplessness. Else it may be, as in the old Norse vision, that only after the completion of the catastrophe in a final cosmic struggle between the blind, brutal forces, all destroying, and all at last destroyed, there can rise from "the twilight of the gods" the dawn of a new world.

---

A BOOK OF VERSES.

It is a land of misty estuaries, where the low tide exposes broad levels of shining mud. So far does the water intermingle with solid ground that the brown sails of slow-paced barges appear from a distance to be moving through hedgerows over cornfields and rough meadows. The plover and the sheldrake are swept across its windy lengths of heather and gorse. Indigo lines of fir close the horizon, or a wood of scraggy oaks is rooted where the clay soil has held the surface against the sand. A sloping field is something of an event, and so imperceptible is the course of streams that a river will hesitate twelve miles parallel to the coast line before it breaks the thin bank of pebbles, and at last enters a brown and cheerless sea, strewn with wreck and dead men's bones.

Up and down the country, ancient villages and small towns are scattered in impenetrable tranquillity, the comfortable red houses of doctor, lawyer, and parson abutting flush to the roadside, the squire's hall withdrawn up a drive and protected by a lodge. Here dwells a solid people, proverbially distinguished for heavy simplicity, but strictly following the precept that conduct is nine-tenths of life, and occupying their intelligence in discussing the observance of that precept among their friends. Habit and precept alike direct their lives along a safe routine, and, for art, you may hear a harmonium droning down the street the hymns of an American revival of thirty years ago. Search the world round and, outside the Arctic circles, you will not find a scene less like the land where the nightingale sings to the rose, and a ruby kindles in the vine.

Yet Edward FitzGerald was born in that country just a hundred years ago, and lived there almost without a break. He was, indeed, peculiarly at one with it. To outward appearance his own nature resembled one of those drowsy, slow-paced barges, and the course of his life passed with a scarcely perceptible motion, like a river that hesitates to reach the sea. George Crabbe, grandson of the Suffolk poet, describes him as "always like a grave, middle-aged man; never seeming very happy or light-hearted." His pleasures were of the simplest and most innocent kind. He sailed the heavy water in a heavy boat, accompanied by a longshore boatman, whose wits were far from light. He hated the gaiety and stir of town. "When I get back to Boulge," he wrote from London, "I shall recover my quietude, which is now all in a ripple." And, again, when he was little over thirty, he wrote to a correspondent in his own country:—

> "I hold communion with Suffolk through you. In this big London, all full of intellect and pleasure and business, I feel pleasure in dipping down into the country, and rubbing my hand over the dew upon the pastures, as it were. I know very few people here: and care for fewer: I believe I should like to live in a small house just outside a pleasant English town all the days of my life, making myself useful in a humble way, reading my books, and playing a rubber of whist at night."

The life he said he would like, that he received. At one time almost rich, and always well-off, he never had to work a single hour for his food. There was no stimulus of any kind to his existence, whether of love, hatred, pleasure, or ambition. Day succeeded day, like the cows following each other across his flat meadows for milking. He hardly ever stirred from home—sometimes to London, once to France, once to Ireland, and perhaps a time or two North. The well-known story goes that, on a journey to Scotland, seeing a train returning to Suffolk, he immediately returned in it himself.

> "London melts away all individuality into a common lump of cleverness," he wrote to Frederic Tennyson. "I am amazed at the humour and worth and noble feeling in the country, however much railways have mixed us up with metropolitan civilisation. I can still find the heart of England beating healthily down here, though no one will believe it."

Unchartered freedom appeared to tire him only at intervals. He spent much of his time in music; for he was an excellent musician, and pursued the study with something more than the languor of an amateur. In music he loved especially the great composers of classic form—Handel and the men whose limits were strict. In literature it was the same. Patient study and the incommunicable gift of nature made him an unerring critic. His letters—shamefully published as they are, without index or headlines—form a treasury of criticism, for those who have time to search through 500 pages for one passage. His reading, however copious, was always of the best, and he counted as masters only the solid and restrained writers, whose limits also were strict, and whose meaning unquestionable. Of most modern stuff he had a poor idea: even Shelley, he says, was too unsubstantial for him; and one of the saddest things in his letters is the inexorable solicitude with which he traces Tennyson's slow decline. For himself, he wrote very little in a long and unoccupied life—a few translations, a few classic imitations, not one of which is opened now, except by curious investigators. He early recognised in himself something torpid and indolent, something that could not be kindled by the creative breath. "I have been all my life apprentice," he wrote, "to this heavy business of idleness, and am not yet master of my craft." And when he was forty, writing to Professor Cowell, he says:—

> "Ten years ago I might have been vext to see you striding along in Sanscrit and Persian so fast; reading so much; remembering all; writing about it so well. But now I am glad to see any man do anything well; and I know that it is my vocation to stand and wait, and know within myself whether it is done well."

One might have taken him as the very type of the literary man, paralysed by a competency and infinite leisure. We find in him the shy and sensitive nature, the hesitation and infirmity of will. We find in him every literary quality but vanity. It was well said of him that he took more pains to avoid fame than others to seek it, and though he was on terms of intimate friendship with many of the greatest writers in his time, he never for a moment begrudged their renown, so long as they wrote well. Their gradual neglect of him was one of the saddest things in the story of a nature so affectionate that, on hearing the death of James Spedding, whom he had not seen for over twenty years, he wrote: "He lives, his old self, in my heart of hearts: and all I hear of him does but embellish the recollection of him, if it could be embellished." Thus endowed with every literary quality, except vanity, and further paralysed by "independent means" and even by his affectionate and unselfish admiration for his friends, he might have stood as the very model of the ineffectual scholar, too self-conscious, perhaps too critical, for any vocation but to stand and wait.

What made his drowsy and meditative inactivity almost tragic was that he himself was among the first to recognise the necessity of action for the best kind of writing. In that same letter to Professor Cowell he goes on to speak of Thucydides, how he fought in the war and then wrote the history of it:—

> "Fancy old Hallam," he adds, "sticking to his gun at a Martello tower! This was the way to write well; and this was the way to make literature respectable. Oh, Alfred Tennyson, could you but have the luck to be put to such employment!"

Two or three times again he returns to the same theme, as when, writing to Frederic Tennyson, he says:—

> "It is the cursed inactivity (very pleasant to me who am no hero) of this 19th century which has spoiled Alfred. I mean spoiled him for the great work he ought now to be entering upon."

That was in 1850, before FitzGerald himself entered upon the one great work which has given him fame in spite of himself, has caused the letters of one of our best letter-writers to be collected, and keeps alive the memory of a nature which all its simplicity, appreciative power, and unselfish affection would not have saved from the scholar's oblivion. How strange were the contradictions between the theme, the setting, and the poet! Except in hot-houses of the nobility and gentry, FitzGerald had never seen a vine. Except the Wicklow Hills, he had probably never seen anything fit to be called a mountain when he uttered the spirit of the land where mountains guide the caravans to the passes of the Hindu Khoosh. And as to the "Cypress-slender Minister of Wine"—well, he lived in a Suffolk village. It is strange to see the Persian spirit catching, as in a noose of light, the village spires of the Anglican Church, creeping like fire over foggy estuaries and banks of mud, kindling like the vine's ruby in fir and oak, calling to the tavern door to open, no matter what the licensing authority said, and crying with the seabird over those cold and brownish waves for answer to the inexplicable questionings of fate, while the wind blew the drizzling clouds low across the Heaven:—

> "Earth could not answer; nor the Seas that mourn
> In flowing Purple, of their Lord forlorn;
> Nor rolling Heaven, with all his Signs revealed
> And hidden by the sleeve of Night and Morn."

That East Anglian scene, those English villagers, that demure and meditative scholar, "always like a grave, middle-aged man, never seeming very happy or light-hearted," and, on the other side, the tent, the desert, the potter's wheel, the grape, the mighty Mahmud, the Moon of delight—seldom in literature has there been a contrast so striking, seldom so visible a proof of the soul's unexpected and incalculable powers. It is not that the Rubáiyát advocate a Bacchanal revelry or abandonment to easy pleasures. On the contrary, Fitzgerald was right in saying that they are saddest perhaps when most ostentatiously merry, and we doubt if even the middle-aged enthusiasts who sometimes almost weary us with the very name of Omar ever rose to the affectation of a frolic or drank more red wine at their club dinners than is customary in their domestic circles. The strange thing about the contrast is, not the hedonism of FitzGerald's version, but its beauty. It is the very triumph of thought inseparably united with expression—the perfect accomplishment of style. One has but to remember the first lines of those familiar stanzas and then realise what style can do: "The Moving Finger writes," "With Earth's first Clay they did the Last Man knead," "After a momentary silence spake," "Would but some wingéd Angel ere too late":—

> "Yet ah, that Spring should vanish with the Rose!
> That Youth's sweet-scented manuscript should close!
> The Nightingale that in the branches sang,
> Ah whence, and whither flown again, who knows!"

There breathes in those brief hundred stanzas a spirit more poignant, more profound, than such lamentations as the Preacher or Horace could utter over transitory joy and life's unanswerable speculations. That such a spirit should find complete and perfect utterance, first in Naishápúr, and then, far from Persia's rose-gardens and palaces, among the quietude of Suffolk fields and through the mouth of an outwardly indolent and rather colorless literary man, is, as we said, an evidence of the soul's unexpected and incalculable powers. It is as truly a vindication of man's spiritual greatness as any miracle could be.

---

EVERY IDLE WORD.

Browning several times gives curious pictures of the impression made by the talk and ways of common men upon the uncommon man. Lazarus, in "An Epistle," is one case of a man who eyes the world like a child, with other values for words and things than the men around him. The prodigious armament assembled to besiege his city, the passing of a mule with gourds, the death of a child, a child's ill-humored word—big things and little, what do they mean to him? Which is most important? The explanation of his curious interest and lack of interest is, it is suggested,

> "Heaven opened to a soul while yet on earth, > Earth forced on a soul's use while seeing heaven."

The same is true of the poet of Valladolid, with his curious interest in little things, common sights and sounds of the streets, obvious habits of speech—

> "He took such cognisance of men and things,
> If any beat a horse, you felt he saw;
> If any cursed a woman, he took note."

We can understand how strange both men were—

> "it was not wholly ease
> As back into your mind the man's look came,
> Stricken in years a little,—such a brow
> His eyes had to live under!—clear as flint
> On either side the formidable nose."

Probably something of the kind is true of every man of genius. There is Carlyle in Mrs. Austin's drawing-room—around him "Sidney Smith guffawing, other people prating, jargoning"—and on him, as he sat, "Death and Eternity glaring in." We know how the talk sounded to him.

It is interesting to turn again to the Gospels and to collect what Jesus says of the talk of men, and it is surprising to find how much it is. One gathers that here was one who watched men and their words closely, on whose ears the words fell, not as old coinages, but as new minting, with the marks of thought still rough and bright on them—indexes to the speaker.

Proverbs of the market every people has of its own. "It is nought, it is nought, saith the buyer, and after he has gone his way he boasteth." And the seller has his caveat emptor ready to retort. In the East and in antiquity we find the same uncertainty in every transaction as to the value of the article, the same eagerness of seller and buyer to get at the supposed special knowledge of the other, the same preliminary skirmish of proposal, protest, offer, refusal, and oath. Jesus stands in the market, watching some small sale with the strange, bright, earnest eyes, whose fixed gaze the Gospels so often mention. The buyer swears "on his head" he will not give more than so much; then "by the altar" he won't get the thing. "By the earth" it is not worth so much; "by heaven" the seller gave more for it. At last, after a lot of this, a bargain is struck. The buyer raises his price; the seller takes less than he had given for the thing; and the keen eyes of the onlooker see that each feels that he has over-reached the other. Heaven has been invoked—and what is Heaven? As the words fell on his ears, he saw the Throne of God, and on it One before Whose face Heaven and earth will flee away—and will be brought back again for judgment. And by Heaven, and by Him who sits on that Throne, men will swear falsely for a copper or two. How can they? It is that nothings grow something; the words make a mist about the thing. So Jesus told his own followers to stick to Yes and No.

A leader in the religious circles passes, and the loiterers have a new interest. "Rabbi, rabbi," is heard, and the great man moves onward, obviously pleased with the greeting on the market-place. As soon as he is out of sight, there is idle talk about him. How little the fine word meant! How lightly is a title given! But there is worse than that, for the title of respect will stand between a man and the facts of life. Some will use it to deceive him—others, impressed by it, are silent in his presence; and one way and another the facts are kept from him. Seeing, he sees not. How many of us to-day will say what we think before a man in clerical dress? "Be not ye called 'Rabbi,'" was the advice Jesus gave his friends, and he would not take the title himself, neither "Rabbi," nor "Good Master." If he was Rabbi, why would they not "do the things that he said"? They had excuses, of course, and reasons—one teacher "had a devil," another kept low company, and so forth. His parable of excuses is familiar. And then they would come to him and say, "We know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth, neither regardest thou the person of any." He had heard such things before, and was not trapped. "Hosanna in the highest"—strange to think of the quiet man in the middle of the excited crowd, unmoved and undeceived—as little perturbed, too, when his name is cast out as evil. How little men's praise and blame matter, when you have God and His facts to be your friends and your inspiration! Yet how much they mean, if you have not God and His facts with you!

By and by talk veers round to what Pilate had done to the Galilæans—he had killed them when they went up to Jerusalem—yes! mingled their blood with their sacrifices, one might say. Of course, no one knew what he would do next. A Theudas or a Judas was needed—there must be one some time—it would not be surprising if . . . and the voice sank. There were no newspapers, no approved and reliable sources of news such as we boast; all was rumor, talk of the market, "Lo! here!" "Lo! there!" Prohibiti sermones ideoque plures, said Tacitus of talk in Rome. The Messiah must come, said one man, suspected by some of being a zealot. In any case, those Galilæans had probably angered Heaven, and got their deserts. Ill-luck like that could hardly come by accident. There was the story of the Tower of Siloam too. Any one could read a conspicuous judgment. Might it not be said that God had discredited a Baptist whose head was cut off? Even Saul of Tarsus felt for long that a crucified Messiah was refuted, was a contradiction in terms. Jesus had seen through all this, and was radiantly clear about it.

So they talked, and he listened. Then the talk veered round again, and tales were told—eyes flashed and lips smacked as one story-teller eclipsed the other in the familiar styles. "The Arabian Nights" are tales of the vulgar, it is said, rather than literature in their origin, and will give clues enough to what might be told. Jesus heard, and he remembered the hour, and said to his friends: "Out of the heart proceed thefts, murders, uncleanness, the evil eye, folly."

By and by he spoke himself, and everyone was shocked, and said "Blasphemy!" What could they mean? They would swear falsely by God, and then speak of blasphemy. Did they attach any meaning to words? What could their minds be like? Words, loose and idle words—and yet how potent they were! The magic in the idle tale—ten minutes, and the memory stained for ever with what one could never forget. A story whispered—and a name smirched for ever by the witty improvisation. God dragged in and flung out—a counter in a game of barter. How could words be so light and have such power?

He soon saw how. They come from within, and the speaker's whole personality, false or true, is behind what he says, and makes it tell as it does. The good man out of the good treasure of his heart has one sort of thing to produce—the bad man has another sort, and can no more bring out what is good than a thorn-bush can bear grapes. No wonder that of every idle word men shall give account on the day of judgment. The idle word—the word unstudied—comes straight from the inmost man, the spontaneous overflow of the spirit within, natural and inevitable, a certain proof of his quality. What better evidence could there be? Rogues never understand the insight of true men. Jesus was quick in reading character. He "needed not that any should testify of men." The young ruler speaks, and Jesus, looking on him, loves him; the ruler of the synagogue speaks, and Jesus sees through him at a glance—a poor, shallow word-monger, playing with phrases. Zacchaeus, everybody knows, is a publican; but Jesus has looked at his face and at his words—he is a son of Abraham, the true breed, and we know how God values that type. And if man can judge men by their idle words, cannot God? Does he not rather? Are not the merchant, the Rabbi, the story-teller judged already—victims of their own light words?

What of himself and his followers? "My words shall not pass away," he said. His words tallied with thoughts, and the thoughts with facts—rang true on the table of God's eternal truth, and would last while that did. It was the plain language that he used himself that he recommended to his friends—Yes and No unvarnished, Yes answering to the inward Yes and the eternal Yes, and No to the real No. Here he is like every true thinker, poet or philosopher. Wordsworth would have words so plain that the bare fact should stare through them, and the poetry should be the poetry of the thing itself, not mere word-play and colored phrase. So Jesus talked himself, and his words were facts.

It is significant that he told his friends not "to think what they should speak." The interval that thought would make between fact and word would falsify the fact. Then how were they to speak at all? "Cleanse that which is within," he said. They took him at his word, and found themselves always supplied with the right thing to say—and sometimes it was brief enough. Christiana sum, said the martyr, and was condemned; and then she added, Deo Gratias. Jesus said nothing at all before Pilate. In short, if the disciple's mind is in tune with his Master's—as right within and as true—he will speak or be silent to the same effect. The right thing will say itself—and will say itself with awful precision. This is how genius speaks—the only way of speaking, as Jesus saw.

---

A SCANDAL IN "THE FIELD."

We are astonished and distressed at the familiar knowledge of the Otter which was not long ago displayed by our venerable contemporary "The Field." It has been discussing the subject without the slightest regard to the fact that the thing is horrifying to every country gentleman in the realm. To readers of The Nation, of course, all that is known about the Otter is that it has something unlawful to do with trout-fishing. Many of them cast angle in the brook; but all of these, save a savage and inconsiderable Tory here or there, do so on the dry-fly method, which is a sure way of seldom killing anything except the King's English in the subsequent prose-poem about the daisies and the lark and the perfumed breeze. We must therefore tell what the Otter is. How do we know? it may be asked. Well, we were boys once. We are not ashamed to say that we did not have an ethical head on our young shoulders. There was no reasonable outrage on law and order in which we were not ready to have a hand. We used the Otter, and rare good sport it gave.

Our brother-in-law's head gamekeeper was partly to blame. This is said not to excuse ourselves but in order to be comprehensive in our confession. Three hours of hard work on the loch had led to nothing but luncheon in a rather dismal mood. "If you'll excuse me," said Duncan, rising to his feet and the occasion, "I wull go to my cottage and bring something that wull catch a troot or twa." Thereupon he stalked off, uphill, through the copse; and soon he was back, bearing in his hand what looked like a deep-sea line on a frame. On close inspection we saw that it was a line indeed, but that the wood on which it was wound was of a shape and structure suggestive of some ulterior purpose. The wood was a bit of plank about eighteen inches long by ten or twelve broad, and to one of the rims on the longer extension was fixed a strip of lead. The line ended in a gut cast of great length, to which many flies, apparently two dozen at least, were attached. Carefully Duncan unwound the line, of which there were eighty yards or so; then the cast uncoiled; that was tied to a string fixed at either end to the face of the board and hanging like the "belly-band" of a kite. The whole thing looked extraordinarily clumsy. The line was coarse, and so was the gut; the flies, which hung from the cast at intervals of little more than a foot, were the most ridiculous lot we had seen; they were of all shapes, colors, and sizes, and a few of them were dressed on plaited horse-hair.

"You don't mean to say you expect to catch anything with that!"

"I wull be a wee bit disappointed if we don't," said Duncan.

He was smiling seraphically as he placed the board in the water at the edge of the loch. Instantly it was evident how the gear was to work. Instead of floating flat, the board went down on the leaded rim, and floated so, with the opposite rim appearing just above the surface. It slanted outward, and it went in that direction as Duncan, walking along the shore, paid out the cast and then the line. It took that course from precisely the same cause as that which determines the upward movement of a kite. The end of the gut was tied to the "belly-band" in such a position that, just as the kite, with the string similarly attached, rises aslant upon the opposing breeze, the board, as Duncan, walking, pulled, went out aslant upon the resisting water.

"This is what we ca' the otter, Maister William."

The appropriateness of the name was manifest. Furtively making way through the ripples, what could be seen of the board was highly suggestive of an animal's head and neck. Almost we expected to hear a low whistle as it swam.

It was not allowed to go very far. A long voyage seemed to be unnecessary. We had not gone twenty yards from the place of starting when Duncan exclaimed, "There's one!" He was not looking out upon the loch, but simply strolling along the shore, with the end of the taut line in his left hand. He seemed to be listening through the line, his hand, and his arm; but that, of course, was not the real state of affairs. All that was in play was his sense of touch. "Another!" said he. He repeated the remark in about half-a-minute, and again and again within similar time; then he lapsed into silence. Nevertheless, he was still smiling. On our demanding to know the meaning of his happiness, Duncan explained that he had lost touch and therefore count. "After half-a-dozen fish are on, ye see, it's no' easy to tell when another comes—unless, of course, he's a ferox or a salmon."

Within the next ten minutes we were leading the otter ashore. This was by the simple process of going back upon our tracks. In the board came, fluttering; and when the gut cast appeared, what a spectacle began! There was a trout on every hook!

Instead of having to receive from the Laird the reproaches which were due to a duffer, we should enter his presence as the most skilful of all the anglers who had tried the loch for many a day! He himself had said in the morning that we should catch nothing or next to nothing; the weather was unfavorable.

That, however, is another story. The question in "The Field" was nothing less than this: "Are Trout Intelligent?" If they are, why, even at times when they will not look at the daintiest fly most deftly cast from a rod, do they so readily impale themselves on the monstrous lures which are trailed on the leash of the otter? Here is one of the conjectural answers offered to the alarmed and scandalised Editor of our estimable contemporary: "Gregarious animals are always attracted by the sight of one of their number feeding. Every time you scatter grain for fowls or ducks you note that some of the birds leave the grain which is on the ground to pursue companions that carry off a mouthful. Probably the spectacle of an excited trout flopping among the flies attracts other trout to the feast."

That is ingenious and plausible reasoning; but we reserve judgment until we have heard counsel from among our readers. Although we have been boys again for a reminiscent hour, we are not young enough to be cocksure.

Short Studies.

THE PROPHET WITHOUT HONOR.

The thought has often occurred to me: what would Tolstoy's disciples, rich or otherwise, do if, by some stroke of fate, he were suddenly deprived of three things—his title, his independence, and his prestige, I mean his prestige as a prophet perpetually facing the supposed dangers of a fixed residence in Russia? What would become of him were he to land in England to-morrow possessed of nothing but the clothes on his back, with no prospect of future social or political glory? If I know the world, and I think I do, here is something like what would happen.

Scene.—The wealthy soi-disant Christian Socialist, Sir Percy Prim and Lady Prim, in their home.

Sir Percy: And so Tolstoy has actually arrived in London! We must have him here to tea.

Lady Prim: That would be very nice, if we could get him before Lady Castlegarden has him at her house. You know what an outspoken enthusiast she is about all such things: Christian Science, Christian Socialism, and especially Tolstoy and his teachings, and she is sure to be among the very first to invite him; you know how very up-to-date she is, and she says old-fashioned people always make her feel weak, they "draw" from her. She is certain to pounce on him like a hungry old cat on a country mouse.

Sir Percy: Country mouse, perhaps, but anything but a young one.

Lady Prim: In the eyes of Lady Castlegarden young and old are all one if up-to-date.

Sir Percy: Well, anyhow it's about time we offered our friends something in return for entertainment they have given us lately. That last evening at Lady Van Zant's—quite entertaining!—although no one pretends to understand the airs and tricks of that prodigy with his fiddle, young Vichy—Vichy—what's his name? Quite amusing Lady Van Zant declaring that the saucy brat is not doing it himself, but Paganini is doing it through him. Quite novel, I must confess.

Lady Prim: She draws the bow rather long, but you know she loves the sensational.

Sir Percy: And there is Lady Castlegarden, with her mind-reader, who failed to tell the number of the banknote I had in my pocket, but described in detail the ticket the pawnbroker gave the Duchess of Rigglesworth when she pawned a tiara to raise money to send a missionary to the niggers in Fiji. Most amusing—the silly geese! I think if we can't off-set that by showing them the greatest Russian that ever lived, a born nobleman and a gentleman, a prophet in his own country as well as out of it; if we can't go them one better on their puppy prodigies and mind-reading buffoons the sooner we cease trying to entertain anyone the better. And, then, the one man in all the world who has made Christian Socialism respected, the man who has made the whole world look towards the Russian Bethlehem with awe and reverence—in one word, the saviour of modern society.

Lady Prim (opening the latest edition of the evening paper, and reading): What's this? I can hardly believe my eyes! Tolstoy is no longer a count, and he has landed here without a penny in his pocket!

Sir Percy: Who says so?

Lady Prim: Here it is in the paper. He has lost everything, and is now no better than the rest of them. We couldn't have him here without appearing flagrantly absurd and highly provincial.

Sir Percy: Good heavens! I'm glad we knew that in time. Had we invited the old fellow here he might have asked me for money.

Enter the COUNTESS OF CASTLEGARDEN:—

LADY CASTLEGARDEN: Have you heard the news? Tolstoy is in London!

SIR PERCY: Yes, but stripped of everything, without so much as a change of clothes, everything gone, titles, estates, everything!

LADY CASTLEGARDEN: And my son Robert comes of age next week, and he has always declared he will give half his income to Tolstoy for the propagation of his teachings!

LADY PRIM: But something must be done!

SIR PERCY: Certainly something must be done, and done in time. He must be kept away from Tolstoy.

LADY CASTLEGARDEN: How fortunate! Here comes Robert now! Do you know, we were just talking about something very serious? Your idol, Tolstoy, is in London, but broken and utterly done for. He is no longer even a Russian Count!

ROBERT (coolly): I hope I'm not so stupid as to assist a man who has nothing to recommend him but his writings.

SIR PERCY: Most certainly not! A man must at least be a gentleman, and these writers without means are simply vagabonds in disguise—that's what I say!

ROBERT: Somehow I had an idea Tolstoyism wouldn't last very long.

LADY PRIM: In my opinion, when he lost his title he lost everything.

SIR PERCY nods his head, LADY PRIM frowns, and ROBERT looks up vacantly at the ceiling.

The scene changes. A group of successful literary men:—

FIRST WRITER: So the old fanatic is actually here at last!

SECOND WRITER: "Old fanatic" sounds good, coming from one who was received in Russia by Tolstoy, and who wrote a glowing account of the visit to the "Daily Boomerang," in which the "Count" was depicted as a man with the face and the figure of a prophet, only a little lower than an archangel.

THIRD WRITER: Well, I always knew there was no bottom to Tolstoyism. All an illusion, you see—illusion of time, place, and circumstance.

FIRST WRITER: How's that? What do you mean?

THIRD WRITER: I simply mean that Tolstoy managed things while he was at it much as Rockefeller managed things in the oil line, and just as successfully, except that he asked for no money. Tolstoy was something more than a novelist à la mode; he was a great psychologist. He knew how to bring the English and Americans to his home, and how to make them talk about him after they left. What the world wants is not a poor shoemaker sitting mending shoes, but a live prophet, dressed like Elijah; only, instead of being fed by ravens, fed by a mighty good cook, and a small army of servants in attendance, with a fashionable countess to give them their orders, and to take good care that the prophet has everything his mind and body require to make his journey through this vale of tears as jaunty and luxurious as it is possible for money to make it.

SECOND WRITER: We are living in a picturesque age.

FIRST WRITER: Don't you think it is sentiment that has turned picturesque?

SECOND WRITER: Most men are like most women; they like sentiment, but they want plenty of "show" behind it. They want it picturesque.

THIRD WRITER: Romantic, in one word.

SECOND WRITER: Certainly, but they want their romance with all modern comforts.

THIRD WRITER: If Tolstoy's cook had fed his foreign visitors on cabbage and celery tips he would have had few callers from a great distance.

SECOND WRITER: Snobbery avoids three things—individualism, inconvenience, and indigestion.

THIRD WRITER: And that leads me to what I was going to say about Tolstoyism being founded on illusions. You know the old saw, "Distance lends enchantment"; well, this question of distance was a great factor in Tolstoy's life. When we know a man is difficult to get at our desire rises fifty per cent. in the scale of illusions. Follow this up by the illusion of place, his remote country mansion, all in the Russian style, so unlike anything in the lives of western authors; follow that up again by the peculiar circumstances of his strange existence, the flat contradictions, the impossible paradox, and I say you have enough to float the reputation of three novelists and keep them well above the Wilbur Wright line of successful aeroplane manœuvring. It is wonderful what proper management will do. Tolstoy was a great manager. He neglected nothing that could by any possibility attract the gaze of the whole world to himself. His contradictions and denials of men of genius equal to, if not greater than, himself, was a tactical stroke in keeping with everything else in his luxurious and easy life.

SECOND WRITER: It is amazing what an attraction there is in cheap things that are not quite easy to get.

FIRST WRITER: As a proof of that, compare the miracle worker, the late Father John, with Tolstoy. Father John expected money from the rich to carry on his charitable work; he was a poor priest with no social standing, and the English and the Americans ignored the humble priest and passed on to Tolstoy, who was more difficult to reach—and cheaper. There was absolutely nothing to pay.

SECOND WRITER: Sometimes I wonder if Tolstoy did not begin by taking to heart Carlyle's saying that most people are fools, and simply acting on that.

THIRD WRITER: All the same, I'm sorry this thing has happened. Had Tolstoy remained in his old position in Russia two months longer I should have been better off by nearly four hundred pounds. I was making arrangements to go out and beard the prophet in his palatial den, take a series of sensational views, one or two sketches, something novel, my own idea, be away about a month, spend twenty or thirty pounds, come home, and clear about three hundred and eighty, with the satisfaction of having had a rousing good time.

FIRST WRITER: Lucky thing for some people that Tolstoy was not in the boot and shoe business instead of a great landed proprietor.

SECOND WRITER: Shoemaking is not romantic enough!

THIRD WRITER: Yet, I'll bet you it's the last profession he will stick to now that he is in England dead broke.

Scene changes again. A fine country house in the Surrey hills. Rich proprietor known as a keen disciple of Tolstoy, enthusiastic, always willing to spend money on the Tolstoyan Utopia. The proprietor is sitting at his desk, engaged in writing a pamphlet on how best to disseminate the Tolstoyan idea. Enter a newspaper reporter from London:—

REPORTER: Have you heard what has happened?

PROPRIETOR: Nothing very serious, I hope.

REPORTER: Tolstoy has arrived in London without a penny; his title, his estates, his social prestige, all gone.

PROPRIETOR: What! You mean to say he has nothing left!

REPORTER: Nothing but his genius.

PROPRIETOR: Great Cæsar! Then he is only another Maxim Gorky!

He sits back in his chair, stupefied.

REPORTER: He is stopping at a cheap hotel in the Strand, and has been assisted by some working-men who have pawned their watches for the purpose. They say Tolstoy must come out here to you, where he can have a good home; he intends setting up as a shoemaker, working at the usual rates at that trade.

PROPRIETOR (gasping): You don't mean it!

REPORTER: That is the intention.

PROPRIETOR: This takes my breath away! What am I to do? This thing has knocked me all in a heap. It is a nightmare! And, hang it all, Tolstoy on his estates in Russia is one thing, Tolstoy a beggar living on my estate is another. And, besides, fancy people coming here to have their boots mended. Why will Russian counts get broke and turn themselves into dirty mujiks!

REPORTER: Perhaps you could take him for a few days, and then pass him on to the common workingmen, who seem to have remained his warm disciples in spite of all.

PROPRIETOR (tapping his forehead): Stay! I have an idea. Tolstoy is an old man. He can't live long at the most and worst. His keep would not cost much. I have a vacant room in the servants' house, at the top over there, where he can mend boots and write without bothering me, and at the same time things will appear to be as they were. No one need be compromised.

REPORTER: And when he dies bury him in your back garden.

PROPRIETOR: A splendid idea! And, hang it all, later on I'll reimburse myself by charging the beggars a shilling per head when they come here on their annual visits to view the grave. His drawing power is gone now, but his grave will draw later on. A splendid idea!

FRANCIS GRIERSON.

Present-Day Problems.

FROM EATANSWILL TO TAMMANY.

THE Croydon election will take its place in time's museum as a very neat example of the contemporary art of the "Mafficker." Both the material and the atmosphere favored such workmanship. A "scare" about our national security was born almost out of the same moment of time as the occasion of the vacancy. This was the material. The atmosphere was charged by dexterous party management and a willing Press with the requisite degree of irritation and alarm. The election was consequently watched from the point of view of its bearing on the preoccupation of the moment. A naval scare cannot, however, be counted among the permanent resources of the party manager, and the handling of one is an art in which repetition emphatically does not make for better success. There were things, however, at Croydon less apparent to the public mind, but of perhaps more durable significance than the demonstration of hysteria which it was made to evoke.

On the Saturday before the election there defiled through the streets of Croydon, like a train of heavy artillery, about twenty Conservative vans. They had been stationed at various points of the constituency throughout the week, each with its driver, its staff of orators, and its equipment of literature, and they were now mobilised for the tremendous cannonade with which it was part of the plan of operations that the campaign should, on Saturday night, close. A party which has almost unlimited wealth is entitled to use it, and, if it so please, to bring up all its troops from the base and throw them on the pass which is at the moment in dispute. It must not, therefore, be made a subject of complaint that in point of the men, equipment, and stores of a regular army the Liberals should have been almost absurdly outmatched. But a Geneva Convention is wanted to regulate the indiscriminate use of auxiliaries, of rough-riders, and sharp-shooters who, however effective their service to those with whom they fight, pass as non-combatants when the presiding officer surveys the accounts.

The use of these irregular troops was a feature of the election at Newcastle. At Croydon the licensed trade was temporarily in reserve, but its place was adequately filled. Societies organised to raid the public till, still more powerful societies fighting for a privilege, with back to wall, invaded the borough, and, whatever their purpose, whatever their attitude to society, whether of offence or defence, flocked to the banner which bore the name of Sir Robert Hermon-Hodge. The Tariff Reform League was at every street corner. The Anti-Socialist Union directed a rather strident voice against the Labor candidate, but the Conservative, again, got the benefit of such argument as it could make heard above the general din. A tea-pot is an unusual emblem on the table of the Conservative chairman, and its presence was permitted as a grateful recognition of the services of the Anti-Tea Duty League. The Hop-Pickers' Defence League had its platform, and so had the retrenched servants of the Woolwich Arsenal. The Imperial Maritime League and—with more restraint—the Navy League may be said to have taken the place of the Coal Consumers' League, whose occupation is gone. Even Mr. Hunnable has outlived his days of irresponsibility, and is now definitely ranged on the side of Conservative principles. Finally, there were the Women's Social and Political Union and the Women's Freedom League. Travelling a different road, to a different destination, they had yet come to the same conclusion as the rest—that Mr. Raphael must, in the interests of their special cause, be kept out.

The result of all these combined activities was to turn Croydon, as it turned Newcastle, into something resembling a large fair-ground on the culminating night of the fair. The streets were carpeted with trodden literature printed in the interest of the Conservative candidate, but at the expense of someone else. Applied science was pressed into the cause. Out of the mouths of gramophones came philosophy and figures for the Mafficking multitude; the cinematograph taught the new economics on a white sheet, exhibited dazzling portraits of great "Imperialists," and, lest even this should unduly strain the popular attention, varied epigrams and object-lessons with serio-comic scenes from "the Halls." Meanwhile the human voice was doing all it could; sometimes, as in Wagner opera, more than, according to the ordinary measurement of the human compass, it should be asked to do.

For Tariff Reform, seeking to recommend itself as a popular cry, has had to choose its methods accordingly. The voice and the manner which served the Protectionist orator very well for the dinner of a "Farmers' Club" will not avail the Tariff Reformer with several thousand people to talk down at one time. Accordingly, the vocal powers which the Tariff Reform League require of their peripatetic speakers are very high ones. The standard must be difficult to satisfy, and the test not less distressing to the judges than to the aspirants. Some, however, are so richly endowed that they can afford to be prodigal of their gifts. Thus, an elderly gentleman who, on the note and at the range he had set himself, seemed in urgent need of an exceptionally condensed style, was so confident of his powers that he insisted on giving every Privy Councillor whom he named his full official title—Mr. Lloyd George was always "the Right Honorable Lloyd George," and Mr. Chamberlain, whose name the speaker evidently regarded as a peroration in itself, was always "the Right Honorable Joseph Chamberlain." It was by dint of powers like these that Tariff Reform was advertised as a cure for every social ill. Where the audience seemed to require it, Tariff Reform was to pay for "Dreadnoughts." Foreign goods would then come in. To other audiences, Tariff Reform was to give work to everyone. Foreign goods would then stay out. "Tariff Reform and Work for All." From the showman's equipment only the drum was absent, and many "walked-up," carrying to this resort the desperate hopes which at the last election they confided to Socialism and a Socialist candidate. It is some years since we abolished the hustings, and for a time elections were conducted with the comparative decorum of Mid-Victorian days. The Primrose League played on that acute sense of social distinction which is almost native to the British mind, and must, therefore, be accounted a comparatively respectable thing. Then in May, 1903, the signal was given to the marauders, and we have travelled from Eatanswill only to come within sight of Tammany.

The Drama.

PAMPHLET PLAYS.

It is clear that interest in the social question, as well as the personal influence of Mr. Bernard Shaw, are becoming responsible for a type of play, the intellectual qualities of which go ahead of their dramatic power. The conventional stage is mainly filled by writers who can construct on approved models, but do not think or feel, or who, like Mr. Pinero, cleverly simulate thought and emotion, and bustle round the movement of the world without being truly part of it. The unconventional stage is occupied by writers whose feeling is by no means unreal, but who have not yet learned their business. Ibsen, being a dramatic genius of the first rank, was able to combine perfect stagecraft with the power to lift the action of a play into an atmosphere more refined than any of his predecessors had tried to reach. But Mr. Shaw and his school do not aim so high. They are critics, talkers, raisonneurs, rejecting poetry and sticking to bare earth and its problems. The result is a tendency to produce pamphlets in the guise of plays, and, though one does not reject this form of production, and often admires its sincerity and thoughtfulness, one sees that its absence of form, its want of direct emotional power, may ensure its downfall.

The Incorporated Stage Society produced on Monday two such pamphlets in the shape of Miss Mack's "Unemployed" and Mr. George Calderon's "The Fountain." Miss Mack's little one-act piece is almost a play in dumb show. She shows us a situation and no more; a mere flash-light scene of a dying tramp, flung on to the doorstep of a houseful of rich, trifling folk. That is significant, no doubt, but it is not enough if we are to think of the theatre as illustrating a higher form of art than the bioscope. Unless tramp and idlers are brought into some close, powerful relationship with each other, we can feel no more emotion at such a meeting, and it can make no more serious intellectual impression on us, than if we saw, or took part in, some such scene on the Embankment. Mr. Calderon's play is more important. It is witty, with a certain high-spirited brilliancy that makes us feel that its writer, not unknown in satirical literature, has a future, and it is a clever and truthful work of social analysis. The theme, while it resembles that of "Major Barbara," is developed with some originality. Mr. Calderon introduces us to the world of good intentions, in which we all love to dwell, and where the sin of doing the wrong thing presents itself in the guise of noble inspiration. The chief of these unconscious sinners is a young married woman of property, Chenda Wren. Chenda, tired of her "Shavian" husband's demonstrations of the hopelessness of saving the world by meddling piecemeal with its arrangements, plunges into action in the shape of East End charity. Here her guide is a doing parson instead of a talking philosopher. Charity demands money, and more money, and this must be got from her estate. But the Church, after its fashion, has not looked into the title-deeds, and is ignorant of the character of the property it is supposed to administer. When, therefore, the blundering, self-confident curate, Mrs. Wren's guardian and cousin, calls on her agent to force another £100, or £200, from her revenues, it must all come out of the pockets of the people for whom she is furnishing a sanatorium, and whose shiftlessness she fosters by amateur pawnbroking. The poor themselves look on, half-amused, at her philanthropy, and altogether bent on profiting by it. They fleece her good-naturedly, the more honest abuse her, none of them allow her to interfere seriously with their lives, or show the smallest sign that her impulsive good-nature is of any moral value to them. At length, after she has rated the rent-collector and the lawyers for raising her own rents on her clients, she discovers the truth, and retires, discomfited, to the arms of the Socialistic aphorist, fortified with her first lesson in political economy. Incidentally, Mr. Calderon flings out a symbolic hint or two as to the meaning of life, the hardness and blindness of human justice, the consolations that the sheer thoughtlessness of the poor brings to them. Thus, while Mrs. Wren is denouncing the rent-collector as a hardened ruffian because he ruthlessly shears off the small superfluities of these people's lives, his clients are gaily drinking at his expense, and the slum that she and the parson would elevate enjoys itself thoroughly on its own slatternly level. The great human machinery may or may not yield to Socialistic treatment—Mr. Calderon does not seek to enlighten us on this point—but it is clear that it will not bear handling by the amateur charity-monger. Even if it did, he would not have the right to interfere; for what he gives with one hand he takes with the other. All of us are included in the same condemnation.

Mr. Calderon keeps his little piece on the borders of farce, he does not attempt to develop any sustained human interest from it, and, though his wit is his own, his method is a little too like Mr. Shaw's to enable the critic to say with confidence that he possesses an individual dramatic gift. His form is faulty and confused, but he can think on the dramatic plane; perchance the faculty of significant and powerful expression may be his also.

H. W. M.

Communications.

THE ART OF J. M. SYNGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It must have been about 1899 that Mr. Yeats came across a young compatriot in Paris, studying modernism, trying to write the morbid, remote poetry—"images reflected from mirror to mirror"—which Englishmen and Frenchmen were writing at that time. He had been in many quiet and busy places, seeking a means of expression, looking at life, but because he had not yet found his focus he had fallen back, as so many do, on other men's visions. To make literature out of literature, to refine the refined, was the tendency of the day. Mr. Yeats, who himself had trod these paths, was weary of them, tired of the art which comes from brooding over things far from realities, and in love with the life of simple folk. So he sent his decadent to the lonely, windy Aran Islands to save his soul and "express," as Mr. Yeats said, "a life that has never found expression." It was John Millington Synge whom he thus rescued, and, whatever other claims Mr. Yeats may have on our gratitude, this will not be counted least among his good works. So strong a personality must at length have found itself, but Mr. Synge could not have spared many more years for wandering.

For he died the other day in a private hospital in Dublin, aged only thirty-eight, but assured of a place in the memory of all who love writing which is beautiful and true. Among the Irish peasants he had indeed found a vision which Europe could not give him and a mode of expression not to be learned of all the poets of Montmartre.

Slight in bulk as his work is, Mr. Synge has left curiously complete data whereby to measure his intention and his achievement. Two short prefaces tell without obtrusiveness all one needs to know of his artistic creed. "On the stage one must have reality, and one must have joy," he wrote; and he could not find these qualities in the modern intellectual drama. He knew that it is not theories, but life only, which can give vitality to art. His method was as far removed from the realism of Ibsen—"as old-fashioned as the pharmacopœia of Galen"—as from the unrealism of Maeterlinck or Mr. Yeats in his most mystic temper. By living with men who are too near life and death to vex themselves much with the problems of the cultured, he was able to create a drama, which is a new thing, and yet seems a very old one. Not for nothing did he set one of his scenes in "some windy, mountainous district on the east of Ireland one or more centuries ago." Time matters so little when one gets behind fleeting fashion; but the winds and the mountains are eternal.

His book, "The Aran Islands," is, as it were, the raw material of his five plays, all of which are concerned entirely with the peasants and fisherfolk. He learned their language, the rhythmic English of men who have not forgotten the Gaelic, and with it, using only the words and images they use, made a prose of a beauty scarcely to be equalled by anything outside the English Bible. Some of his plots were taken from tales he heard over the peat-fires. That of "The Shadow of the Glen," for example, is very little modified from a story told in "The Aran Islands."

"The Shadow of the Glen," together with "Riders to the Sea," two very short plays, were his first work published only four years ago. These were quickly followed by "The Well of the Saints," in which a miraculous cure seems so natural as to render necessary a new definition of realism. "The Playboy of the Western World" brought Mr. Synge's name into as much prominence as it is likely at present to achieve. The Dublin public, accustomed to sentimental representations of the peasantry, objected to its truthfulness. Something like a tumult arose in the Abbey Theatre, and the actors were reduced to dumb-show. "The Freeman's Journal" described the play as "calumny gone raving mad." Even without this adventitious aid, however, it is probable that "The Playboy" would have become more widely known than any of Mr. Synge's other plays. It is the most dramatic, the most theatrical, without being any the less true. According to your mood, it is either tragic or comic, and that, perhaps, should be the final test of a play's truthfulness. For tragedy and comedy are the duality, one and indivisible, which is called life. The last play, "The Tinker's Wedding," published just a year ago, though written earlier, is purely farcical and yet full of the beauty which Mr. Synge has found among the men of the mountains and the mists, so spiritual and yet so frank in their earthly desires. Like all the others, it gives us the "nourishment on which our imaginations live," the author's own standard of the seriousness of drama.

But the play of all Mr. Synge's which appeals most to the imagination, in which the essential stands barest, is the little "Riders to the Sea." All the terror of life in the fretted islands, all the mystery and cruelty of the sea, are in it; and the paganism bred therefrom, the ironic fatalism which can synthesise the almighty and most merciful Father with the "blind gods that cannot spare." "The maternal feeling is so powerful in these islands that it gives a life of torment to the women," Mr. Synge writes; and this play is his commentary, with the mother's cry, when the last of her six sons rides down to the waters that have destroyed the rest:—

> "If it was a hundred horses, or a thousand horses you had itself, what is the price of a thousand horses against a son where there is one son only?"

And the hardness that must come when life is at everlasting war with the elements is in the daughter's words:—

> "It's the life of a young man to be going on the sea, and who would listen to an old woman with one thing and she saying it over?"

And its bitterness when the mother complains:—

> "In the big world the old people do be leaving things after them for their sons and children, but in this place it is the young men do be leaving things behind for them that do be old;"

And its fatalism in her words when the last of her sons is carried in:—

> "They're all gone now, and there isn't anything more the sea can do to me. . . . I'll have no call now to be up crying and praying when the wind breaks from the south, and you can hear the surf is in the east, and the surf is in the west, making a great stir with the two noises, and they hitting one on the other. I'll have no call now to be going down and getting Holy Water in the dark nights after Samhain, and I won't care what way the sea is when the other women will be keening."

But though Mr. Synge got thus closely into touch with the elemental, he did not lose what the Parisian days had taught him—only gained infinitely. He can be named without discord among men who have found their visions in a more artificial light. His work has something of the quality of folk-poetry; but he got by an austere eclecticism the effect which the best folk-poetry has gained from generations of selection and rejection. He was as consciously an artist as the decadents from whom he escaped, and more eclectic even than they; for they made their choice now from life or its outer garments, and now from other men's fancies, while he refused all but life only. He could feel with the best of them an "exquisite satisfaction" to find himself "making away from civilisation" in a primitive canoe, and his eyes were always open for artistic effects. It is interesting to note the difference of his descriptive style when speaking through the mouth of one of his peasant characters and when in his own person:—

> "I'll be getting my death now I'm thinking, sitting alone in the cold air, hearing the night coming, and the blackbirds flying round in the briars crying to themselves, the time you'll hear one cart getting off a long way in the east, and another cart getting off a long way in the west, and a dog barking maybe, and a little wind turning the sticks."

That is the language of imaginative but simple folk. This is the language of the imaginative graduate of Trinity College:—

> "About the sunset the clouds broke and the storm turned to a hurricane. Bars of purple cloud stretched across the sound where immense waves were rolling from the west, wreathed with snowy phantasies of spray. Then there was the bay full of green delirium, and the Twelve Pins touched with mauve and scarlet in the east."

The observer never quite identified himself with his island friends, but stood a little aloof, not so far as to lose his vision. "On some days," he writes, "I feel this island as a perfect home and resting place; on other days I feel that I am a waif among the people. I can feel more with them than they can feel with me." Thus and not otherwise could he have been the artist he was. For it is after the mood has passed, not while it is on him, that the artist fashions it to his will.—Yours, &c.,

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

Letters to the Editor.

THE GERMAN DECLARATION OF INTENTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is perhaps well to explain a doubt named by you in your last issue. Referring to a speech by me in the House of Commons upon naval strength, you write: "One important point which is disputed, that the Powers had agreed, as a result of the Hague Conference, to communicate their programmes to one another as far as possible." No dispute can arise upon my words as recorded in the uncorrected official report of the sitting of March 22nd. The "Times" report involves a different condensation. It runs thus: "COMMUNICATION OF PROGRAMMES.—Their national attempt to reduce naval armaments by agreement failed, and after it failed, The Hague Conference agreed that the Powers should communicate their programmes to one another, as far as it could possibly be done. As he understood it, this communication, to which he had referred, must have been based upon that suggestion, and had this importance, that however little it might yield, it was the only chance of anything like international action leading towards reduction of armaments. . . . He was most anxious that they should respond with the most exquisite courtesy to any offers of this kind that might be made." The Paris correspondent of the "Times" explained this condensation by a gloss which was inaccurate: "Sir Charles Dilke seems to have stated in the House of Commons on Monday that the Powers . . . . at the last Hague Conference had there agreed to submit to one another in advance their annual naval estimates. This is a mistake." Of course, it is a mistake; but not mine. My reference was in the terms of the Protocols (page 31), from which it appears that Great Britain proposed to confirm the Resolution of the first Hague Conference. The President, in explaining it, added that "It will be an honor for the second Peace Conference to have contributed to it . . . by carrying it at once." The result was that the Resolution, in the words of Sir Edward Fry, was "unanimously acclaimed." It is a "vœu" that the Powers should "consider the possibility of coming to an understanding" as to limitation attained through communication of programme; and this was how I put it, although condensation has produced an almost inevitable over-statement. No one who heard me expressed a doubt as to the accuracy of my statement or failed, I think, to follow the moderate argument based upon it.

All may still regret that in the earliest Government speeches, and in the latest, there was not the clear statement of the facts which was given by Mr. Asquith at question time on an intermediate day. Mr. Gretton asked, in substance, whether that which I had already explained in the speech referred to was correctly stated, and Mr. Asquith in a second answer is reported as having said that on March 10th a definite statement, called a declaration of intention, had been made by the German Ambassador to Sir Edward Grey. The Prime Minister showed that our Government thought that the words "not more than thirteen complete by the end of 1912," excluded the great cruisers, and that it was only on March 16th that it was made clear to them that the statement did include cruisers, as well as battleships. In my previous speech I had mentioned that there had been complaint that we had not understood the "voluntary declaration, which was definite as regarded the number of ships: 'There would not be more than thirteen "Dreadnoughts" and "Invincibles" complete by the end of 1912." The official report, misled, no doubt, by a well-meant interruption, "1911"—again corrected by me at the time to "1912"—has printed "1911"; subsequently corrected for the second edition to 1912, which is what I said.—Yours, &c.,

76, Sloane Street, S.W. CHARLES W. DILKE.
April 1st, 1909.

"THE MOTIVES OF GERMAN POLICY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you allow one—who, I believe you know, is neither a scaremonger nor a jingo—to make a remark on your article with the above title?

When you speak with reference to Germany's naval strength of "a much stronger Power," you can mean only this country; for no other State is much, or even moderately, stronger on the water than Germany is already. You believe that the Germans may "naturally desire to have a powerful fleet for purposes of defence." Surely it is absurd to suppose that, if the German Navy were but half as strong—both absolutely and relatively—as it is now, we should be able to attack Germany. Her defensive power, quite independent of her fleet, would put that out of the question. To those who are conversant with the conditions of naval warfare, it is evident that the German naval strength far surpasses the amount that on any reasonable calculation can be considered merely defensive.

If it is to support her diplomacy, as you suggest, then Germany—adopting your view—must go on strengthening her navy till it is fully equal to the greatest in the world. Would it be safe or desirable for us to remain inactive observers of the carrying out of your suggestion?—Yours, &c.,

R. N.

March 28th, 1909.

LONDON UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The correspondence on this subject which has already appeared in THE NATION is sufficient evidence of the existence of two strikingly divergent views of the proper relationship of examinations to education. These views are not new, and it is pretty certain that nothing that can now be said on one side or the other will influence the opinions of the members of the Royal Commission as to the respective merits of examinations conducted by the students' teachers or by an absolutely independent examiner.

Nevertheless any one who is interested in the future of education in London must welcome the sound of the clash of arms after the unnatural silence that has prevailed during the last ten years. For this silence has not indicated peace but a transference of the conflict from public debate to the council chambers and senate house of the reconstituted University.

The great need of the moment is that the Royal Commission should recognise that these two ideals of education, an external examining board and a local teaching university, though temporarily combined and working without outward manifestations of strife, are as hopelessly at variance with each other as they have been at any time during the last fifty years. If this is recognised, and it is further agreed that each of these ideals manifesting itself in its appropriate institution can serve a really useful purpose in the State, it is surely a mistake to hamper the growth of each by insisting on their forces being combined in a single institution.

It is much to be hoped that "Liberal Graduate," "Interested," and others, who are equally confident that the external or the internal ideal is the only one worth fighting for will use their energies to bring evidence before the Commission in favor of dividing the existing University into two autonomous institutions. By this course alone can London take its proper part in higher education, providing on the one hand an absolutely impartial degree for students educated in any and every part of the Empire, and, on the other hand setting up a true local University for the citizens of London.—Yours, &c.,

A LATE MEMBER OF THE SENATE OF THE UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

March 29th, 1909.

"THE SUFFRAGETTES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As a witness of the scenes outside the House of Commons last Tuesday, I should like to ask two questions, if you will allow me.

A deputation of women started from Caxton Hall that afternoon for the purpose of calling on Mr. Asquith in the House. That the Prime Minister refuses to receive any deputation of women is one of those things that discourage Liberals like myself, who still regard him as the leader of our party. But my first question now has not to do with the ruinous tactics of our leader, but with the orders given to the police. They said they had orders to make no arrests. The consequence was that for nearly an hour the women of the deputation were hustled to and fro, driven up and down, and very violently used. In the end, as they persisted in their efforts to enter the House, many of them were arrested. The same scene was repeated next day.

I do not blame the police. They acted under orders, and most of us think obedience to orders a sufficient excuse for anything. But by what right does a Minister give such orders? Either it is legal to go as a deputation to the Prime Minister, or it is not. If it is not, the women ought to have been arrested at once, without first being exposed to violence and ill-usage for nearly an hour. In its attempt to avoid the unpopularity of arrests, the Government incurs the responsibility for the ill-treatment involved in its orders.

My other question concerns the behaviour of Members of Parliament at these scenes. Do they think it worthy of their position to stand as spectators, usually behind the shelter of some door or railing, to mock and jeer at women who, rightly or wrongly, are attempting to vindicate their political claims? I think ordinary men would not join in laughter at the sight of women treated as these were, no matter what opinion they might hold about the women's object in coming to the House. But Members of Parliament, who have never suffered in any cause, and never will, can stand and deride women who suffer for their cause with a courage that the members are naturally incapable of comprehending.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

National Liberal Club,
Whitehall Place, S.W.
April 2nd, 1909.

IMPERIALISM AND MILITARISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Frederic Harrison's letter in last week's NATION does not assist matters. After reading Mr. Harrison's long letter in "The Times," most people, who are not blinded by the fear of invasion, would agree with THE NATION that it was one of the most sensational ever seen in the Press.

The war scare appears to have fastened its grip on men we have hitherto regarded as stalwart Liberals. Liberals are voting Tory, because the "Harmsworth Brand" have told them that revolvers are far more important than "idle talk about Peace and Brotherhood."

A Member of Parliament would be thought "rather crazy" if he rose in his place and quoted Tennyson's familiar lines:—

"Ring out old shapes of foul disease,
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold,
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace."

The man who is considered sane nowadays is the man who manufactures a heap of useless articles, which he compels the aborigines of South Africa and elsewhere to buy at the point of the bayonet, and thereby flatters himself that he is civilised.

The comfortable classes are clamoring for more "Dreadnoughts," but when the bill for these unsightly monsters is sent in, they will rise to a man and protest.—Yours, &c.,

DOUGLAS FOX PITT.

War Coppice, Caterham, Surrey,
March 30th, 1909.

THE DANGER OF A NATIONAL THEATRE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I read with consternation in your paper of last Saturday that the scheme of the National Theatre is coming to birth. In treating of this last year I did not believe that the scheme was more than a dream, to be treated, to some extent, in a spirit of levity. It was known that a handful of impenitents had designs of forging fresh chains for us. But that the Lord Mayor was a traitor, who would have guessed?

They said of old that art was the handmaid of religion; to-day we should say that either she is twin sister or the same saint in another mood. And is it so long since we have thrown off the chains of a national religion that we have forgotten their weight and seek to burden the sweet sister Art? Indeed, do we not still feel the burden in daily life, in politics, in education, and in the soft collar of social esteem? I can fancy this National Theatre for the next few years, giving us the best of Shakespeare, of Sheridan, and, perhaps, of G. B. S. Then, gradually, the direction will fall, like that of the Royal Academy, into the hands to which all administration gravitates, the hands of the respectable. And then our National Theatre will be draped with flags and we shall flock up from the country to the "Englishman's Home," or its progeny, and get in for sixpence. And we shall know that it is the right thing because it is national.

Then, presently, we shall offer scholarships for the training of young actors. And they will first be put through a test of their dramatic faith. Can we not see the dismal enslaving of the mind that nationalised taste must bring about?

And what is it to foster? "Especially the representation of Shakespeare's Plays." Poor William Shakespeare! As the name of him who spent his life in warring against Pharisaism that the soul of man might rise on free wings, was used for the heaviest weights man ever bore and at last threw off, so now the name of the greatest teller of "Man's unconquerable soul" is to be nationalised and —administrated.—Yours, &c.,

EUPHEMIA STEVENS.

Bradfield, near Reading,
March 29th, 1909

"SCENES OF ENTHUSIASM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The communication of news about foreign events is a vitally important function of the daily Press. I hope, therefore, that you will allow me space for a demonstration of the way in which that function is often discharged.

The course of affairs in regard to the German naval programme is the most important foreign matter at present offered to the consideration of our country. Last Wednesday the Reichstag passed the second reading of the Navy Estimates. The Socialists, for reasons which their spokesman explained, postponed all they had to say until the forthcoming debate on the Chancellor's vote. The result was that the Estimates were passed with unusual speed and smoothness.

This event has been described in some of our newspapers in such a way as to suggest that this speed and smoothness were the result of an unanimous patriotic determination to push on naval construction. I proceed to analyse some statements made in the Berlin telegram published in last Thursday's "Daily Mail":—

(1) "Amid scenes of enthusiasm, the Reichstag this afternoon passed, without a dissenting voice and without a syllable of debate, the Navy Estimates for 1909."

Under present conditions only the Socialists ever oppose Navy Estimates, and they announced this time that they were saving their ammunition for a later discussion. Four persons spoke on this occasion. One of them, a Socialist, made a speech filling five of the quarto pages of the official report.

(2) "The Chamber and galleries were crowded. . . . The impression was general that an important official announcement on Anglo-German relations would be made."

To this I oppose the statement that it is seldom that one sees the House, the ministerial benches, or the galleries more empty than they were on this occasion. This seems to me to dispose of the second of the above sentences as well as the first.

(3) "Amid an intense silence the President of the Chamber stated that not a single deputy had expressed a desire to discuss the Navy Estimates."

To this I oppose the statements that the reading of the Estimates by the "reporter" was inaudible owing to the conversation of the small number of members present; and that the President, even after ringing his bell, had to raise his voice to make the above announcement heard.

(4) "Admiral Tirpitz's salary was thereupon unanimously voted, and the House broke into prolonged applause."

Some of the members present cried "Bravo!"

(5) After mentioning Herr Singer's explanation of the Socialists' abstention from opposition, the telegram says that "with the exception of another Socialist interruption," there was no more discussion.

This interruption was the five-page speech referred to above.

I have nothing to add to these statements of fact. I enclose my card.—Yours, &c.,

E. CLERIHEW.

Highgate, March 30th, 1909.

OUR FOREIGN INVESTMENTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. G. Eckhard is unduly severe upon me. I am not a "moderate Tariff Reformer." I am a rabid Free Trader. How Mr. Eckhard came to make such a mistake I don't know. There is nothing in my previous letter to you to justify any such inference. I was simply endeavoring to point out that your article on the subject of foreign investments was based to some extent on a misapprehension of the Tariff Reformers' views, and to state, as clearly as I could, what I understood those views to be. I am sure that Mr. Eckhard will agree with me that an honest attempt to understand our opponents' arguments is not entirely incompatible with the profession of Free Trade principles.

As to the causes of our foreign investments, I never for one moment suggested that a loss of credit was the sole cause. On the contrary, I was merely contesting the general proposition (which I understood your article to lay down) that an outflow of capital was always a healthy symptom, and I instanced a blow to national credit as one of the possible causes of such an outflow.

I can assure Mr. Eckhard that I am enough of a logician to understand that because impaired credit is followed by an outflow of capital, it does not follow that such an outflow is always preceded by impaired credit.—Yours, &c.,

H. W. GOLDBERG.

11, New Court, Carey Street,
Lincoln's Inn, W.C.
March 15th, 1909.

THE TEXT OF HAMLET IN THE FIRST FOLIO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In 1620 the fate of Bohemia as a Protestant country was decided at White Hill, near Prague, where Tilly, commanding the army of the Catholic League, defeated the (German) Protestant Union. Alarmed by the fate of their co-religionists, the Protestant States of North Europe, with James I.'s brother-in-law for leader, endeavored to form a Northern coalition powerful enough to cope with the Catholic League.

The King of Denmark and his party naturally counted on the energetic co-operation of James. It is said to have been at the instigation of his wife, daughter of James, that the Elector Palatine had headed the Protestant Union. As a consequence of the White Hill disaster, he almost immediately found himself in imminent danger of losing for ever, not Bohemia only, but his Electoral rank, and the Palatinate itself. For dynastic reasons, therefore, which he rated very high, James was deeply interested in the North European scheme. The cause of Protestantism also was thought to be at stake, and both people and Parliament were eager for war on behalf of the unlucky Elector and the cause with which he was, in their minds, identified. This in essential was the state of affairs which confronted James I. during the years 1621-2-3.

Addicted, maybe, to thinking too precisely on the event, James failed to back the scheme in the only effectual way. History says not whether, like Hamlet, James cursed spite that ever he was born to set right a dislocated Europe. But perhaps the curse was inarticulate. Exactly what the Protestant world thought of the English Solomon's gran rifiuto we can never know. But it may be taken for granted that he was accused of more than all the faults with which Hamlet stood charged at the bar of his conscience—pusillanimity, cowardice, brute-like oblivion of plainest obligations, infirmity of will, fatuous reliance on mere words, &c.

During this period the First Folio of Shakespeare was being engineered, under the auspices, if not of the Court of Whitehall, of courtiers of the highest rank—Prince Charles, I suggest, being one of the prime movers. When the editor-in-chief (probably Ben Jonson, with Heminge and Condell for stalking-horses) came to revise the Hamlet quartos (possibly also the grand possessor's MS.), and had reached the wonderful soliloquy of Act IV., he may well have decided to consult his patrons upon it.

> "How all occasions do inform against me | And spur my dull revenge! What is a man, | If the chief good and market of his time | Be but to sleep and feed? a beast, no more | . . . . Now whether it be | Bestial oblivion or some craven scruple | Of thinking too precisely on the event, | A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom | And over three parts coward, I do not know | Why yet I live to say 'This thing's to do'; Sith I have cause and will and strength and means | To do't. Examples gross as earth exhort me: | Witness this army . . . '| Led by a delicate and tender prince, | Whose spirit with divine ambition puff'd | Makes mouths at the invisible event, | Exposing what is mortal and unsure | To all that fortune, death and danger dare, | Even for an eggshell. Rightly to be great | Is not to stir without great argument, | But greatly to find quarrel in a straw | When honour's at the stake."

Imagine the Earl of Pembroke's feelings by the time he had read thus far. One can almost hear him exclaim, "This will never do, it would be wormwood to his Majesty; the whole speech must be left out, no matter how great the injustice to its author's genius."

Such I take to be the reason for an omission which has given pause to many an editor of Shakespeare, from Jonson's day to the day before yesterday. Taken by itself, the explanation—which may, without my knowing, have been offered before—is of no great value. But it will be found useful in dealing with sundry other enigmas involved in the First Folio.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD W. SMITHSON.

Hitchin, March 29th, 1909.

THE FIGHTING VALUE OF "DREADNOUGHTS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the letter, "Are 'Dreadnoughts' Worthless?" published in your issue of March 20th, the writer makes the very serious statement that the "Dreadnought" and her improved sisters are "Frauds."

He gives as his reason for the statement that the "Dreadnought's" guns are built for armor-piercing only, whereas the Russians at Tsushima were defeated by high explosive shells. He erroneously states that none of the Russians were sunk in consequence of penetration of armor, but Captain Semenoff clearly states that the Oslyaba was sunk by this means early in the battle. In that author's interesting book he states that the long shells (12 in.) were those which, in exploding, did such awful damage, while the Russians looked upon the 6 in. as nothing. Quoting from the same author, "Hullo, that is only a 6-in., no more portmanteaus (12 in.) now."

Is the writer aware that 12-in. guns can fire either an armor-piercing or a high explosive shell, and what reason has he for supposing that we intend using only the former in the "Dreadnoughts"? Further, why does he suppose that both the Russian and the Japanese latest ships have a main armament of 10 in. or 12 in. guns, presuming such guns are not the best?

It is specially mentioned in the book from which he quotes so much, i.e., the battle of Tsushima, that the light Russian cruisers, Svietlana and Donskoy, although attacked by seven Japanese cruisers, were able to hold out for a considerable time because the Japanese had no heavier guns than the 6 in., in which they were unable to use the high explosive shells. It would be interesting to learn, therefore, what is to be the armament of the small craft, to cost £100,000, "four of which are to equal a 'Dreadnought.'"—Yours, &c.,

C. G. WALKER.

Knowle House, Mirfield.
March 25th, 1909.

THE REFORM OF THE DEATH DUTIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As Mr. Turnbull has discovered your printer's error, and correctly assumed that I wrote "estate," and not "State," I shall only trespass further on your space to note that we are agreed that "the dead man can decide out of whose share of his estate the claims of the State shall be met."

This at least removes the element of unfairness, which I thought, perhaps mistakenly, that Mr. Turnbull in his first letter attributed to the Finance Act.

While Mr. Turnbull holds that "in the case of the death duties payment is ultimately made by the persons who succeed," he confirms our agreement by asserting that "the desire to evade the higher rate" (if there were graduation of the rates of succession duty) "would influence the mind of the testator."—Yours, &c.,

D. B. MCLAREN.

Strathire, Haslemere,
March 28th, 1909.

ACCURACY IN POETIC ILLUSTRATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Isaac's vindication of the accuracy of Tennyson about Bees and Elm-blossom induces me to draw attention to an illustration used by Mr. W. H. Davies in his verses in your last number.

Mr. Davies writes, in expectation of the arrival of his books:—

> "They'll come like Snowdrops to a Bee."

But Tennyson speaks of

> "The Snowdrop cold,
> That trembles not to kisses of the Bee."

Has the Bee, in fact, ever the chance to woo the "February Fair Maid"?—Yours, &c.,

JAS. B. WINTERBOTHAM.

Cranley Lodge, Cheltenham.

FASHIONABLE CACOEPY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Of all the senseless affectations indulged in by those who wish to advertise their superiority to ordinary folk, none is more wanton and uncalled for than the adoption of arbitrary mannerisms and irregularities in diction, pronunciation and spelling. While really learned men, like Professors Skeat and Lounsbury, are laboring towards the simplification and reduction to order of our chaotic so-called orthography and orthoëpy; others, like some of your recent correspondents, seemingly take a delight in inventing or propagating new or old solecisms, for no apparent reason than because they happen for the time being to be fashionable among a certain class of would-be smart society, thus adding further snares and pitfalls to the many already awaiting our devoted school children.

Surely we already have trouble enough with our much-abused aspirate without going out of our way to introduce another category of words in which it is to be immolated, such as "humble," "herb," hostler," "hotel," "humor," "habitual," "historic," "heroic," "heterogeneous"! Dr. Murray very sensibly advocates the sounding of "h" in every case where it is practically possible; that is, in all words but "heir," "hour," "honor," "honest," and their derivatives, and there is, indeed, no etymological reason why it should not be restored to these also. Even he, unfortunately, has not the courage of his opinions sufficiently to insist on it in "exhaust" and a few other such—though he does in "exhale"—such is the tyranny of indolent, ignorant, thoughtless custom.

If our self-constituted instructors would but spend half the energy in discovering and setting forth the correct, analogical, and regular forms of words that they devote to the spread of pedantic snobbisms, we might have our language enriched and beautified, instead of vulgarised and disfigured. Thus we continue, parrot-like (to confine myself to misuses of this one letter) to say "yellow-hammer" for "-ammer," "hermit" for "eremit," &c., and to write it, wrongly, in words like "gost," "gastly," "gurkin," though religiously suppressing its sound in "honorarium"—which, being a purely Latin word, might at least be excepted from the bad example of "honor"—and both sound and sign in "heureca," the first syllable of which is evidently taken by these clever people as identical with that in "eulogy," &c.—Yours, &c.,

EVACUSTES A. PHIPSON.

EQUALITY AND VARIETY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In a sympathetic and interesting article on William Morris in a recent issue of THE NATION occurs the following passage. Speaking of "the degradation and joyousness of the working people," and how these haunted Morris, the writer says "they forced him to gospels of equality when all his nature as artist cried aloud for variety of life."

The suggestion here seems to be that equality would tend to exclude variety. The question whether it does so or not is so interesting that I will ask your permission to say a few words on it.

I think it can be shown that the deadly monotony in the externals of present-day life is largely due to the vast inequalities of means and of social status in the communities of to-day; and that the only chance of our attaining to a healthy, natural variety is by abolishing these differences and placing the members of the community on a plane of equality. Equality is not identity, nor even similarity. In mathematics "equals" are not "similars." You may have any number of equal triangles without any two of them being similar. Whether in figures or solids the variety of form may be infinite among shapes all mathematically equal. Now Morris sought an equality of means and of status which would leave every man free to be himself—to be as individual as he pleased without troubling himself about his gentility. For Snobbery is twin sister to Inequality, and when people mix in classes above or below them—i.e., with their social "superiors" or "inferiors"—snobbery is very much to the fore. The man who is socially small, dining at the table of the socially big man, knows that he cannot be equal, but he may be "similar." This can be done by going to the same tailor and getting a suit of clothes without a single spark of individuality, and precisely resembling those of his titled host. Thus the result of inequalities of status is that at that table all the men are dressed exactly like. But the same principle runs all down the scale. The man who has no chance (unhappy being) of dining with a peer, may dine with a man who dines with a peer, and must (literally) follow suit, and so on through all the grades.

And what is true of clothes is also true of houses, and all the paraphernalia in which the various grades struggle to assert their gentility when mixing with the grade next above them.

Bellamy, in his "Equality," points out that if we want to know the relative heights of a new squad of men, we must put them on a piece of level ground; and in like manner if we want to know the real differences between men in society, we must place them on an equal footing. With our present inequalities, the real and interesting differences are swamped by the vast mechanical and artificial differences in social position. One man is raised upon a mountain of wealth, and another is sunk in a ditch of poverty. What can we know of the real relative value of the two? But the differences are not only disguised and concealed—they are largely suppressed. What chance has either of these had of being what he might be? The one born and reared in squalor, and the other born and reared in idle luxury, are alike undeveloped human beings—neither has had a chance of finding his own individuality.

It is in the educated middle-class where men and women have to work, but with reasonable chance of maintenance, that we have the nearest approach to equality of means and status, and it is here that the largest numbers develop into interesting personalities. I think no one who has the happiness to live in this favored class will complain that there is lack of variety among his friends, or would desire to see some of them changed for so many ragged loafers from the slums, or for so many pheasant-shooting or bridge-playing loafers from the "élite."—Yours, &c.,

HENRY HOLIDAY.

Oak Tree House, Hampstead, N.W.

Poetry.

THE MESSAGE.

Zweet child, dear child, what troubled your soul
  That ye cudden bide in your quiet tomb?
'Tis a month and more zince the bell did toll,
  And we carr'ed ye down through Kinder Combe;
To Clavering Church in Kinder Combe;
  And left ye under the ellum tree,
With your grave avire wi' the crocus bloom,
  And the robin's zong to hearten ye.

Yet dree nights zince, as I laid awake
  And thought on my darling buried deep,
To a vearsome wind the house did shake,
  Though the night was ca'am as a child asleep,
Zo ca'am as my little maid asleep!
  And I heerd a step on the criking stair.
And the heart in my bosom zimmed to leap,
  Vor all of a sudden, you was there!

Aye, you stood there in the moonlight cold,
  Clear shine o' the moon 'longside my bed:
All zilver litten your curls o' gold,
  The crowded curls of your pratty head:
Dear child, your shining golden head!
  You zmiled so sweet, and you stood zo near!
But I cudden 'tarpert the words you zaid;
  They was far and faintlike, Janey dear!

Dear! but 'twas hard! And I did try!
  Zimmed I'd a died vor to understand
What you vramed to say, with your pleadin' eye
  And the beckoning wave of thuck tiny hand!
Dear child, your little lovin' hand!
  I strove to touch un, but all in vain;
Like a dog as zees his measter nigh,
  And chok's hissell on the cruel chain.

Twelve years! a spotless vlower she grew!
  Twelve years! a lily undefiled!
What sorrow, what zin she niver knew
  Could break the rest o' my darlin' child?
My lily alone, my darlin' child!
  Ah! not for your sake you came, but mine,
Vor the Lord would carl me home to you,
  And sent me his angel for a sign.

EDWARD S. TYLEE

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

A BIOGRAPHY of John Dee, the famous Elizabethan mystic and astrologer, has been written by Miss Fell Smith, and will be published during the present year by Messrs. Constable. Dee had been imprisoned as a heretic by Mary, but on Elizabeth's accession he became a great favorite. He was employed by the Queen to cast her horoscope, to choose a lucky day for her coronation, and to ward off the effects of a spell which the discovery in Lincoln's Inn Fields of a small waxen figure transfixed through the heart by a pin, led her to believe had been employed against her. He also won great reputation by the mechanical devices which he employed at a performance of the "Peace" of Aristophanes in 1547. In later years he travelled much on the Continent collecting manuscripts and searching for the philosopher's stone. It was through his influence that a Bill was introduced into Parliament in 1585 adopting the Gregorian calen lar for England. Religious prejudice caused it to be dropped, and it was not until nearly two centuries later that the reform was carried. Dee seems to have been a mixture of dupe and philosopher, believing that he had found the elixir vitae, but stimulating research by his writings and influence. Miss Fell Smith's biography throws much fresh light upon the beliefs current among the educated classes of Elizabethan England.

* * *

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co. are preparing a new edition of Malory's "Morte d'Arthur," with Beardsley's famous illustrations. It will be remembered that these drawings were Beardsley's first work for publication, and that they at once established the nineteen-year-old boy as an illustrator of the first importance. The original edition has long been exhausted, and copies sell at a high price, so that this new issue will be welcomed by book lovers. It is already printing, and will be published at one guinea net.

* * *

A HISTORY of the third French Republic, dealing in anecdotal style with its leading celebrities—political, social, and literary—has been written by Mr. Ernest A. Vizetelly, and will be published next month by Messrs. Collier. Mr. Vizetelly was at Paris throughout the Commune, and remained as a journalist there for several years. His translations from Zola and his biography of that writer are well known to English readers. We understand that Mr. Vizetelly is the author of the anonymous "Court of the Tuileries," which was published a year ago by Messrs. Chatto & Windus. It is one of the best books in English upon the Second Empire.

* * *

THE charm of the bicycle has never received in literature the definite recognition it deserves. As a rule, the delights of cycling have been neglected for the simple humor and obvious gibery of petty disaster—punctures, side-slip, the uncontrolled marauding hen, and the like. But now Mr. J. W. Allen has written, and Mr. John Lane will presently publish, a little volume with the happy title, "Wheel Magic," which, in a dozen or so of essays, explores the pleasant domain of cycling. It shows a light touch, and an agreeable vein of fancy and philosophy, and the work will be dedicated to Mr. T. S. Seccombe, who shared in many of the rides commemorated.

* * *

THERE seems to be a demand for anthologies of French verse just now. Mr. St. John Lucas's "Oxford Book of French Verse" holds the field at present, but it is to have a rival in a book on somewhat similar lines, which Mr. F. Y. Eccles has prepared for Messrs. Constable. We learn that Mr. Daniel O'Connor, who initiated Messrs. Dent's "Classiques Français" series, and is now editing the "Classiques Français Illustrés" for Messrs. Bell, has also completed a selection of representative extracts from the great French poets.

* * *

MR J. A. HOBSON'S new study in economics, the object and scope of which we have already told our readers, is now in the Press, and will be published towards the end of the month. Its title will be "The Industrial System: An Inquiry into Earned and Unearned Income," and the publishers are Messrs. Longmans.

M. EMILE OLLIVIER has nearly finished the fifteenth and concluding volume of his great history, "L'Empire Libéral." He has been engaged upon the work for nearly twenty years, and the veteran author and statesman is to be congratulated on the completion of so arduous an undertaking.

* * *

THE sale of the second part of the late Lord Amherst of Hackney's library ended on Saturday, and will rank as one of the most important book auctions ever held in this country. The total amount realised—allowing for the £25,000 which it is said was paid for the Caxtons—during the seven days was £57,592. There were 1,031 lots, which thus fetched the amazing average of over £50 a lot. No one can see a great collection of books dispersed without feeling a certain amount of regret, though by putting uncommon and scarce books upon the market, a sale of this sort helps buyers with slender purses to add something of interest to their libraries. When auctions of books were first introduced into this country, they met with many opponents, and Evelyn speaks of an auction, "I may call it a diminution, which in a day or two has scattered what has been gathering many years." The first English sale was of the books of Dr. Lazarus Seaman held in October, 1676, by William Cooper, a bookseller who had his shop at the "Pelican" in Little Britain. Some interesting information about these early sales is to be found in Mr. John Lawler's "Book Auctions in England in the Seventeenth Century."

* * *

MR. FRANCIS GRIBBLE'S recent topographical book on "Lausanne" introduces the reader to many names famous in the world of books. It was to Lausanne that Gibbon was sent to be re-converted from Catholicism, and where he employed his time flirting solemnly with Mademoiselle Curchod. Later on he returned to Lausanne, and it was there that he finished his "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." It was at Lausanne also that Benjamin Constant and Madame de Staël met for the first time. Sainte-Beuve gave the lectures upon which his great history of Port Royal was based at Lausanne, and Alexandre Vinet, a theologian and critic meriting more attention than he now receives, was a professor at Lausanne. Others associated with the town are Voltaire, Juste Olivier, Madame de Montolieu, and Dr. Tissot. Mr. Gribble gossips very agreeably about them all and treats also of other aspects of the town and neighborhood. His next book, part of which has already appeared in the "Fortnightly Review," is to be called "Chateaubriand and His Court of Women," and will be published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall.

* * *

MR. EVELEIGH NASH announces a new book on Jane Austen by Mr. W. H. Helm, the author of "Aspects of Balzac." Mr. Helm's book is not a biography; his aim has been to form an estimate of Jane Austen's character and genius, based almost entirely on the evidence afforded by her novels and correspondence.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The City of Jerusalem." By Colonel C. R. Conder. (Murray. 12s. net.)

"William Blake." By Basil de Selincourt. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Sixty Years in the Wilderness." By Henry W. Lucy. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Struggle for Imperial Unity." By Colonel G. T. Denison. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

"A Holiday in Connemara." By Stephen Gwynn. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"A Lute of Jade: Being Selections from the Classical Poets of China." By L. Cranmer-Byng. (Murray. 2s. net.)

"God the Known and God the Unknown." By Samuel Butler. (Fifield 1s. 6d. net.)

"Fresh Leaves and Green Pastures." By the Author of "Leaves from a Life." (Nash. 10s. net.)

"Brittany to Whitehall: The Life of Louise Renée de Kéroualle, Duchess of Portsmouth." By Mrs. Colquhoun Grant. (John Long. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Modern Research as Illustrating the Bible." By the Rev. S. R. Driver, D.D. (Frowde. 3s. net.)

"Studies in the Teaching of Religion." By William Scott Palmer. (Longmans. 1s net.)

"The Half-Moon." By Ford Madox Hueffer. (Nash. 6s.)

"Bussy-Rabutin: Sa Vie, ses Œuvres et ses Amies." Par E. Gérard Gailly. (Paris: Champion 6 fr.)

"La Cathédrale de Notre Dame de Paris." Par Marcel Aubert. (Paris: Longuet. 2 fr. 50.)

"Le Talion." Roman. Par Victor Margueritte. (Paris; Fasquelle. 3 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE WORLD OF GEORGE SELWYN.*

In his very interesting and agreeable book, Mr. Parnell Kerr wonders whether Wesley and Selwyn ever met in the course of their travels to and from the West of England. It would have been a strange encounter. Yet, if the types they represented were incompatible and mutually unintelligible, they both belong fundamentally to eighteenth century England. The England of Selwyn, the England, as Mr. Kerr calls it, of Fielding and Hogarth, the England of Wesley—to understand one of them is to understand all three. Now George Selwyn was not the most distinguished, the most brilliant, the most witty, or the most wicked of the fashionable society to which he belonged. He owes his immortality to none of those excellences, but to Walpole's industry as a letter-writer and to the avarice for gossip and scandal about smart society, which is strong and persistent in the English nature. As Mr. Kerr says, the witty sayings that go to Selwyn's credit in contemporary letters and memoirs are not particularly striking. Nobody would think of mentioning him in the same breath as Fitzpatrick or Sheridan or Canning. But he has in a special degree the tone of his world; his career is the kind of career that a man in his position ought to run; he is pre-eminently characteristic, and, as a consequence, he survives. The world has swallowed volumes about him already, and there is every sign that it is prepared to swallow a good many more.

The life of this fashionable world, with its reckless pleasures, its travels, its love of clever and piquant conversation, its degree of culture, its respect for scholarship, has often been depicted. Birth was not the only passport to a circle that was proud of Hare, and afterwards idolised Beau Brummel, but its standard of tastes and manners was exclusive. This isolation was illustrated, as Mr. Kerr says, by the creation of the famous clubs which separated the aristocratic clique from the common intercourse of the coffee house. The amusements of the more reckless of its members were in a sense their profession. For the men who would now give their names to a company in the City devoted themselves then to running a faro bank. But these men, it must be remembered, were not like the French aristocrats, mere pleasure-seekers, kept apart from politics and affairs by the policy of the Crown. They were the governing class. Some of them did directly very little governing, but they all enjoyed the profits of that class. Take Selwyn's career as an example. He was Member of Parliament either for the family borough of Lugershall or for Gloucester for forty-three years. His public importance has been summed up in one sentence by Sir George Trevelyan: "George Selwyn, who returned two members and had something to say in the election of a third, was at one and the same time Surveyor-General of Crown Lands, which he never surveyed; Registrar in Chancery at Barbadoes, which he never visited; and Surveyor of the Meltings and Clerk of the Crown in the Mint where he showed himself once a week in order to eat a dinner which he ordered but for which the nation paid." Of these sinecures, the richest, the office of Surveyor-General of Crown Lands, was bestowed on Selwyn by Pitt in 1784, after Burke, in his comprehensive measure of 1782, had abolished a sinecure which Selwyn had enjoyed for twenty-seven years—the office of Paymaster of the Works. Now this sinecure system was a regular part of the economy of eighteenth century government. It was one of the ways in which the nation paid its governing class. The nominally honorary character of public work has always been a feature of aristocratic government in England. The comprehensive functions entrusted to the Justice of the Peace in the eighteenth century carried with them no emoluments. Much of the work that was done in France by salaried intendants was done in England by this unsalaried class. But the governing class did not do its work for nothing, nor did it accept as full satisfaction for its claims the power which it enjoyed and used of directing public policy in its own interest. It received as a further endowment the right of providing for its younger sons out of the system of sinecures. Every now and again there was a revolt against the extravagances of this system. Such a revolt occurred in 1782, when the Rockingham Government carried a measure which, considering the interests affected and their power, can only be described as a remarkable reform. But still a great deal remained, as was shown in the next great agitation in the early nineteenth century, and in 1810 sinecures swallowed up a million and a half a year. Horner, it is true, defended sinecures as a means of enabling poor men to go into politics, but the argument in dangerously like the defence of pocket boroughs as a system for bringing men like Burke into Parliament. The Selwyns were maintained by the nation in return for having its affairs conducted and its justice administered by a class. It was an excellent bargain—for the aristocracy, whose rents increased and whose dominions expanded.

It is interesting to note that there never was a time when money was so much prized by politicians as in the days when it was supposed that politics were the preserve of the aristocracy. When Colonel Barré, to whom Pitt gave the Clerkship of the Polls (worth £3,000), was dying, Dr. Goodenough wrote to Sidmouth, who had just made him Dean of Rochester: "I understand that Colonel Barré is in a very precarious state. I hope you will have the fortitude to nominate Harry to be his successor." Harry was Sidmouth's son and a boy at Winchester. Sidmouth did not disappoint the Dean. Such fortitude was not uncommon.

It is no wonder that this exclusive class thought it a sacrilege that outsiders should dream of invading the world in which they divided these prizes. Selwyn was troubled once by the opposition of a timber merchant who started a dangerous candidature in Gloucester. "I am heartily sorry, my dear George," wrote Gilly Williams, "that this damned carpenter has made matters so serious with you." "I was very sorry to find by your last," wrote Carlisle, "you had an opposition at Gloucester. Why did you not set his timber yard on fire? What can a man mean who has not an idea separated from the foot square of a Norway deal plank by desiring to be in Parliament?" The distribution of sinecures was too lofty a business for anyone but a gentleman. This idea was rooted in the aristocracy, and it has been shrewdly remarked by Professor Lowell that when the governing class agreed to the abolition of patronage in the civil service. it was from a fear that the command of that patronage was about to pass into other hands.

In one of his charming digressions in the "Wealth of Nations," Adam Smith analysed the causes of the different standard by which "the vices of levity" are judged by the "common people" and the "people of fashion." He argued that luxury, wanton mirth, intemperance, and the rest might be enjoyed by people of fashion for many years without ruin, whereas a single week of such conduct was often enough to undo a poor workman for ever. "As a consequence these vices were hated and dreaded by the wiser of the common people, whereas people of fashion thought of them indulgently and regarded it as one of the privileges of their position that they were able to practise them without harm or reproach." This certainly was the view of the reckless society whose qualities, bad or good, fill so great a part of the records of the eighteenth century. The Selwyns had their imitators in other classes, and the pages of Fielding and Richardson introduce us to other worlds where a certain character for dissipation was prized as an evidence of social position and fortune.

But if the Selwyn world had an influence as an example, it had an influence as a warning. Cobbett would have hated to have it supposed that there was anything in common between him and Wilberforce, yet many of the pages of the "Advice to Young Men" might have been written by Wilberforce himself. Now there is no doubt that Cobbett was brought to condemn "Tom Jones" and Sheridan's plays, and to preach a hard and rather morose morality just because he saw, as Adam Smith had seen, that the poor cannot afford any of the enslaving vices, and in his anxiety to save the English peasantry, he had his eyes on the imitative extravagant habits that had brought so many of the small farmers to ruin. Wilberforce and his friends looked at the question from a different point of view. They had resumed and revived the great Puritan tradition. Their dislike of the vices of levity arose not from a fear that they would make the poor still less able to defend themselves against the rich, but from their whole conception of life and virtue. They hated these habits wherever they found them, and they made war on all happiness except Puritan happiness. It did not much affect the rich, and none of Selwyn's friends were ever punished for their delinquencies. But it did affect the poor. Poor men were prosecuted under the fierce laws that the Saints brought into play, and, as a consequence of the Puritan restraints on all forms of social pleasure, the poor in the English village, while paying a heavy bill for Selwyn's dissipations, were deprived themselves of innocent joys that might have brought a little color into their sombre lives.

* "George Selwyn and the Wits." By S. Parnell Kerr. With sixteen illustrations. Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.

---

"O. K."*

Mr. Stead has chosen a popular but not an accurate title for his collection of Madame Novikoff's letters when he describes her as "The M.P. for Russia," the representative in this country of the Russian people. "O. K.," during her long residence in England, has represented the three causes of Russian autocracy, Russian orthodoxy, and the ideals and policy of Pan-Slavism. But we are not aware that she ever affected to speak for the Russian people. As a matter of fact, her influence on British public opinion began and ended with her powerful and brilliant representation of the cause of the Slav states in the Balkan peninsula, at a time when their oppression happened to coincide with the dominant political and sentimental forces in the Russian Empire. While it lasted, Madame Novikoff, by the energy of her character, her gifts as a journalist and a pamphleteer, her association with powerful men in this country, and her personal magnetism, put the cause for the Russian policy of those years on lines which finally broke up the senseless and now completely discredited pro-Turkism of Lord Beaconsfield. It ended, when "O. K.," erstwhile the champion of a "Bulgaria, United and Free, from the Danube to the Ægean"—the woman who declared that the betrayal by the Treaty of Berlin of the Southern Slavs left her "so distressed, so ashamed, so wretched"—became the bitter enemy of their union with their brethren, and, later on, the apologist of Lobanoff's abandonment of Armenia.

Mr. Stead thinks that her career was the main factor in the conclusion of the Anglo-Russian entente. But Liberal sympathy with the idealist movement of 1876 owns little or no kinship with the diplomatic and material weapon, forged for strictly interested purposes, of 1908. Gladstone, who plays so great a part in these volumes, drew emphatically away from Madame Novikoff's purely Russian and absolutist policy when, apropos of Russia's final betrayal of Bulgaria, he wrote to her, "I have nothing to do with Imperial negotiations; Peace, and then Liberty, are my watchwords." Peace, undoubtedly, was Madame Novikoff's message to England in the 'seventies. It is doubtful whether Liberty, in our sense, ever was. Mr. Stead certainly possesses no power of criticising the idol which in these two over-long, but fairly interesting, volumes he has set up for us to worship. His book is a mere pæan of adulation of a woman who, while perfectly sincere and straightforward, was an ardent and highly accomplished advocate of purely national, highly exclusive, and entirely authoritarian notions. Mr. Stead does, indeed, in one passage, not more naïve than many others in these volumes, attribute part of Madame Novikoff's influence to her youthful beauty. "It is one thing," he says, speaking of her brother's death as a volunteer in the Servian insurrection, "to read of, or to imagine, misery at a distance, it is another thing to witness it close at hand, and quite another to see a young and handsome woman prostrated with inconsolable grief."

But neither Madame Novikoff's personal attractions, nor her obvious sincerity, nor her gift of feeling enthusiasm and inspiring it in others, allow us to accept without reserves a portrait steeped in the spirit of partisanship, tactless and commonplace in execution, and heavily ornamented with flattery. A more discriminating hand might, we think, have made of this interesting and in some ways important book a trustworthy as well as a brilliant piece of biography. Any woman able to retain friends and admirers so diverse as Gladstone and Kinglake, Freeman and Froude—the four chief figures in Madame Novikoff's social circle in London—must have possessed not only considerable powers of mind, but many solid and also piquant points of character. Kinglake, with playful irony, called her "Miss," and at her instance modified the preface of his "Crimean War." Gladstone gave her his arm after one of the most remarkable public meetings ever held in England, and used her armory of facts and arguments to strengthen him in his war on Jingoism. She seems to have kept the wayward and often intolerant Froude fairly true to the right cause in Eastern Europe. She achieved this singular hold on leaders of opinion in a foreign country without using any power that can be called unworthy, and she undoubtedly formed a link between enlightened policy in two great and widely separated communities. Such a figure undoubtedly deserves a place in the gallery of famous women.

We should not call Madame Novikoff a very literary woman. She had few unconventional opinions, her letters show little freshness or charm of temper, her books are less interesting than her pamphlets, she was more an honest political enthusiast than an adroit or far-seeing diplomatist. Kinglake, indeed, thought her influence on Gladstone a little uncanny. "England," he said, "is stricken with incapacity because you have stirred up the seething cauldron that boils under Gladstone's skull, putting in diabolical charms and poisons of theology to overturn the structure of English polity." Possibly "O. K." played a little with Gladstone's interest in the old Catholics, his hatred of Vaticanism, and his views on Christian reunion. But there is no sign, in these letters at all events, that she either bemused or consciously flattered him, and his letters to her, in spite of Mr. Stead's abundant gift of indiscretion, show him always in a favorable and not seldom in a noble light. His friendship was entirely admirable, kind, gracious, perfectly self-contained, and conducted with due regard, not merely to his own firmly held opinions of public policy but to the interests of his own country and of European freedom. Mr. Stead sees only the devices of the partisan in his drawing away from her later anti-Bulgarian and anti-Armenian views, and her refusal to see the atrocities of Russian irregular troops in Turkestan and elsewhere where they plainly existed. Most Liberals, who do not, with Mr. Stead, regard Jingo as a mere term of abuse for anti-Russians of all types, will think that, save on the Penjdeh incident, when Gladstone was badly informed, and allowing for a tincture of anti-Mohammedan prejudice, his views of Russian policy were sound and just. Agitator and statesman, he kept the two rôles apart, and his tone towards Madame Novikoff grows more cautious as he becomes sensible of the shadow of approaching power. But he was neither faithless nor oblivious of old friendship. One incident his admirers will regret, namely, the pressure which, at Madame Novikoff's instance, he brought to bear on Lord Eversley and Mr. Acland, then members of his Government, to withdraw from membership of the Society of "Friends of Russian Freedom." But it is certain that had he lived through the later period of the Russian terror, he would have taken a different view. What he saw of the Anglo-Russian situation in 1876 to 1878, impelled him to the right course, and he saw it and such agents as Madame Novikoff with sane and truth-loving eyes.

The other chief characters who figure in these letters are too thinly painted to acquire much distinction. Froude's letters are the freshest, Kinglake's the most ironical and acute. Froude's touch is often brutal, but usually sincere. Here is a characteristic note on Tolstoy: "Tolstoy, as I make out, led a loose existence till he grew too old to enjoy it, and then went in for religion and revolution." And on the dying Carlyle: "Carlyle grows weaker and is sulky because he is obliged to go on living. He has lost his interest in everything that is taking place on earth, and is more and more absorbed in the thought of what is coming. He assures himself that Goethe believed in a future life, and he wonders why. Goethe, I imagine, looked at it like Rabelais—as a Grand Perhaps; Cæsar said emphatically, No. For which I praise his sincerity and superiority to cant." For the rest, it would, we think, have been better if Mr. Stead had omitted to praise his own brilliant articles in the

* "The M.P. for Russia." Reminiscences and Correspondence of Madame Olga Novikoff. Edited by W. T. Stead. Melrose. 2 vols. 32s. net.

"Northern Echo," and to quote liberally other people's praise of them. He would also have done well to omit much which he has inserted in this volume, and, best of all, considering his many gifts and services, to bury in deepest oblivion such hysteria as the following letter to "O K.," written in March, 1878: "How awful to think England—that is myself—should meet with its death-blow from Russia—that is you—or vice versâ!"

THE ENGLISH GRAMMAR SCHOOLS.*

The most detailed part of this very interesting book begins with the invention of printing and ends with the Restoration. These two centuries mark a well-defined period in the history of the grammar schools. The invention of printing gave them their text books; the Restoration killed their exclusively classical character. "Under the Commonwealth a Latin secretary was employed for official correspondence. After the Restoration French became the diplomatic language." That sentence tells us what the grammar schools were trying to do during these two centuries. They were trying, with the aid of the resources of the Renaissance, to teach their pupils to speak with ease, correctness, and elegance a language which was in daily use. Latin was not only the language of the diplomatist and the lawyer: it was the language of business. As Mr. Leach, in his work on the grammar schools, put it, everyone who was neither a mere soldier nor a mere handicraftsman wanted not a smattering of grammar, but a living acquaintance with the tongue, as a spoken, as well as a written, language. And, of course, as the language which carried men from one country to another, the use of Latin was encouraged by the Renaissance leaders. The medieval symbol of the unity of Christendom had become, as Professor Watson remarks, the symbol of the unity of scholarship. It is not surprising, for example, that Vives, who was born in Spain, lectured at Oxford, and after being driven out of England for taking the side of Catherine of Aragon, lived and died at Bruges, should have written his "School Dialogues" to teach boys colloquial Latin. Many boys were brought up like Montaigne in France, or the family of Sir Thomas More in England, in a Latin nursery, hearing nothing but Latin all round them from parents, tutors, and servants. The classics that the grammar schools mainly employed were Cicero's Letters and the comedies of Terence. Wolsey laid great stress on Terence in the Statutes for Ipswich School, and in almost all schools the acting of Latin plays was a regular and important institution. Ben Jonson in the Staple of News says of schoolmasters: "They make all their scholars play-boys! Is it not a fine sight to see all our children made interluders? Do we pay our money for this? We send them to learn them grammar and their Terence, and they learn them play books."

It is the distinction of Professor Watson's book that it is based on a careful study of the actual text books used in the grammar schools, but though it is in this sense a book for specialists, it possesses a great interest for a much wider world of readers. For here we can trace a good deal of the history of education down to the Restoration, and the subject throws much light on the social life of England. That history Professor Watson traces back to Charlemagne's proclamation bidding the clergy give gratuitous instruction to the children whose parents wished it. Side by side with the great palace schools for the children of courtiers and nobles, there spring up the cathedral and church schools for the poor. From these beginnings there developed the different classes of schools described in Mr. Leach's well-known book. There were, as Mr. Leach showed, at the time of the Reformation a large number of grammar schools, schools connected with cathedral churches, with monasteries, with collegiate churches or colleges, with hospitals, with guilds, with charities, and, lastly, independent schools. Dr. Hastings Rashdall's investigations led him to the conclusion that "it may be stated with some confidence that at least in the later Middle Ages the smallest towns, and even the larger villages, possessed schools where a boy might learn to read and acquire the first rudiments of ecclesiastical Latin; while except in very remote and thinly-populated regions he would never have had to go very far from home to find a regular grammar school." Now the chantry schools, the largest class of all, disappeared at the Reformation. A chantry was an endowment for a priest to sing mass for the soul of a dead person. Gradually these endowments came to be used for purposes of education, and the chantry priest had superimposed on his original duties the duty of teaching the poor. Mr. Leach quotes the deeds of a foundation of Dr. Langley, Bishop of Durham, in the 15th century, which shows that the main duties of the two chantry priests in that case were to keep a grammar school and a song school, "teaching gratis the poor who ask it humbly for the love of God, but charging the rest moderate fees, such as are usually paid in other grammar or song schools." By the time of the Reformation these schools, which were of all kinds, embracing grammar schools and elementary schools, were extremely numerous, and hence their disappearance under the severe administration of the Chantries Acts of 1546 and 1548 caused at once a great loss and considerable disorganisation. Professor Watson traces the results in the grammar schools. The Chantries Acts, as he says, dissolved the elementary schools, and the "post Reformation" educational system started with a number of re-founded grammar schools only. The place of the old chantry schools was not easily filled. We find first a grammar master combining grammar and elementary instruction; then in anticipation of the systems of Lancaster and Bell, the introduction of pupil teachers to teach the petits, or petties, and finally the substitution of an elementary master for the pupil teacher. At Christ's Hospital there were two masters for the petties, but in an unhappy hour one of them was converted into a pluralist, being given the office of barber in addition, with the result that he neglected his duties as teacher. The schoolmaster for the petties was paid £2 13s. 4d., the barber £2.

The most important type of elementary school, says Professor Watson, before the Reformation was neither the A B C school, nor the writing school, nor even the reading school, but the song school, and he quotes the saying of Horman, "No one can be a grammarian without a knowledge of music." This was, of course, natural enough in an age of oral teaching. Grammar and music were the qualifications of a Chantry priest ("bene legere, bene construere et bene cantare," for example). Nor did all this training go exclusively into the service of the Church. Dr. Watson quotes the career of Thomas Tusser, who studied under Redford in the song school of St. Paul's Cathedral, who became successively a fiddler, farmer, grazier, and poet. In particular, song schools turned out large numbers of pupils who could easily be trained as actors. With the disappearance of the song schools, the school teaching of music declined: in elementary schools where they were founded, arithmetic took its place, and in grammar schools music, like other things, was driven out by the exacting demands of the classics. It remained as an institution in certain schools. The City of London advertised the musical abilities of boys educated in the charity schools of Bridewell and Christ's Hospital as a mode of recommending them as servants, apprentices, or husbandmen! Westminster and Dulwich, among a few other schools, made some provision for it. But if the Renaissance overwhelmed the teaching of music in the grammar schools with the passion for the classics, it stimulated the art and enjoyment of music in life. Professor Watson reminds us of Deloney's description: "Tinkers sang catches; milkmaids sang ballads; carters whistled; each trade, and even the beggars, had their special songs; the bass viol hung in the drawing rooms for the amusement of waiting visitors; and the lute, cithern, and virginals, for the amusement of waiting customers, were the necessary furniture of the barber's shop." In this respect the grammar schools, as Professor Watson shows, got out of touch with the social activities of the times. But, in general, the grammar school system, he thinks, entered deeply into the national life of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and though he quotes the writer on education who speaks of "the reading of Isocrates, Demosthenes, and the most reverend author and orator, Christ Jesus, with the apostles," he argues that the religious motive was throughout the governing element in the foundation and organisation of schools. In this characteristic was preserved the continuity of education from the days of the medieval school. The grammar schools turned the gifts of the Renaissance to the service of religion, and gradually new subjects, such as English literature and history, won their way into the curriculum, not so much for their own sake, as for their value in teaching and developing the use of language. Thus, history provided subjects for an essay, English literature was an aid to rhetoric, and natural history suggested metaphors and phrases. The result may be seen, as Professor Watson remarks, in the resources of expression that mark the literature of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

* "The English Grammar Schools to 1660: Their Curriculum and Practice." By Foster Watson, M.A., Professor of Education in the University College of Wales, Aberstwyth. Cambridge University Press.

CURRENT FICTION.*

Curiously unearthly is the imaginative force shown in "Jimbo." The first few chapters which describe how the robust and bluff colonel discovers that his delicate little son, Jimbo, is an "imaginative child," and sends for the self-confident and practical governess, Miss Lake, to "clean out that fanciful brain of his and prepare him for school with other boys," show that the author has the rare power of thinking himself back into the dream states of a child's morbid apprehensions. Miss Lake makes a bad blunder when she suggests that the Empty House which, standing near the Park gates, figures as "an object of somewhat dreadful delight" in the children's fancy, is tenanted by Bad Things which "might run out and catch you some day when you're passing there alone, and take you back a prisoner." At once Jimbo's imagination begins to be peopled with uncanny nightmares, and when "the shock" comes, and Jimbo is tossed by a bull and succumbs to an attack of brain fever, he has already accumulated all the material for his future wanderings in the chaotic dreamland of delirium. Mr. Algernon Blackwood has set himself a daring and difficult task to picture forth in orderly and artistic sequence this impalpable world of the sufferer's ghostly visions, and to keep a thread of contact between them and the body of the unconscious boy lying on the bed, but he has undoubtedly succeeded. The narrative of Jimbo's dream captivity in the Empty House, kept a prisoner there by the stealthy, hooded, black-winged figure of the monster, Fright, and haunted perpetually by the troop of thin, shadowy Frightened Children, with their sighing, melancholy refrain, all this is eerie beyond question. The paralysing effects of fear, and its fluctuations from the state of choking excitement to that of numb terror, are suggested with nightmarish power by the author, who is too much of an artist, however, to overdo the horrors, and so weaken their grip upon us. The relief comes in the figure of the woman who appears in the Empty House, to aid Jimbo, and, in teaching him to fly, fosters in the little boy's heart the seeds of self-confidence. The later chapters that recount Jimbo's aerial adventures, while on the wing, are again intensely imaginative. It is curious how actual are the sensations, therein communicated, of sailing, soaring, sweeping through the air, and rushing through the night heavens, sustained on skimming, powerful wings. Mr. Blackwood almost persuades us that he has opened the door to some misty state of pre-existence when we were feathered things, and thought in terms of flying. And it is curious, indeed, that in our dreams we find ourselves sometimes flying as easily and as naturally as we walk on earth. As a work of imagination "Jimbo" is quite sui generis, though its uncanny passages hold us captive with a spell that recall certain chapters in Mr. W. H. Chesson's novels.

In "Rachel Chalfont" Miss Sophie Cole accomplished a very interesting piece of work, and it is with sympathetic interest that we follow the doings, thoughts, and feelings of her heroine, Marjorie, in "Arrows from the Dark." Marjorie, who belongs to a lower-middle class environment, has a weak and shifty father, and is engaged to a common and obtuse young shopman in the Tottenham Court Road, is typical of an enormous number of girls in her class, whose mental refinement is far in excess of the means available for satisfying it. Brought by accident into contact with the upper-class hero, the Hon. Tom Trevor, a good-natured, manly, and attractive young Englishman, who sets her up in a Bond Street business, Marjorie, of course, falls in love with him as the ideal man, and it is to the credit of the author's originality that she does not allow any dubious shade to mar the purity of their friendly relations. Tom is in love with his cousin Eugénie, a neurotic and passionate girl, who has, unknown to her family, committed herself with the dead master, Werner Stehmann, the great pianist. Madame Stehmann, in revenge for her husband's infidelities which come to light only at his death, has published anonymously a volume of his correspondence, with the compromising feminine letters included, all, however, unsigned. So far as the shades of feeling between all the women characters are concerned, we have nothing but praise for the book. Eugénie and several of the fashionable women who meet and gossip at Marjorie's bonnet-shop, have been among Stehmann's correspondents, and the emotional tension, and the atmosphere of veiled mutual suspicion, are very true to life. Unfortunately, the author has not caught the tone or shades of breeding of the upper-class environment, in which Eugénie and Tom Trevor are supposed to move. Many of the conversations are crude, and those intimate little touches by which alone an environment becomes convincing, are absent. Humanly the relations and the feelings of the characters are true, but as a social picture "Arrows from the Dark" is naïve and devoid of actuality. Miss Cole will do excellent work, we are convinced, if she will write of the life she has observed, and not of that which she imagines.

Literary confectionery is always popular with the idle class of reader who cares more that the dainties should come from a fashionable shop than that their ingredients should be of the purest quality. The late Mr. Henry Harland had a very light hand in the whipping-up of trifles, such as "The Royal End." His heroine, the fascinating Miss Ruth Aldgate, who has a fortune of several millions, and spends her time in Europe in refusing to marry members of the British aristocracy, including a duke, has "an odd, pretty, witty, frank, clear face," which proves too much for the peace of the Serene and Semi-Royal Highness, Bertram Bertrandoni of the State of Altroude. The amiable and adorable Henry Pontycroft, "one of our great landowners, the head of one of our oldest families," conducts an airy flirtation with Miss Ruth through three hundred pages, both in "the Val d'Arno, with its olive-colored hills, its cypresses, its white-walled villas, and Florence shining like a cut gem in its midst," and in the old colonial home of the Aldgates in New England Oldbridge, with its faint breath of austere Puritanism, drowsy quietude, and serene meadows. The fastidious reader may ask himself indeed whether, in this literary patisserie, too much cheap sugar and dubious butter has not gone to the baking. The characters, in spite of their incessant persiflage, are not really at ease either in their "hereditary" or in their novel surroundings: their thoughts run too much upon the luxuries of bought culture, upon "sumptuous landscapes," and other delights and surfeits of the "sweets of Europe." After "walking in marble halls, and running away from the outrage of the offer of a morganatic marriage with a Crown Prince," Miss Aldgate returns to her New England "wilderness," where, of course, she is soon sought out by the elegant Pontycroft, who comes as an Ambassador "in order to ask you to wear with King Bertram the ermine and the purple." Miss Aldgate answers practically in the historic phrase, "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" and the curtain descends upon a most unreal piece of love-making, and on the American girl's words: "It's a delicious destiny . . . . to be married in the little parish church by that Saint of a Priest, and to live here 'for ever afterwards'! with a break now and then to Europe." The fact that the author is gallantly making believe most of the time, and that his three leading characters are the idealised representatives of a cosmopolitan epicureanism, redeems "The Royal End" to a certain extent from the charge of deliberate vulgarity.

* "Jimbo: A Fantasy." By Algernon Blackwood. Macmillan. 3s. 6d. net.
"Arrows From the Dark." By Sophie Cole. Mills & Boon. 6s.
"The Royal End." By Henry Harland. Hutchinson. 6s.

AN UNCOMFORTABLE FAMILY.*

It is recorded that at a certain performance of Shakespeare's greatest tragedy, an American woman in the audience remarked all too audibly—"An uncomfortable family, these Lears." Certainly, a perusal of their story conveys the same feeling with regard to the women of Bonaparte's household. This sense of personal discomfort extends to the two books before us. In travelling over the same ground we feel that both are given over to the infinitely trivial. One starts with a prejudice against both books upon external grounds. Why is M. Turquan's portly volume described on the title page and on the back of the volume as by "W. R. H. Trowbridge," while the author is ignored? There have been translations greater than their originals—this is not one of them. Mr. Trowbridge has abridged M. Turquan's narrative, and made a very lively volume of it, but he is not the author. In the case of Mr. Noel Williams's volumes, we are repelled by the "thirty-six illustrations." They are very poor examples of half-tone process. A few good photogravures in each volume would have done the publishers more credit. Of the two books, Mr. Trowbridge's is conveyed in the better English, Mr. Williams's is the more rich in detail. We resent with the latter author a number of quite common colloquialisms, as, for example, when we are told that Madame Bonaparte was beginning to find her eldest daughter "somewhat of a handful." Mr. Williams is able to correct M. Turquan at many points, although both in the main naturally use the same authorities. As Mr. Williams includes the mother of Napoleon in his narrative, he has naturally gone to Baron Larrey's "Madame Mère," and Madame Tschudi's book, which is better known to English readers. Both writers have drawn largely upon the "Memoirs of the Duchess d'Abrantès" and the "Memoirs of Madame de Rémusat," but while these earlier books have abundance of justification, we fail to find any in the volumes before us. They have much the effect upon us that we should experience if we were to read a "Life of Queen Alexandra" compiled with the aid of disconnected scraps from a society journal pieced together without much skill. They are not co-ordinated. They have but little relation to the great events of the periods in which these whimsical creatures played so sorry a part. Perchance a book might be written upon the women Bonapartes which might justify itself, a book in which Madame Mère was presented in her relations to her son, showing precisely where and when she affected his policy in national and international affairs. We might learn from such a book precisely how far these three Corsican damsels—the Grand Duchess of Tuscany, the Queen of Naples, and the Princess Borghese—really assisted their brother or marred his prospects. We are disposed to think that they were for the Emperor an entire misfortune. All were in truth little better than vulgar courtesans, although we have a kindness for the beautiful Pauline, the only one of Napoleon's brothers and sisters who clung to him when adversity came. We have conscientiously read through the eleven hundred pages of which these books are made up, and we feel that one chapter of the old memoir writers, of the Duchess d'Abrantès, or of Pasquier, for example, is worth the whole of these three solid volumes. Why are not the "Memoirs of Madame Junot" reprinted in their entirety, in a new translation? The eight volumes before us are dated 1833. Or if we must have a book of more modern character, we advise a translation of Baron Larrey's "Madame Mère," or a rendering of M. Frédéric Masson's "Napoléon et sa famille," of which we have a fragment in an English dress. Of M. Houssaye's volumes on "Waterloo and After," less than a fourth part has been translated. But whatever may be said against the modern tendency to novel-reading, much of it is less unprofitable than books of the type for which Mr. Trowbridge and Mr. Noel Williams have here made themselves responsible. It is too great a glorification of the trivial.

* "The Sisters of Napoleon: Elisa, Pauline, and Caroline Bonaparte. After the Testimony of their Contemporaries." By Joseph Turquan. Translated and Edited by W. R. H. Trowbridge. T. Fisher Unwin.

"The Women Bonapartes. The Mother and Three Sisters of Napoleon I." By H. Noel Williams. With thirty-six illustrations. Two vols. Methuen.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Greek painting, particularly the fresco-painting, of the fifth century B.C., is only familiar to us through the written descriptions of masters and masterpieces, that have been handed down by the ancients. Not a single specimen has been preserved of the painting of this, the most famous period of Greek art; Parrhasius and Zeuxis are only known to us through the pages of contemporary literature, and it is on this literature that all those modern authors who have attempted to reconstruct the art as a living force have had to rely. But in regard to the Greek vase-painters of the same time we are more fortunate, since several pieces are still extant. Their value, moreover, is not confined to helping us to understand this particular phase of art industry. They give us no insignificant clue to the character of the lost frescoes, many of which, according to authorities, were—like the vase-paintings—drawings in flat colors. So valuable, indeed, are the vase-paintings considered in this connection that they have frequently been reproduced as illustrations to books on other forms of Greek pictorial art. In M. Edmond Pottier's volume on "Douris and the Painters of Greek Vases," which has been rendered into English by Miss Kahnweiler (Murray, 7s. 6d. net), we have an interesting study of one of the most famous fifth-century vase-makers and painters. Douris was one of a group that included Euphronius and Hieron; and though here he is the principal theme, the book is also a sketch of the band of potters who helped to make the Golden Age at Athens. It shows how commercial utility, rather than artistry for its own sake, was the foundation of their craft. The close connection of ceramic art with the enormous export trade in wine and oil, which Greece possessed at the time, should suffice to prevent our regarding this pottery as bric-à-brac for the connoisseur. In dealing with Douris himself, the author is illuminating, in spite of the lack of any biographical material. Explaining, to begin with, that he selected this vase-artist not only because there are more of his pieces in existence than can be attributed to any other potter of the period, but also because of his undoubted originality, he builds up a very complete picture of his methods and achievements. It is shown how, as a painter, he progressed from a stiff archaism to freedom of style, how he represents the average Greek's pictorial treatment of mythology, and how he was a pioneer, though not the only one, in the introduction of military and other genre dealing with the life around him. The relation of this art to the Greek epic and the theatre is clearly suggested; and the chapter on Douris's workshop and tools gives much information as to the conditions of labor, brushwork, and colors, and other pertinent matters. The book is finely illustrated throughout, the color plates being specially noticeable for their truth of tint and texture.

* * *

The English episcopal bench is not often recruited from the ranks of men who have done pioneer missionary work in distant colonies, but the present Bishop of Norwich is an exception, and a record of his adventures has been made by the Rev. D. Wallace Duthie in "A Bishop in the Rough" (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.). Dr. Sheepshanks began clerical life, as so many of our present bishops have done, by becoming a curate at Leeds Parish Church, then under that sturdy and attractive old churchman, Dr. Hook. In response to the call for men at British Columbia where gold had just been discovered, Dr. Sheepshanks set out with one companion for that district in 1859. The work was hard but full of incident, and its monotony was broken by the adventures which a man who seeks them is sure to find in a newly opened country. Dr. Sheepshanks visited Salt Lake City, where Brigham Young invited him to conduct Sunday service, saying, "You can have the morning service all to yourself. You can have my chair, and choose your own hymns. You may say what you like, and do what you please." Mr. Duthie claims that this visit paved the way for the sending of a bishop and clergy from the Episcopal Church of America, some years later. Among other places which Dr. Sheepshanks visited was Jamaica, which he reached the year following the Negro Insurrection of 1865, and with the fatality which seems to dog the steps of bishops, he sided with the notorious Governor Eyre, whose cruelty in quelling the insurrection roused so great a storm in

At all Libraries and Bookshops.

SIX SHILLING NOVELS,

PRISCILLA AND CHARYBDIS.

By F. FRANKFORT MOORE, Author of "The Jessamy Bride," &c.

THE STORY OF THYRZA.

By ALICE BROWN, Author of "Rose Macleod," &c.

A ROMANTIC AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS.

By FRANCIS GRIERSON, Author of "Modern Mysticism," and "The Celtic Temperament." Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

Mr. Grierson is known to lovers of critical literature by two small volumes of excellent literary criticism. "The Valley of Shadows" has all the interest and movement of a fascinating and realistic romance.

A NOTABLE WAGNER VOLUME.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF WAGNER.

By ANGELO NEUMANN. With 4 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"Call no man a perfect Wagnerite till he has read and digested this addition to Wagnerian literature. . . This delightful and interesting book."—Daily Telegraph.

THE DAYS OF GEORGE THE FOURTH.

GLIMPSES OF THE TWENTIES.

By WILLIAM TOYNBEE, Author of "Vignettes of the Regency." With Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 Plates. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Mr. Toynbee has the town of that time in his mind's eye, its characters are those he lives with, their stories are his stories, and the living, flashing interplay of real life as it was lived in the Twenties of last century seems to take form and colour under his pen.

THINGS AS THEY ARE.

ECONOMIC HERESIES.

Being an Unorthodox Attempt to Appreciate the Economic Problems presented by "Things As They Are." By Sir NATHANIEL NATHAN. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The author terms this work a study of the economics of reality, meaning thereby an estimate of historical and actual values as opposed to the abstract theorising of the economic schoolmen of the last century. The book is written from the point of view of a shrewd, impartial, unconventional observer, whose politics are subordinated to practical sociology.

MODERN FRENCH WRITERS.

SIX MASTERS IN DISILLUSION.

By ALGAR THOROLD. Penetrating Studies of Anatole France, Huysmans, Maeterlinck, Fontenelle, Mérimée Fabre. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE EX-PRESIDENT OF HARVARD.

UNIVERSITY ADMINISTRATION

By CHARLES W. ELLIOT. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

"Of special interest and value in Oxford at the present time."—Oxford Magazine.

FOR SPEAKERS AND READERS.

NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE; or, a Common-Sense Policy.

By FRANCIS FRANCIS. Cloth, 1s. net; paper, 6d. net.

"Dagonet" says in the Referee—"I have received another excellent little book, entitled 'National Independence: or, a Common-sense Policy.' It is a sixpennyworth of 'Wisdom While You Wait.' And the chapter on 'Universal Service' is a gem."

"A CONSIDERABLE LITERARY EVENT TO NONCONFORMITY."

AN HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION TO THE

MARPRELATE TRACTS.

A Chapter of the Evolution of Civil and Religious and Civil Liberty in England. By WILLIAM PIERCE. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Rev. C. Silvester Horne says, in the British Weekly—"The unsolved problem of Martin's personality lends perennial interest to the drama in which he played so conspicuous and influential a part. This book, which is admirably printed, is the first worthy discussion of a great controversy. We heartily congratulate Mr. Pierce on a notable success, and we urge all our readers who are interested in our history to add this book to their libraries."

FOUR NEW SIXPENNIES.

The Good Comrade - - By UNA L. SILBERRAD.
Mr. & Mrs. Nevill Tyson By MAY SINCLAIR.
The Blazed Trail - - - By STEWART E. WHITE.
The Log of a Cowboy - By ANDY ADAMS.

SEND FOR OUR SPRING LIST.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co. Ltd.,
10, Orange St., Leicester Square, W.C.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE

NOW READY. Demy 8vo, 336 pages. 6s. net.

MAN AND THE BIBLE.

A Review of the Place of the Bible in Human History.

By J. ALLANSON PICTON, M.A. (Lond.). Author of "The Mystery of Matter," "The Religion of the Universe," etc., etc.

WORKS BY HERBERT SPENCER.

"Extremely Interesting Volumes."—Spectator.

Cheap Edition, Just Ready.

2 vols. demy 8vo, cloth, gilt tops, with a number of Illustrations, some in Photogravure, 12s. 6d. net; 13s 6d. post free.

An AUTOBIOGRAPHY by HERBERT SPENCER.

DESCRIPTIVE SOCIOLOGY.

Compiled and abstracted by DR. DUNCAN, DR. SCHEPPIG, and MR. COLLIER. Folio, Boards.

1. ENGLISH, 18s. 2. ANCIENT AMERICAN RACES, 16s. 3. LOWEST RACES, NEGRITOS, POLYNESIANS, 18s. 4. AFRICAN RACES, 16s. 5. ASIATIC RACES, 18s. 6. AMERICAN RACES, 18s. 7. HEBREWS AND PHŒNICIANS, 21s. 8. FRENCH, 30s.

In Preparation.

Edited by HENRY R. TEDDER, Secretary and Librarian of the Athenæum Club.

CHINESE. Compiled and Abstracted by E. T. C. WERNER, H.M.'s Consular Service, China.
ANCIENT EGYPTIANS.
HELLENIC GREEKS. By Rev. Dr. J. P. MAHAFFY, and Professor W. A. GOLIGHER, Trinity College, Dublin.
HELLENISTIC GREEKS. By the same.
ROMANS. By Mr. E. H. ALTON, F.T.C.D., and Professor W. A. GOLIGHER.

FIFTH AND ENLARGED EDITION.

THE PHILOSOPHY COMPLETED.

8vo, Cloth, 21s.

DIGEST OF HERBERT SPENCER'S WORKS.

AN EPITOME OF THE SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY.

By F. HOWARD COLLINS.

With a Preface by the late HERBERT SPENCER.

A SYSTEM OF SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY.

| | | s. | d. |
|---|---|---|---|
| FIRST PRINCIPLES. Thoroughly Revised. Popular Re-Issue Now Ready | | 7 | 6 |
| PRINCIPLES OF BIOLOGY. 2 Vols. (Revised and Enlarged) | | 36 | 0 |
| PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY. 2 Vols. | | 36 | 0 |
| PRINCIPLES OF SOCIOLOGY. Vol I. | | 21 | 0 |
| Ditto Vol. II. | | 18 | 0 |
| Ditto Vol. III. | | 16 | 0 |
| PRINCIPLES OF ETHICS. Vol. I. | | 15 | 0 |
| Ditto Vol. II. | | 12 | 6 |
| JUSTICE (Separately) | | 6 | 0 |

Just Ready. Uniform with New Editions of "First Principles." Entirely Reset. Cloth 3s. net.

THE DATA OF ETHICS.

OTHER WORKS.

| | s. | d. |
|---|---|---|
| THE STUDY OF SOCIOLOGY | 10 | 6 |
| EDUCATION (Cheap Edition) | 2 | 6 |
| ESSAYS. 3 Vols. 30s. (or each Vol. 10s.) | | |
| FACTS AND COMMENTS | 6 | 0 |
| VARIOUS FRAGMENTS. Enlarged Edition | 6 | 0 |
| SOCIAL STATICS AND MAN v. STATE | 10 | 0 |
| MAN v. STATE (Separately) | 1 | 0 |
| AGAINST THE METRIC SYSTEM. Third Edition, with Additions | 0 | 3 |

APRIL NUMBER READY. 2/6 net, 2/9 post free.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS.

CREDO.
IS THERE A COMMON CHRISTIANITY? Professor J. H. Muirhead.
CHRISTIANITY AMONG THE RELIGIONS. John Wright Buckham, D.D.
ISLAM THE RELIGION OF COMMON SENSE. Ibn Ishak.
THE MESSAGE OF MR. C. K. CHESTERTON. Rev. John A. Hutton, M.A.
THE PHILOSOPHY OF BERGSON. Professor William James.
THE SOCIAL CONSCIENCE OF THE FUTURE. II. The New Righteousness. Miss Vida Scudder.
THE INSUFFICIENCY OF SOCIAL RICHTEOUSNESS AS A MORAL IDEAL. Rev. P. T. Forsyth, D.D.
THE OVER-EMPHASIS OF SIN. Rev. Alexander Brown.
THE MESSAGE OF MODERN MATHEMATICS TO THEOLOGY. Professor Cassius J. Keyser, Ph.D.
CHRISTIANITY AND THE EMPIRE IN CHINA. Rev. P. J. Maclagan, M.A., D.Phil.
DIVERGENCIES BETWEEN MATTHEW AND MARK. Rev. B. H. Alford, M.A.
ON THE DISLOCATIONS IN JOHN'S GOSPEL. Rev. F. J. Paul.

With a Number of Discussions, Signed Reviews and Bibliography of Recent Theological and Philosophical Literature.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

England. Perhaps the most interesting section of the book is that describing a later expedition through China into Mongolia and Siberia. Dr. Sheepshanks can boast that he has seen the Grand Lama receiving the adoration of his people at the palace of Khutuktu. The book is a fresh and entertaining record of travel in many parts of the world put in a racy style.

* * *

In these days a writer with some knowledge of history and command of a fairly easy style is put to little trouble if he wishes to produce a book which will be sure to hit the taste of the circulating libraries. He need only make such perfunctory historical researches as will enable him to discover one or two fresh facts about some dead and gone scandal, season with plenty of personal details, add a piquant title, and his task is done. Its title led us to expect that Dr. Angelo S. Rappoport's "Royal Lovers and Mistresses: The Romance of Crowned and Uncrowned Kings and Queens of Europe" (Greening, 16s. net), would be a book fashioned according to this formula, but we were pleased to find that its author must be judged by a standard inapplicable to the mere compiler. He has thoroughly digested his material, and though it may be questioned whether many of the subjects he treats are worth the trouble, he has certainly succeeded in making a readable excursion into the by-paths of history. Foremost among the royal lovers treated in the volume is Henry of Navarre, and thenceforward the reader is taken through the Courts of Europe and introduced to all the reigning favorites of distinction. If there is little of value to be learnt from these compressed biographies, Dr. Rappoport gives us excellent pictures of the different Courts, though we miss any attempt at characterisation of either the Sovereigns or their mistresses. Such a feature, if well carried out, would have lifted the book into the region of serious historical study. As it is, we are forced to describe it as a chronicle of scandals which may possibly appeal to lovers of a certain sort of gossip.

* * *

Mr. R. L. Hobson's book on "Porcelain of All Countries" (Constable, 6s. net), which has now reached a second edition, is as comprehensive in its scope as the title suggests, and, while more severely technical than most of the cheap hand-books published on this always interesting subject, should be popular with all who have studied old porcelain seriously. The first part of the work, dealing technically and historically with the porcelain of China and Japan, is by far the more important and thorough, the periods of manufacture being treated in painstaking detail; but there are useful accounts of the Meissen factory, near Dresden, and its wares, of all the principal French and English establishments, and an outline of what has been achieved in porcelain-making by European countries less conspicuous in that field. It is singular that, although China laid herself out for the export of her porcelain for two or three centuries beforehand, the secret of making the true or "hard paste" porcelain, with which she is associated, was not revealed to Europe until 1709, when it was discovered by Bottger at Dresden, and was made use of by him at the Meissen factory. Vienna, Berlin, Sèvres, and other European centres were quick to adopt this hard paste as an addition to the "soft paste" ware to which they had previously confined themselves. In England, however, the manufacture of Oriental china was less readily acquired. It seems, indeed, to have been restricted to some factories at Plymouth and Bristol, and to have been carried on only for about twelve years. Yet at one time our appreciation of, and desire to make, it was so keen that recourse was had to the rather ignominious practice of grinding-up imported Oriental specimens, in order to make English "hard paste"! It is conceivable that the expensiveness of this method discouraged English manufacturers from further experimenting, though there were doubtless more potent causes as well.

* * *

Books advising this dyspeptic generation what to eat, drink, and avoid, have lately been showered upon us in profusion. Nearly all of them have contained some good counsel, but as the majority were written mainly to expound the virtues of this or that dietary creed, their value as a guide to the individual must not be accounted too high. We may take it that Dr. Stanford Read's "Fads and Feeding" (Methuen, 2s. 6d.) is intended to counteract what is baneful in the faddist type of volume, and to checkmate the dietary adviser who "authoritatively and unscientifically shows the public that for centuries they have been courting disaster by swallowing the wrong food." At any rate, the chapters on vegetarianism, Fletcherism, and other dietetic fancies are distinctly adverse to the unreserved adoption of these by the average healthy individual, while the well-reasoned apologia for the ordinary British dinner should comfort the person who feels he cannot do without it. At the same time, those with only moderate digestive powers are advised to feed little and often, rather than infrequently and much. "Instinct controlled by reason" is the maxim the author would have them follow in regard to most questions of food and drink; but a factor like alcohol is better avoided on the grounds that its abuse comes more readily than its use. There is a breezy, be-sensible quality in his advice, and the book is brightly written.

* * *

Half of Mr. Thornton Hall's "Roads to Riches" (Werner Laurie, 3s. 6d. net) might be described as an elaborated "Who's Who" in money-making. We are given a circumstantial account of sundry millionaires, principally American, of course, and are shown how various occupations, including writing, even, have brought riches to their zealous followers. The "Romance of the Diamond Fields" and the "Luck of the Gold and Silver Mines" are the titles of two subsequent chapters; these, together with "Gold Worship at Monte Carlo" and "Money-making on the Turf," are self-explanatory. The conclusion of the book is devoted to showing how millionaires hoard or spend their gains; and though the daily papers have recently given us one or two startling examples of the freaks and follies of Croesus, the information given in these pages is sufficiently extensive and peculiar to cause the reader surprise. Mr. Hall has evidently been at great pains to collect his material Even the cynic, who may smile contemptuously at the frank wealth-worship that pervades these pages, will find the stories of fortunes made or lost quite pleasurable reading for a spare half-hour.

* * *

Mr. Henry J. Barker has made a special study of the humor of school children, and his latest collection of stories, published under the title of "Merry Moments" (Harper & Brothers, 1s. net), contains some very choice specimens. As an example of the reply unexpected, nothing is better than that on page 41. A teacher had been relating to his class the Biblical tale of Elisha and the she-bears which came out of a wood and devoured forty-two of the children who had mocked the prophet. "And what," asked the narrator, in conclusion, "does this story show?" "Why, sir," came the answer from one examinee, "it shows how many children two she-bears can hold!" Some of the essays on every-day subjects by the intelligent poor have a touch of pathos concealed within their naïveté, and the confusion of ideas betrayed by other pupils suggests a sober thought as to the efficacy of the existing system of teaching, even while it raises a laugh. Apart from this, the book is thoroughly good fun.

* * *

Friends of the late Joseph Cowen will probably appreciate the volume of his political "Speeches" (Longmans, 2s. 6d. net), as edited, with care and judgment, by his daughter. The book will also appeal to a restricted number of outside readers by reason of its informative character and literary quality, and in view of the fact that many of the questions dealt with in the discourses are still very much alive. Mr. Cowen made a special study of the Near Eastern question, and his knowledge of foreign politics in general far exceeded that of the average Parliamentarian. The speeches extend over a period of twenty-one years (1876-97). Some of them have been published in the "Life and Speeches of Joseph Cowen," compiled by Major Jones, others in a little book of "Election Speeches"; the rest have been rescued from the files of the daily papers. The views expressed in them recall Mr. Cowen's place in the political world clearly enough. He was a Liberal Imperialist, who was more of an Imperialist than a Liberal, a staunch Home Ruler, and one of those political philoso-

MACMILLAN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

Social Life at Rome in the Age of Cicero. By W. WARDE FOWLER, M.A., Author of "The Roman Festivals of the Period of the Republic," &c. With Map and Plans, 8vo, 10s. net.

Monuments of Christian Rome from Constantine to the Renaissance. By ARTHUR L. FROTHINGHAM, Ph.D., Professor of Archaeology and Ancient History at Princeton University. Illustrated, Extra Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. [Handbooks of Archaeology and Antiquities.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

The Poor Law Report of 1909. A Summary Explaining the Defects of the Present System and the Principal Recommendations of the Commission, so far as relates to England and Wales. By HELEN BOSANQUET, a Member of the Commission. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Dante's Inferno, Purgatorio, and Paradiso. Translated by EDWARD WILBERFORCE. Three Vols. Globe 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Wednesday.

NEW POCKET EDITION.

English Men of Letters.

Edited by JOHN MORLEY. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. net each.

ADDISON. By W. J. Courthope
BACON. By Dean Church
BENTLEY. By Sir Richard Jebb
BUNYAN. By J. A. Froude.
BURKE. By John Morley.
Others to follow.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

A LAY EIRENICON.

A Paper redd before a Clerical and Lay Society at the house of Mr. R. L. Howard, at St. Albans, 8th February, 1909, by

THOMAS WILSON.

B.A. London, sometime Student at University College, London, and at Trinity College, Cambridge.

Cambridge: ELIJAH JOHNSON, Trinity Street.
London: SIMPKIN MARSHALL & Co., 31, Paternoster Row.
Price 3d.

The Author mainly advocates (1) the putting the elementary schools on the taxes and not on the rates, and (2) full recognition by the clergy of dissenting ministers as brother ministers and frank co-operation between them.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

The Daily News

is now printed simultaneously in London and Manchester.

This means that Liberals all England over are able to get the representative Liberal organ every morning at the same time as their local daily.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

London Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.
Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

BOOKSELLERS.

6/- FOR 2/- POST FREE

2,800 "VICTORIAN" EDITION OF THE

TEACHERS' PRAYER BOOK:

Being the Book of Common Prayer, with Introductions, Analysis, Notes, and a Commentary upon the Psalter, By the Right Rev. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., D.C.L., and a Glossary by the Rev. A. L. MAYHEW, M.A. 16mo, Bourgeois, Large Type Edition. Cloth boards, red edges, 6s. for 2s.; 6 for 10s. 9d.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

The April "BOOK MONTHLY" is Now on Sale, and the Price is only 6d. net, and if you look at the List of Contents, as below, you will see why you should get it.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. Talk in Town and Country about the Affairs of Literature, with a Series of Pictures.
THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCLE. Its Mission as a New Force in the London Book World.
HUGO'S GUERNSEY. His Literary Landmarks in the Channel Islands.—By Edythe R. Paen.
EPISTLES OF RUSKIN. To Brother Bookmen and Great Contemporary Writers.
A LONDON LETTER. Madame Novikoff's Memoirs of Carlyle and Others.—By the Editor.
LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.
THE GENERAL READER. Snap-shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.
NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.
BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of March.
THE PERIODICALS. Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London, E.C.

phers whose independence is the despair of party Whips. His "last message to his fellow-citizens" took the form of a letter denouncing the "insolent brutality" of the Boers.

* * *

Walt Whitman appears to have been the predominant influence on both the style and the argument of Mr. Robert Gardner's "In the Heart of Democracy" (New Age Press, 3s. 6d. net). Whitman's gospel of the will to love is assuredly the keynote of Mr. Gardner's philosophy; Whitman's literary method is reflected in this author's writing, though its outward form is prose, not verse. A Thames-side wharf with its daily illustration of labor serves him for a kind of pictorial setting for the expression of his ideas. He appears to have studied his philosophers from Schopenhauer to Edward Carpenter, and to have evolved out of these and the New Christianity some theories of his own concerning the Cosmic Man. It is unfortunate, therefore, that he should wrap them up in a verbosity that all but conceals their merits. A flash of plain hard truth, such as "Socialism will never conquer as an economic theory, but as a super-economic fact" (p. 82), makes one wish that he would condescend more often to be merely intelligible.

* * *

The story told in "The Letters of a Remittance Man to his Mother" (Murray, 3s. 6d. net), by Mr. W. H. P. Jarvis, is familiar enough to all who know anything of life in Canada. It is that of the young Englishman whose parents, because they cannot find him a suitable opening at home, pack him off to be a Colonial farmer; this in the belief that a thousand pounds and a colossal conceit are sufficient to ensure his success in the rôle. The Remittance Man who makes himself known through these letters is an exceptionally foolish specimen of his kind, but his parents are, perhaps, a little less foolish than the average in that, after their offspring has wasted his substance on a worthless farm and on one or two other Remittance Men less guileless than himself, they cease sending him remittances. The consequence is that he meets hardship face to face, learns a little wisdom through adversity, and finally emerges on top. We confess, however, that we do not very much care about him, even when he marries a Salvation Army lass and appears in a fair way to prosper. His letters rather suggest that he has grown out of a blatant idiot into an equally blatant prig. Still he contrives to embody a fair amount of information about Canadian life in town and country in these epistles; also much moral advice to the effect that Young England should be taught to make money before learning to spend it. The study of the "remittance man" tribe is forceful enough to act as a warning to those middle-class English parents—if there are any left—who cherish the belief that Canada is the natural refuge for the fool of the family.

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning. March 26. | Price Friday morning, April 2. |
|---|---|---|
| Consols 2½ per cent. | 83 1/16 | 84 7/8 |
| L. & N.W. | 131½ | 135 |
| French 3 per cent. | 97 | 97 |
| German 3 per cent. | 85 | 85½ |
| Russian Fours | 97⅝ | 99⅜ |
| Peru Pref. | 33½ | 32¾ |
| U.S. Steel Pref. | 113½ | 116 |

While our statesmen have been indulging in such pronounced melancholia, the City and the Stock Exchange have been quite cheerful. In the Foreign market, the only dark spot has been the Peruvian Corporation, which has been very weak, partly on traffics, partly on rumors. It does not matter to investors and speculators whether Russia has been humiliated or Servia has had to eat the leek. What they care about is that the war cloud in the Balkans has been removed, thanks to the strong pressure brought by Germany upon Russia. This has, at any rate, saved Russia from immediate bankruptcy, and there is always the hope that in the interval some bold financier may spring up at St. Petersburg—some Turgot who will be allowed to save the financial situation. I notice that better trade is predicted both by Lord St. Aldwyn, presiding at the half-yearly meeting of the Bank of Africa, and by the chairman of the Chartered Bank of India. Unhappily, the price of wheat is still rising, the gazette price being actually 36 shillings. Other provisions, however, are mostly cheaper than last year.

The Revenue and the Budget.

On March 31st the financial year came to an end. All the newspapers tried to find out what the deficit was, and the results varied from the "Morning Post's" £192,000 to Mr. Chiozza Money's two or three millions. The proper figure is somewhere between £700,000 and £800,000—a very satisfactory result considering that five or six millions was expected by most of the experts a couple of months ago. In estimating the prospective deficit, there are some elements of uncertainty; but we shall probably be safe in placing it somewhere between 11 and 14 millions.

The Guildhall Meeting.

I hear that some prominent City Unionists, as well as Liberals, refused to sign the requisition to the Naval Scare meeting at the Guildhall. They thought it undignified and unnecessary. Certainly a great many of the big wigs were conspicuous by their absence from the platform. The truth is, of course, that, while Germany is unpopular in the City, there are strong commercial and financial ties between London, Hamburg, and Berlin. Of our big merchant houses, I suppose half are at least half-German, and the relations of the City to Berlin and Frankfurt are so intimate and important that anything approaching war would be well-nigh impossible. The amount of money employed and property owned by German bankers and merchants in London is simply prodigious.

The Steel Corporation's Report.

The Steel Trust's report for 1907 has reached London this week, and quite confirms the impression made by the preliminary figures and the trade reports that have come over to this country. The slump in the American steel industry has been tremendous, and few manufacturers in Great Britain can ever have known such a sudden change from high prosperity to deep depression. The earnings of all the companies in the Corporation amounted during the year to 91,848,000 dols., against 160,965,000 dols., a drop of 69,117,000 dols., or approximately 43 per cent. From this have to be deducted various sums for sinking funds, depreciation, and replacement, and the net earnings work out at 74,883,000 dols., against 133,245,000 dols., a difference of 58,362,000 dols. The amount available for dividend—45,635,000 dols.—is less than half that of last year, but the preferred and common stock, of course, get their 7 and 2 per cent. respectively. Last year out of the surplus net income the directors managed to put aside 54,000,000 dols. (nearly £11,000,000) for expenditure on new property, more particularly the plant at Gary, Indiana, but now such lavish appropriations are clearly out of the question, and the whole of the net surplus is carried to the profit and loss accumulations. I see that in the American papers a great deal of credit is given to the Corporation on the ground that it can still pay its normal dividends in spite of the reduced profits. To a certain extent that praise is certainly justified, but 2 per cent. is, after all, not an exciting dividend for the largest steel company in the world working behind a high protective tariff. Much, too, is being said of the great reduction of debt and the improvements to the property made out of revenue in past years; and the report shows that since the incorporation in 1901 more than 220,000,000 dols. have been used in this way. That, again, is a very creditable record, but it has been necessary mainly because of over-capitalisation at the beginning, and because the directors have decided very wisely to "squeeze out the water." The steel industry does not seem, so far, to be improving, and the New York correspondent of the "Financial News" says this week that the Corporation at present is not earning its dividends. The fluctuations of the preferred and common stock have been very wide in the last eighteen months:—

| | Prices of 1908. Highest. | Lowest. |
|---|---|---|
| Preferred | 118½ | 90½ |
| Common | 60 | 26½ |

The present prices are 49½ for common and 115½ for preferred, the market having risen sharply in the last day or two, owing, it is said, to a "bear squeeze."

Lucellum.

BANKING.

THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given, that the Rate of Interest allowed at the Head Office and London Branches of this Bank, on Deposits subject to seven days' notice of withdrawal, is this day reduced to 1 per cent. per annum.

CHARLES GOW, General Manager,
5, Princes Street, Mansion House.
April 1st, 1909.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is One per cent. per annum, until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.
Bartholomew Lane, E.C., 1*st April*, 1909.

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary

TOURS.

The R.M.S. DUNOTTAR CASTLE (of the Union-Castle Line) is chartered for a series of cruises as follows :—

£21 0s. 0d. ATHENS, TUNIS, CARTHAGE, MALTA, THE GREEK ISLES, April 8th.

£14 14s. 0d. PALERMO, TUNIS, ALGIERS, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, LISBON, April 28th.

Full particulars from Dr. H. S. LUNN, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

TANGYES
TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE
For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE
RED WHITE & BLUE
Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

If you suffer from Liver Complaints
Merit's Liverets will promptly cure you
Prepared, as prescribed by a prominent Physician from purely vegetable ingredients.
MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE
combine both curative and tonic properties, and are especially compounded to avoid that debilitating effect which the majority of Liver medicines produce. Price 1/1½, of all Chemists or direct from MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.
CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name, Merit's Liverets, and the signature, Merit & Co. is on the package.
Spurious imitations are useless.
will promptly cure you

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING
Rowntree's
"Warms & Cheers"
Don't say you do not like Cocoa until you have tasted Rowntree's—it's different.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.
A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.
Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.
SUMMER TERM COMMENCES APRIL 28th, 1909.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.
Careful and Individual Attention.
FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.
Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.
Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS, Near Birmingham.
BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.
Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauset Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.
Six Scholarships (£60 and under) will be offered on June 16th. Examination at Giggleswick, in London, or at Preparatory Schools. Particulars from Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle Yorkshire.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.
(The Royal Naval School.)
Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army Recognised by the Army Council. Large Playing-fields, Gymnasium. Swimming Bath; Chemical and Physical Laboratories; Cadet Corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarships Hertford and Merton College; Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c
NEXT TERM, April 28th. Apply Headmaster: Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.
THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.
Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.
House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.
Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.
Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.
Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.
ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.
Freehold from 1,000 guineas Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations 30 minutes from London.
Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

MISCELLANEOUS.

OLD-FASHIONED COTTAGE surrounded by good garden. Six rooms, good kitchen and range, and large outbuilding. Dry and convenient. Not overlooked. Tradesmen's entrance. Old-world, unspoilt part of Essex. Station about hour from City. Good service of tradesmen and postal facilities. £25 to good tenant.—P., c/o "Nation" Office.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh
STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor
MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager
ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station
NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment
ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647
HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for
HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE EUSTON
Close to King's Cross and St. Pancras Stations.
THE
UNIVERSITY
HOTEL
ENDSLEIGH GARDENS, Gordon Square
LONDON

Close proximity to Tube Station for all parts of London. Beautifully Furnished by MAPLE. Comforts and Food Equal to anywhere in London, but prices strictly moderate. Sanitation perfect. Fireproof Floors. Lifts, Baths every floor. Lounge, Billiards. Spacious Dining Room. Write Manager for illustrated Tariff Booklet.

BEDROOM inclusive of Breakfast, Lights, and attendance, from 5/-

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.
THACKERAY HOTEL
Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.
KINGSLEY HOTEL
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.
Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.
BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.
Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.
FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.
Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day
PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.
NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate
SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager
ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day
HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.
MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

VOLUME 2. No. 1. MONTHLY, 2s. 6d.

ENGLISH REVIEW

For APRIL

Will contain Contributions by THOMAS HARDY, ARNOLD BENNETT, EDWARD HUTTON, JOSEPH CONRAD, BARON IGNATZ VON ASCHENDROF, STEPHEN REYNOLDS, EDWARD GARNETT, EDWARD THOMAS, EDGAR JEPHSON, DR. LEVIN SCHUCKING.

The Editorial will deal with THE TERRITORIAL MOVEMENT, and there will be a Special Article by the celebrated International Criminologist, DR. SIMON, on

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IN FRANCE.

Contributors to the preceding numbers have included Messrs. Thomas Hardy, Henry James, Joseph Conrad, Geo. Meredith, T. Watts-Dunton, John Galsworthy, Violet Hunt, Count Tolstoi, Anatole France, Emile Verhaeren, D. G. Rossetti, Gerhardt Hauptmann, W. B. Yeats, Granville Barker, H. G. Wells; and among the contributors to the early numbers of Vol. II. will be found M. Camille Pelletan and the President of the United States.

Owing to the exigences of the American Copyright Act President Taft's article on his Judicial Decisions and on his Election cannot appear until the June Number, but he is contributing to the May Number of the English Review an article on the Panama Canal.

DUCKWORTH & CO., HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

ENGLISH REVIEW

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 2.] SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Diary of the Week ... ... | 37 |
| Politics and Affairs:— | |
| Ideals and Practice ... ... | 40 |
| A Revolutionary Strike ... | 41 |
| The New Naval Charter ... | 42 |
| Risks of Railway Amalgamation ... ... ... ... | 44 |
| The Future of the Worker-Student ... ... ... ... | 45 |
| Life and Letters:— | |
| The Power of Pity ... ... | 46 |
| How Ah Sin Sang ... ... | 47 |
| Judas in Legend and Folk-lore | 49 |
| The Moving of the Wheels ... | 50 |
| Present-day Problems:— | |
| The Poor Law Commission and Voluntary Agencies. By Social Reformer ... ... | 51 |
| The Drama:— | |
| Dolls' Houses. By H. W. M. ... | 52 |
| Communications:— | |
| A Radical Member's View. By a Radical M.P. ... ... ... | 53 |
| Letters to the Editor:— | |
| The Hero Cult in Modern Irish Literature. By Alice L. Milligan ... ... ... ... | 53 |
| London University Commission. By Professor Kirsopp Lake ... ... ... ... | 54 |
| Loyalty to Party. By X. ... | 54 |
| The Art of J. M. Synge. By W. B. Yeats ... ... ... | 54 |
| Votes for Women and Adult Suffrage. By H. B. Dowson and Lionel Barrett ... ... | 54 |
| The Appeal to Force. By a Lover of Milton ... ... | 55 |
| A Secret Doctrine. By the Rev. F. G. Montagu Powell ... | 55 |
| Crimeless Ireland. By Veritas | 56 |
| Differentiated Income-tax. By Ex-Teacher ... ... ... | 56 |
| Naval Expenditure and the Suffering of the People. By C. E. Playne ... ... ... | 56 |
| Poetry:— | |
| The Ballad of O'Farrell. By C. H. Bewley ... ... ... | 56 |
| The World of Books ... ... | 57 |
| Books to be Read ... ... | 57 |
| Reviews:— | |
| Greenwood v. Shakespeare ... | 58 |
| Religious Thought in the Last Century ... ... ... ... | 59 |
| The Turkish Miracle ... ... | 60 |
| The Centenary of Gogol ... | 61 |
| America of the 'Fifties ... ... | 62 |
| Militant Art Criticism ... ... | 64 |
| Books in Brief:— | |
| The Nineteenth Century and After ... ... ... ... | 66 |
| British and Foreign Arms and Armor ... ... ... ... | 66 |
| El Greco ... ... ... ... | 66 |
| Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs ... ... ... | 66 |
| William Callow ... ... ... | 68 |
| Botticelli ... ... ... ... | 68 |
| The Week in the City. By Lucellum ... ... ... ... | 68 |

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The statements of the "Observer" that the eight "Dreadnoughts" are "secured," and that the Prime Minister has "decided" that they must be begun and provided for within the present financial year, like so many statements of the same kind which have appeared in that journal, are a mere invention. No such decision has been taken or, in the nature of things, could be taken. The same statement applies to the stories in the "Daily Telegraph" of dissensions in the Cabinet on the subject of the Budget. There has been no dissension, and there is every reason to believe that the Cabinets which have discussed and helped to shape the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer have been marked by unbroken harmony.

* * *

The Conservative Party have now officially decided to turn the scare about the Navy into material for a party campaign. Meetings are to be held all over the country, the substance of which will be a call for eight "Dreadnoughts." Mr. Balfour has thus made himself responsible for one of the most contemptible and factious moves in party politics. A recent speech of Lord Derby would seem to show that it is not unconnected with a plan to spur the House of Lords up to the point of rejecting a Budget which would be odious to them, not so much because it provides too few ships as because, to use Mr. Runciman's phrase, it is likely to "make the patriots squeal." All that we can say is that we shall believe the Lords capable of such a plunge into revolution only when we see them take it. They cannot reject a Budget, for to do so would be to throw the services into confusion, and even to make the collection of certain annual taxes illegal. Mr. Balfour is an unprincipled and, in some respects, an almost reckless party leader, as every student of his career well knows, but even if he is so uncalculating, the moderate spirits in Conservatism are not. Meanwhile, the unreality of the scare is seen in the steady rise of Consols and various gilt-edged securities, and the gradual revival of trade.

* * *

The success of the French postal strike has precipitated the question of the right of association of State employees. The great Act of 1884 gives private workers the right to form trade unions in the fullest sense, and to strike. But the Government and Parliament have always taken the view that this Act does not cover State employees. Nevertheless, the legal position of civil servants has not been defined. Many sections of them have formed simple friendly societies; others have organised themselves in trade unions and co-operated with other trade unions. The postal strike has determined Parliament to take in hand a law defining the right of association of civil servants on the basis of permitting them to form friendly societies, but denying them the right to strike. Under the auspices of the "revolutionary" Federation of Labor a huge meeting was held in Paris last Sunday to protest against this measure.

* * *

Most of those present were private workers, but there were a number of civil servants, and the speakers included several State employees who had been dismissed for "revolutionary" activity. The meeting adopted a resolution demanding the fullest freedom of association for all civil servants, repudiating the Bill before Parliament, and offering the civil servants the assistance of all organised workers in resisting it and to protect any who might be punished by all means, including the general strike. It was further resolved that certain trade unions should approach the associations of civil servants with a view to nominating a joint vigilance or strike committee of 24.

* * *

Our Paris correspondent writes: "The Conservative press is in a panic about the new movement and its consequences. The 'Temps' and the 'Journal des Débats' prophesy the imminent dissolution of society, followed by the disappearance of France from the map of Europe. The reactionary press talks of the downfall of the Republic, and prepares to reap advantage from the general scrimmage. It is not probable that things have gone quite so far as this. Undoubtedly the postal strike has materially altered the situation. The public servants, instead of being ruled by a quasi-military discipline, will henceforth have to be taken into consultation. It is the inevitable result of democracy, but many people who think themselves democrats do not realise its implications. Meanwhile the elections of last Sunday once more showed a Socialist advance. Everywhere the Socialist polls increased at the expense of the Radicals. An interesting feature of the elections was the large poll of M. Marc Sangnier, the leader of the Sillon, in one of the arrondissements of Sceaux. He received a large number of Radical votes, and was beaten by the Socialist by a majority of only 1,100 odd. M. Sangnier declared himself a Catholic, a democrat, and an anti-clerical; his character is singularly amiable and elevated, and he has long been the leader of a democratic semi-Socialistic Catholicism. His relative success will hardly be agreeable to the Vatican, especially as he seems to have received the bulk of the Catholic vote."

* * *

Liberal nervousness about public opinion should be stayed by the result in East Denbighshire, where Mr. Hemmerde, met with a strong Unionist candidate, beat him by 2,721 votes, 70 within the extraordinary majority he secured at the General Election. Mr. Hemmerde fought his contest not on any trimming policy, but on advanced Radicalism, interpreted by a vigorous message from Mr. Lloyd George, calling on the electors to vote for peace and social reform. The Navy scare was vigorously worked, but does not seem to have influenced a vote. Mr. Hemmerde, in a speech of thanks for his return, well said that the message of the constituency to the Government was: "Do not be afraid of Liberal principles."

* * *

Captain Kincaid-Smith, who went with the Opposition in the Vote of Censure, and has never been more than a Liberal of the Liberal League type, has definitely seceded from his nominal party, and proposes to resign his seat in order to fight it as an advocate of "national military training," which he quaintly distinguishes from "conscription." His constituency, South-West Warwickshire, was an old Unionist stronghold, and he only won it in 1906 by the narrow majority of 148 votes. Naturally, therefore, having alienated the Liberals, he makes his appeal to the electors to "cast aside party ties." But the patriots of the Navy campaign having, as the "Times" correspondent suggests, their own "national defence candidate," prefer him to Captain Smith, and will undoubtedly support him. The incident, small as it is, is a much-needed lesson in the inwardness of these "patriotic" campaigns, in which the only genuine currency is the small change of party advantage.

* * *

There is very little left of the various legends that Russia yielded to Austria under "pressure" from Germany, or a threat of mobilisation or war. The "North German Gazette" gives these fables an authoritative denial. Servia, it says, would not give up her claims upon Bosnia until the Powers sanctioned the annexation. Thereupon the German Government, "in accordance with its traditional friendship with Russia," suggested that she might end the Balkan crisis by announcing her willingness to sanction the annexation. "The result of an exchange of opinion between Berlin and St. Petersburg was Russia's assent to Germany's well-meant proposal, whose entirely friendly and peaceful character was thoroughly appreciated." There was no trace of a threat, and there could, therefore, be no yielding to a threat. The "Rossiya," M. Stolypin's journal, confirms this account, and adds that Germany pointed out that if her mediation was not accepted, she would have "to leave her ally the choice of methods called for by the circumstances. The Russian Government had, therefore, to consider, on the one hand, the certainty of an armed Austro-Servian conflict, and on the other the substitution of one method of expressing the collective will of Europe for another." If the Russian, French, and English papers have circulated the fable of German threats, the explanation is easy enough. The Russians who are Liberal hate Germany because they think she supports absolutism; those who are reactionary are also Panslavist. The French Press has not yet entirely shaken off its taste for picking quarrels with Germany, while no tale which promises to make bad blood between this country and Germany is too gross for our own Jingoes.

* * *

Portugal is going through her second Cabinet crisis since the assassination of King Carlos fourteen months ago. The Amaral coalition Government, formed then to pacify the country, broke up at the beginning of this year, and the majority of the Liberals, headed by Senhor Vilhena, withdrew their support from Senhor Campos Henriques, the new Premier. The new Cabinet did not last long. The Opposition attacked it vehemently, and its guns were turned in particular against Senhor Espregueira, the Minister of Finance. This Minister was denounced for having contracted a loan on exorbitant terms, and having himself made a profit out of it by allotting a portion of the loan to a bank in which he was interested. The Opposition demanded an inquiry, and when it was refused commenced a systematic obstruction which made Parliamentary business impossible. The Government was compelled to resign, and until now no party leader has managed to form a Cabinet to take its place. Nothing has been done since Dom Carlos's murder to set the country in order, and there has been simply a return to the old "rotativism" of parties and the old corruption. The State is completely in the hands of the priests and the financiers. The Monarchy has lost all prestige, and the Republican movement becomes more formidable every day.

* * *

The South African Parliaments have been busy during the past week discussing the Draft Constitution. On Friday the Orange River Colony Legislature approved it without amendment. On the same day, after a three days' debate, the Transvaal Assembly unanimously accepted the Constitution, and on Saturday the Transvaal Senate did likewise. The Act of Union has a harder road in the Cape Colony and Natal. In the Cape two different lines of attack have been opened. Mr. Schreiner objects to the color discrimination—it should be noted that there is a tendency in the Transvaal to regard this discrimination as not stringent enough—while the friends of Mr. Hofmeyr dislike the single transferable vote, and think the country districts are not given a fair weight. In Natal the criticisms are economic. Natal is afraid that rival industries may be developed in the Transvaal, and some people dislike the strongly unitary character of the Constitution and the whittling down of provincial authority. Probably the Constitution will get through the Cape Parliament without serious amendment, if any at all; but amendment is more probable in Natal. Natal is to have a referendum after her Parliament has pronounced.

* * *

The Housing Bill, which has been much improved by last year's exhaustive examination in Committee, was proposed for second reading in the House of Commons on Monday. Mr. Burns and Mr. Masterman were able to satisfy the Commons Preservation Society that open spaces will not be endangered by schemes of town planning, and protective words will be introduced in Committee. The County Councils have been restored to their proper place in the hierarchy of local authorities, and pressure by the Local Government Board has been somewhat lightened. The proposal for a local register of houses was much welcomed by reformers. Mr. Burns laid special stress on the lengthening of the period for the repayment of loans to eighty years, on the prohibition of cellar and back-to-back dwellings, on the strengthened obligation put upon landlords to keep their houses in a state fit for human habitation, and on the excellent provision that in future every County Council is to have a medical officer at its sole disposal. The Opposition was captious, but not seriously hostile.

* * *

The Reichstag has separated for the Easter holidays with the fate of the bloc still unsettled. The blow dealt by the intimation of Herr von Norman in the name of the Conservatives to the Liberals and Radicals that these parties could not co-operate to carry out the reform of the finances has been somewhat softened by the subsequent eagerness of the Conservative press to explain that the intimation was informal; but the determination of the Conservatives to retain the bounty given them by the present spirit duty was interpreted by some Radicals as inconsistent with the continuance of the bloc. Prince Bülow, speaking on Tuesday week, tried to persuade the Reichstag that the bloc was sound at the root, and would spring up afresh and outlive them all. The party leaders, in reply, were at least good enough not to call it dead: but they are no nearer now than ever to an agreement with regard to the new taxes. On the other hand, the Liberals and Radicals are hardly less anxious than Prince Bülow to keep the bloc alive. If it breaks up, the Conservatives and the Centre will be the governing parties. Prince Bülow, after his repeated declarations, can hardly work with the Centre, and the most live part of German Liberalism is a liking for official sunshine and a hatred of clericalism.

* * *

Bishop Gore's inhibition of Canon Henson from preaching at an Institute connected with Carr's Lane Chapel, Birmingham, and the threatened proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts raise a point of some importance regarding the future relations of Churchmen and Nonconformists. The contention that every Anglican vicar can prohibit any other Anglican clergyman from preaching in a building that happens to be situated in the geographical area covered by his parish is absurd, though not more unreasonable than several other provisions of ecclesiastical law. In practice it means that all residents in a parish, whether Churchmen or not, are debarred from inviting any Anglican clergyman to address them if his theological views are not in agreement with those of the incumbent. The English Church of to-day is the home of so many warring theologies that a rigid application of this law would be intolerable, and we have every sympathy with the Bill introduced by Sir George Kekewich on Wednesday, abrogating this system, and giving facilities for the interchange of pulpits between Churchmen and Nonconformists. On the particular quarrel Canon Henson's retort to Bishop Gore that, "in the teeth of the plainest declarations of law," the Bishop tolerates certain Ritualistic practices, because "their suppression would inflict a grievous wound on many consciences," is a rather deadly criticism of his position. The whole episode is an ironical commentary on the Easter messages of unity proceeding from so many Christian pulpits.

* * *

Since December 27th, Japan and China have been trying to settle by negotiation a series of disputes relating to Manchuria. The negotiations have led nowhere, and lately the Chinese Government formally proposed to submit the whole case for decision by the Hague Tribunal. The matters at issue are of great importance. They include the veto by Japan on the Fa-ku-Menn railway for the building of which Englishmen hold the concession; the refusal of Japan to allow the Northern Chinese Railway to be extended to Mukden; the building of a branch line to Niu-Chwang; and the possession of the Chien-tao territory, a huge district which has long been occupied by China, but which Japan now claims to belong to Korea. The Japanese Government has refused arbitration point-blank. The official apologia says that diplomacy has not been tried, and that the matters in dispute are not suited to arbitral decision. This explanation convinces nobody. It is the general opinion that the Chinese case is so overwhelmingly strong that Japan dare not risk appearance before a judicial tribunal, and prefers to trust to superior power to squeeze out of China what Japan has no right to have.

* * *

We are glad to see that the English Positivists are not following Mr. Harrison in beating up for an Anglo-German war. We have received the following address, by the "Church of Humanity" in Liverpool, to the "women and workmen of Liverpool":—

> Do not be deceived into supporting the cry for larger naval and military armaments.
>
> The cause of the people is the same throughout Europe and the world; any increased military expenditure in England stimulates those interested in military expenditure in other countries to put still heavier burdens upon working people.
>
> Insist on your leaders pursuing a friendly policy towards other nations, and there will be no fear of war. A navy stronger than that of any other country is felt by other nations as a menace, and may encourage your own leaders to be unreasonable in any differences that may arise. Trust the women and workmen of other countries to restrain their leaders. The burden and cost of armaments has to be borne by the workers, directly or indirectly.
>
> Peace and Goodwill Among Men.

* * *

We are also informed from an authoritative source that practically the entire Positivist body in this country repudiates Mr. Harrison's letter to the "Times," as we hope practically the entire Labor Party repudiates Mr. Blatchford's incitements to war. In the Church of England, we note that the Bishop of Hereford, the Bishop of Southwark, and Canon Hicks have vigorously denounced the scare, and its authors. Mr. Jowett and Mr. Horne have spoken for Nonconformity. But on the whole, it has been silent. Surely it does not accept the criticism that while it speaks freely on political issues, it is dumb when moral issues arise.

* * *

The University Boat Race ended, as the more careful critics expected, in a victory for Oxford. The race was stubbornly contested up to a point below Barnes Bridge, when, after holding Cambridge well, the Oxford stroke quickened, and his boat went straight away from the Light Blues, who never again caught them, or looked like catching them. Both crews were exceptionally powerful—the average height in each boat was 6 ft. 1 in.—but Cambridge approached staleness, while, on the Oxford side, eight promising, if rather ragged, oarsmen were in a fortnight whipped up to the utmost point of excellence by brilliant coaching. Therefore, when the famous Cambridge stroke, Stuart, made his usual attempt to row down his opponents in the first stages of the race, he found himself beaten by the strength and the fine oarsmanship of Oxford.

Politics and Affairs.

IDEALS AND PRACTICE.

It is the fate of this generation to be met at every point with the contrast between its ideals and its practice, and between the various forms of its activities. In the week when the Christian world celebrates the great example of unresisting surrender to violence and death, its statesmen are endeavoring to fix it more firmly than ever in the doctrine of meeting force with force, and base even their hopes of peace on the proper adjustment of national armaments. And, on the other hand, so far from countering or abating all those influences which tend to bring men together for common purposes of livelihood and assistance, the chief citizens of these armed States forward and encourage them. On the one hand, they speak of an inevitable war between Germany and ourselves; on the other, they, or their countrymen, are parties to innumerable acts of peaceful co-operation wherein Englishmen and Germans, so far from killing each other, feed each other, clothe each other, visit each other, exchange each others' discoveries and ideas about religion, science, literature, social reform, municipal government, and even the means of lessening the area, the occasions, and the ravages of war, and founding and extending the reign of international law. So that, as the result of these forces, the world, in spite of its tariffs and frontiers, is more united than it ever was; exchanges more services than it ever did; is more like a single State than at any other period of its history. While it talks of battles and invents new and terrifying machines of slaughter, it becomes more and more unwarlike, and fosters the science of healing in all its branches, even those which mitigate the horrors of war. Many tendencies, which superficially point to an aggravation of war, point in this direction. Private murder, capital punishment, all forms of violence, become more and more repugnant to the average ideas and consciences of mankind. Other stimulants to force are disappearing. Science, for example, is killing the glamor, the element of personal excitement, of war. The days of hand-to-hand encounter are over; modern land campaigns mean in the main endless marchings and fatigues, with huge armies pining away in mud ditches, and suffering heavier losses from disease than from wounds or violent death. Moreover, calculations that depend on mechanical instruments like "Dreadnoughts" become more and more doubtful and insecure. We see, for example, that at the Mansion House meeting of the Aerial League Sir Hiram Maxim stated that in his opinion the "advent of the flying machine would have a strong tendency to do away altogether with warfare between the civilised nations," while an English firm in Paris wrote declaring that the "time was coming when big battleships would be obsolete." War, therefore, is threatened, even while men talk most wildly about it, with fresh obstacles which spring from the clearer moral purpose of men, and from the unconscious reaction of one form of their activities on another form. As against the fears and forebodings of social dissolution, thousands of individuals—laborers, women, self-sacrificing and helpful personalities of all classes—keep society together by the inevitable law of daily life—the law of mutual helpfulness and affection, and preach the falsehood and folly of racial or national antagonism.

It is indeed the constant war between the ideals and the normal actions of men and their professional and political creeds which accounts for so much of the unhappiness and pessimism of our time. We are unhappy because we do things which we know are not right, and many of us rage inwardly and outwardly at the rebukes which such action meets. Mankind resembles in its present state those spirits of Swedenborg who, being neither determinedly good nor fixedly evil, hang between Heaven and Hell, scorched on the one hand by that light and tortured on the other by those flames. This contradiction besets Liberalism as it besets every other contemporary form of intellectual activity. The party which lives by moral force finds itself responsible for government at a time when belief in material strength seems to rule the European world, and when to the superficial eye it appears impossible to approach the special type of men who rule German or Austrian destinies with other than material weapons and calculations. Yet this account even of the diplomatic world is not true, either for us or for our neighbors. It was not physical force which settled South Africa, any more than it is the element which binds the Colonies to the Mother Country. And, on the other hand, the frightful collapse of the Russian revolutionary movement was due to the use of physical force, just as the slower fall of the remains of autocratic rule is decreed by its intellectual weakness and its failure to satisfy the public opinion of Europe or of Liberal Russia. It is here, indeed, that we touch the new source of strength for democracy and civilisation. In the end public opinion, if it can be organised and saved from the perversities of the sensational press, constitutes a moral factor of incalculable vigor. It is not, perhaps, a quickly evolving agent of change. But, on the other hand, it is not a mere conservative or stationary element in modern society. It moves, as the earth moves, not before the eyes, but in clear view of the intelligence of mankind. And its influence makes against all those excesses of material power of which Sir Edward Grey spoke with such grave concern in his speech of last week. Badly as the Russian movement for freedom has gone, European opinion has sensibly modified the reaction. And in its turn it would be hostile to any such movement for "dominating" Europe by armed force as our Foreign Secretary predicates of the German Empire. Moral considerations helped the Finnish patriots, and, even through the badly tangled controversy in the Balkans, had much to do with its issue. All theories to the contrary implicitly deny the progress of the race. They assume that some fiendish and intractable element resides in society. But this is a conclusion which, in his private life, man knows to be baseless or mistaken. The great mass of his fellows are not fiends, and if bad and misguided or short-sighted and egotistic personalities often get to the top, their power for evil is limited. In spite of some recent lapses and errors of tone on the part of its chiefs, Liberalism will not be identified with Imperialism, but, as the naval scare shows, will be compelled to leave that rôle to the party which is able to speak the Jingo accents as if it believed in them.

It is, therefore, essential for enlightened men to distinguish between what is bad in their political institutions, what remains to them as the inheritance of old passions and forms of unsettled or barbarous existence, and the new light which streams irresistibly on civilised mankind. The future is not with war. It is with arbitration. It is not with any form of coercive institution. It is with persuasive, reasoned forces of government, interpreting the enhanced moral sense, the less aggressive, the more reflective and tempered, qualities of mankind. Much that we call decadence is precisely this more rational outlook on the problem of existence. The gradual conquest of nature, the passion of curiosity that our increasing closeness to her secrets inspires, the admission of the laboring classes to a share in the leisure and treasure and pleasure of civilisation, the increased compunction of all classes, growing with their growing knowledge of the internal evils of the community, will create bodies of opinion too intelligent and too refined to give themselves up to the gross waste and cruelty of war. It is not even true that the Europe of to-day exists on force. The smaller Powers almost do without it. For generations they have rested on treaties, not on armaments, on paper guarantees which the great Powers at once supply and respect. And in the larger States the demands of the war services and the requirements of social reform are meeting each other as determined enemies, one or the other of which must give way. Can there be any doubt as to the issue? The night of barbarism is over for ever; we are at the clear dawn of civilisation, and it is not thinkable that war, the worst creature of the darkness, will survive it.

---

A REVOLUTIONARY STRIKE.

The success of the Paris postmen's strike seems, for the moment, to have turned the heads of the wilder spirits of French trades unionism. That is the way of human nature. The postmen, without preparation and almost without organisation, succeeded by one of those improvisations which are so characteristic of the French temper, in defeating a Government whose standing boast has been the inflexible maintenance of authority. About the fact of their success there could be no manner of doubt. M. Clemenceau was driven from threats of vengeance to professions of sympathy. Vowing on one day that to strike was a crime against the State, he undertook on the next that it was a crime for which no one should be punished. Finally, the one simple end of the strike was achieved. It was a strike against the brutalities of one man, the detested M. Simyan. M. Simyan has disappeared. He did not resign ; he was not dismissed. He has simply vanished.

To the revolutionary school of C.G.T. (Confédération Générale du Travail) this victory came as a confirmation of all their theories and all their hopes. They have always despised Parliamentary action, regarded M. Jaurès as little better than a mere Professor, and proclaimed their somewhat irritable pity for the orthodox Unified Socialists whom he leads. Certainly in this instance Parliamentary action had done little or nothing for the postmen, and as certainly a strike had improved their position, sown terror in the hearts of the bourgeoisie, and defeated M. Clemenceau with his own chosen weapon of force. Accordingly, the leaders of the C.G.T. performed the characteristic operation of revolutionary logic. If one can succeed once, why not twice; if in small things, why not in great? The Russians argued in the same way after their strike of October, 1905, and the attempt to repeat it destroyed the Constitutional without helping the revolutionary movement. One may safely predict a similar catastrophe in this instance. Confront the Republic with a postal strike in which the only concrete issue is the fate of M. Simyan—a gentleman whom, like Wordsworth's Lucy, there are none to praise and very few to love—and it will discover a formula by which it can rid itself of its encumbrance. Mobilise all its employees against it, from postmen to teachers and civil servants, demand of it a surrender of principle all along the line, and the chances are that it will discover unsuspected resources of resistance. Moreover, in the first case the postmen were practically unanimous. But it is only a minority of civil servants and only a minority of working men who would support the general strike of which "King" Pataud and his secret committee appear to be dreaming.

The vision of a general strike has haunted Socialism from the early days of the International onwards. Its first form was the suggestion that a strike of coal-miners would suffice to paralyse all industry, and bring the governing classes to their knees. The Russian railway strike and this French postal strike have turned the attention of revolutionary strategists rather to the means of communication. Some suggest that, in this way, any war could be stopped—and certainly it could, if the men were unanimous. But—applying once more the revolutionary syllogism—if war could be stopped, and the bourgeoisie forced to ensue peace, why not to accept a social revolution? It is in vain that M. Jaurès and the orthodox Socialists reason with these extravagances. They have, of course, an overwhelming case on the facts. The C.G.T. and all its affiliated trade unions include only the merest fraction of the French working classes, and the only trade which is at all well-organised, the miners, views these tendencies with alarm. If the men cannot be got to join the unions, or to pay their subscriptions regularly when they do join, it is folly to suppose that they would join a general strike, or that they would be able to meet starvation, if they did join it. M. Jaurès carried his party with him at the last congress in Toulouse, which affirmed its faith in Parliamentary action. Better still, the C.G.T. itself seems to have been captured by the moderates, and has got rid of some of its more violent officials. But the tendency persists, and "King" Pataud appears to-day to be organising an entirely new army for the purposes of his general strike, independent equally of the unified Socialists and even of the C.G.T. itself.

The logic of M. Jaurès is irresistible. If the working-class was ready to strike, it ought, first of all, to join its unions. If it were really Socialist at heart, it could achieve its end most simply of all by voting solidly for Socialism at the polls. Were it really unanimous it could achieve its ends without violent revolution, precisely as a strong Power, with a great army behind it, can achieve its diplomatic ends without actual war. But all these reasonings which would convince every sane man in England or Germany, however extreme his desires and however violent his temper, remain inconclusive in France. And only a doctrinaire would insist that the peculiarities of the French temperament are immaterial in such calculations. Where we should organise, they can improvise. We know that we could not improvise, their genius points out to them a quite contrary strategy. Men incapable of the slow, dull work of organisation may have the passion, the imagination, and the dash which gives to a furious unorganised effort some chance of success. Nine times in ten it will fail, and nine times in ten M. Jaurès will be right. But on the tenth chance such a leader as "King" Pataud is prepared to gamble. It is not politics. It is not war. It is not Socialism. But some day, by some lucky chance, after a long record of defeat and disaster, after fusillades and persecutions, and at the price of total discredit and failure to every reasonable effort, it might perhaps be victory.

There is no doubt another deduction from such a movement as this, which is already being drawn by French reactionaries. It is that the French genius is really unsuited to Parliamentary government. Yesterday it was Boulanger. To-day it is Pataud. Discontent does appear to seek periodically an anti-Parliamentary form, alike among the wealthy and among the working-classes. Nor is there any parallel to these aberrations, either in England, where Parliamentarism is old, or in Germany, where it is new. Undoubtedly the machine works badly and slowly. A Parliament in France rarely achieves as much as a session among ourselves. The last Chamber passed a scheme of old age pensions. The Senate after three years is still obstructing and remodelling it. The present Chamber has just passed an Income Tax Bill. The Senate is preparing to obstruct and remodel this also. And these two measures, both abortive, and likely to remain abortive, represent all that two Parliaments, dominated by Radicalism, have achieved for constructive social reform. For our part we are inclined to think that the course of the failure is not so much the inaptitude of the French genius to manage the Parliamentary machine, for in some respects and notably in its control of finance, it does much better work than our own House of Commons. The reason rather is that the French genius allows itself too often to be fettered by foreign dogmas, and accepts a strategy for which it is unfitted. The whole history of these two Parliaments was vitiated by the fact that the Unified Socialists condemned themselves to Parliamentary impotence by accepting the dictation of Herr Bebel at the Amsterdam Congress. They are forbidden to vote a "middle-class" Budget, and therefore they remain in the Chamber a mere party of protest and revolt. That was not the tactics of M. Jaurès, though he bowed to a Russo-German majority at Amsterdam. Parliamentary Socialism in France will never be able to meet its revolutionary critics until it frees its own hands of this fetter, and wins the power to influence the Chamber by using the whole weight of its numbers to conclude bargains, make and support Ministries, and sell its vote as the price of definite reforms.

---

THE NEW NAVAL CHARTER.

A FEW months before the first Hague Conference a student of international law, with strong Liberal tendencies, was asked to state what reforms he would like to see effected. After presenting an argument in favor of the exemption of all peaceful shipping and commerce, whether belonging to belligerents or neutrals, from capture or destruction by the war vessels of either belligerent—he suggested that, in any case, two reforms should be attempted.

(1) The naval Powers should draw up an authoritative list of contraband goods, which should be binding upon Prize Courts, and should be subject to modification only by another international convention.

(2) A truly international and impartial character should be given to Prize Courts, and an appeal on points of international law should be allowed from them to an international tribunal sitting at The Hague.

Although the part played by Great Britain at the Hague Conference was, in many respects, ultra-conservative, and, as regards the exemption of private property, distinctively hostile and reactionary, we may now congratulate ourselves upon the fact that, of the three most pressing reforms, two have actually been carried. For, if the second Hague Conference did comparatively little in other directions, it did, at any rate, agree upon the establishment of an international prize court of appeal. From the standpoint of those (including several well-known professors of law in this country) who desire to prevent any improvement in international relations, and denounce any restrictions upon the rights of belligerents to seize and destroy what they please, the establishment of this Prize Court was very alarming, and they exerted themselves, in the columns of the "Times" and through various subterranean channels, to get the Court hung up, as it were, so that British-made prizes and British-made law might not be subject to any other authority. Eventually, however, Sir Edward Grey came to the conclusion that, as Great Britain had acquiesced in the establishment of a Court of Appeal at The Hague, the best thing to be done was to agree with the other naval Powers as to what should be the main provisions of the law which the Court would have to administer. For otherwise the judges at The Hague would be able to make law on all the points where the practice of different nations has been at variance.

Thus it came to pass that, early last year, Sir Edward Grey issued invitations to the leading naval Powers, and also to Spain and Holland, to attend a Conference in London, "with the object of arriving at an agreement as to what are the generally recognised principles of international law" in regard to "those matters wherein the practice of nations has varied," with a view to formulating the rules which should be observed by the international Court in dealing with appeals brought before it for decision. He pointed out, in his preliminary letter of February 7th, 1908, that, by Article 7 of the Hague Convention, the new Court (in the absence of treaty stipulations) is to decide appeals that come before it in accordance with the rules of international law, or, if no generally recognised rules exist, in accordance with the general principles of justice and equity. He added that, in his judgment, it would be difficult to persuade Parliament to accept this part of the Hague Convention, unless some definite understanding could be reached with other naval Powers as to the rules by which the new tribunal should be governed. To assist in bringing about this understanding, a useful memorandum,* setting forth the British rules of international naval law on the points at issue, was forwarded to the other Powers. The principal points in the programme to be submitted to the Conference were contraband, blockade, the destruction of neutral vessels, the conversion of merchant vessels, the transfer of merchant vessels from belligerents to neutrals, and the question of the rule by which to decide whether property is "enemy property." The invitation was accepted, and plenipotentiaries to the Conference were appointed by all the Powers. It was agreed that the programme should be that suggested by the British Government, and the Conference was opened on December 4th last by Sir Edward Grey. Although the difficulties were enormous—for practice and tradition have long divided Continental and British jurists on most of the issues raised—the delegates of all the Powers seem to have worked together with the utmost friendliness and good-will, and with full determination to arrive, if possible, at a compromise. There was a general readiness to make mutual concessions, and eventually, on February 26th, 1909, "The Declaration of London," consisting of seventy articles, was signed by the plenipotentiaries of all the Powers represented at the Naval Conference.

This document is undoubtedly a landmark in the history of international law. In a certain sense, it is even more. It is the beginning of international law so far as naval warfare is concerned. No doubt many rules and conventions have grown up. No doubt States have found it convenient, and even necessary, to play the game in accordance with certain rules framed by themselves, and to submit the proceedings of their privateers or cruisers to the jurisdiction of special administrative tribunals, called Prize Courts. It is true, also, that, since the Declaration of Paris in 1856, most naval Powers have been pledged not to resort to privateering, and have agreed also to allow neutral vessels to carry about merchandise belonging to citizens of the Powers at war. But hitherto there has been no uniform law, no certainty, because there has been no single authoritative interpreter. By the second Hague Convention and the Declaration of London an interpreter—a central and supreme tribunal—has been established, and a considerable section of naval laws and practices have been codified and endorsed by the signatures of all the Powers. Let us not despair of the future of civilisation when a statesman who clings so firmly to the old world as Sir Edward Grey can become an instrument of the new co-operative forces which are every year uniting the peoples by new ties, and imposing upon all nations a new thing, which we call international law.

The most remarkable part of the new code is certainly the new law of contraband. As the General Report, prefaced by M. Renault, truly observes: "Peaceful trade may be grateful for the precision with which a subject of the highest importance to its interests is now, for the first time, treated." The method adopted has been to define by description. Three lists have been prepared and agreed upon. The first is a list of articles which are absolute contraband of war—arms, explosives, uniforms. The second is a list of conditional contraband, consisting of things susceptible for use either in war or peace, such as wagons, merchant vessels, telegraphs, railway material, or flying machines. We regret to see that all foodstuffs and clothing are included in this class. Thirdly, there is a Free List, consisting mainly of raw materials—cotton, wool, silk, hemp, hides, rubber, metallic ores, nitrates, machinery, paper. Articles on the free list may not, under any circumstances or pretext, be declared by a belligerent to be contraband of war, and therefore may not be touched, even if they belong to a belligerent, when found in a neutral vessel. Absolute contraband, of course, even when it belongs to a neutral and is protected by the neutral flag, "is liable to capture if it is shown to be destined to territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy" (Article 30). Conditional contraband, on the other hand, is liable to capture only if it is shown to be destined "for the use of the armed forces or of a government department of the enemy state." In other words, unless you can show from the ship's papers that the cargo is destined for the army or for government service, conditional contraband, including food, is as little liable to capture as raw materials or other articles on the free list. The possibilities of defeat at sea for a maritime Power no longer involve the dangers which used to appear so terrible. A naval war with another Naval Power under present law would be a sad day for British shipping, but no doubt a great part of it would immediately be sold to neutrals, who would be able to visit our ports freely so long as they were not carrying war materials. It is strange that, after Sir Edward Grey has helped to promulgate this code, he should shrink from extending to British shipowners when Great Britain is at war the charter of freedom which he has given to neutrals.

* Contained in correspondence and documents respecting the International Naval Conference held in London, December, 1908-February, 1909. Miscellaneous, No. 4, 1909 [Cd. 4,554], price 11d.

RISKS OF RAILWAY AMALGAMATION.

It was quite natural and proper that the Great Northern, Great Central, and Great Eastern Railways, looking primarily to the interests of their shareholders, should seek amalgamation. They have suffered more than most other roads in the general depression of railroad property. Like others, they have been confronted with increases of their wage bill and other expenses during a period of declining trade, when the new competition of rapid road transport has cut into their most profitable passenger traffic. But the wasteful competition and the rate-cutting which followed the extension of the Great Central to the metropolis have proved a special source of financial weakness to these lines, while the great development of mineral transport which has enabled such lines as the North-Western and the Midland to offer a stout resistance to the downward pressure has not come to their assistance. They might, it is true, have effected considerable economies without formal amalgamation, by process of underground agreement, adopting not only a pooling of rates, but a common system for the collection, delivery, and loading of goods as well as for passenger traffic. But the determinant need of improved borrowing powers, of capital for the further improvement and development of their businesses, would not thus have been adequately met. Though Sir Francis Channing took, perhaps, too restricted a view when he described the measure as "simply a Bill to bolster up one weak company by two other companies so as to form a basis of credit upon which to add further liabilities in the shape of a further issue of capital," there can be little doubt that this was the immediate propelling motive of the companies. But, though much rash and unwarrantable plunging in new issues has taken place, especially in the last decade of the nineteenth century, it is not the less true that a starved company can no more serve the public well than its own shareholders.

Nowhere has competition worked out more wastefully than in the railroad business. In every country of the civilised world it is being displaced by combination. The real issue has reference to the nature of this combination and to the provisions for safeguarding the public interests. In most countries direct national ownership and working have followed a clear recognition that the railroad is the chief modern highway. But in North America, Great Britain, and in part of France, the experiment of combining private management for profit with public control is steadily pursued. Mr. Churchill, in his somewhat excessive advocacy of the amalgamation scheme before Parliament, invited our steadfast adhesion to this policy. Now there are three separate pleas that may be and are urged in its favor. The first and simplest is to the effect that the combined companies, either out of consideration for public opinion, or in mere self-interest, will give to the trading and travelling public a fair share of the gain arising from the economies of combination. Now, it cannot be denied that the public service is likely to suffer from the struggles of impoverished companies to hold their heads above water, and it is likely enough that some of the larger centres of population might get improved facilities under such a combination.

But no one acquainted with the economic action of combines, whether in manufacture, commerce, or transport, can seriously contend that a sufficient natural harmony exists to secure for all sections of traders and travellers adequate protection against the temptation, to which every monopoly is subject, to charge the highest rates the traffic will bear. Though some of the defenders of this scheme assumed this natural harmony, most of them tacitly abandoned it by falling back on the second argument; viz., that the Railway Commission and the Board of Trade would hold sufficient power to safeguard the public and to check abuses. Here is a real issue of supreme importance at the present juncture. Has the Government any such adequate control, and, if not, can it obtain it? To this question the public has received no satisfactory answer, and for this reason we regret the pressure which induced the House of Commons to give this Railway Bill a second reading. For we do not believe that a Select Committee on a single concrete proposal is a fit body to determine the broad issues of principle and general policy that are involved. We hold that before Parliament endorses any such scheme of combination, not merely should a full inquiry have been held into the present railroad situation and its probable development, but that the House of Commons should have obtained a firm assurance that Governmental control over rates, facilities, and other public interests had already been made certain and sufficient.

Now, it is common knowledge that no such control has yet been obtained. The powers with which the Inter-State Commerce Commission of the United States have recently been invested, enabling them to determine and impose a reasonable rate for the various sorts of carriage, are not, in fact, possessed by any Governmental authority in this country. The crude facts essential to any scientific process of rate-fixing do not exist in any of our railway systems. Why not? Because our railway managers and directors have steadily and almost unconsciously defeated all attempts to induce them to keep their accounts in such a manner as will yield the knowledge which is essential to adequate public control. No railway manager knows, or seeks to know, the true work and earning capacity of the various sorts of rolling stock that he employs. The elementary facts, such as the average rate per passenger per mile, the average rate per ton per mile for traffic, he refuses to supply. It is no secret that the Committee appointed three years ago by Mr. Lloyd George to examine the methods of Railway Accounts has met with the stubborn refusal of the railway managers to supply these and other relevant sorts of information. But if public control is to be anything more than a shallow pretence, a full acquisition and publication of accounts, in which the chief facts of tonnage, distance, amount of traffic, are set forth, is quite essential. Until this elementary work of scientific book-keeping is enforced upon the railroads, it is idle to stand up in Parliament and talk of public control.

Supposing that the Board of Trade succeeded in acquiring all the powers which it desires, would the evolution of the railway system rest in private amalgamation? A very interesting passage in Mr. Churchill's concluding speech seemed to indicate that he, like many others, looks forward to a public railway system as the ultimate product of the evolutionary process. Nay, he even hinted that this present proposal deserved favor as facilitating such a future consumnation, thus following the lead of a certain school of Socialists who profess approval of all trusts on the ground that, when all heads are set upon a single neck, the process of beheadal will be simplified. But, regarded in the light of practical politics, the logic of this argument is dubious. If private amalgamation serves to consolidate the business interests of railroad shareholders and to raise the value of their shares, it will set two considerable difficulties in the way of future nationalisation. In the first place, it will enormously enhance the price which the public will have to pay for the purchase of the roads, the enhancement consisting, in the main, of a monopoly value itself the creation of the law, as in the case of liquor licences. Secondly, any attempt to scale down the valuation so as to avoid an utterly extortionate bargain will be met by the solid opposition of the largest and most powerful combination of capitalist interests in the country. For these reasons we would prefer that, until public opinion is ripe for the nationalisation of our railway system, our Government should not set the seal of its approval upon these projects of amalgamation. It should rather leave the railways to make their own arrangements, subject to such gradual strengthening of public control as we can otherwise obtain.

---

THE FUTURE OF THE WORKER-STUDENT.

The unfortunate dispute at Ruskin College will, we trust, deal no serious blow to an admirable institution and a movement of great promise. With Ruskin College the movement dreamt of in one form by Maurice, in another by Toynbee, of bridging the gulf between the academic thinker and the small but important section of working-class students has passed from the sentimental to the practical stage. Whatever its difficulties the movement always had one solid reality at its base—the affinity, deeper than all class distinction, between those who care for the things of the mind. Of these, in spite of poverty, of unhealthy conditions, of material anxieties, of absence of all ordinary scientific or scholarly appliances, there have always been a fair sprinkling among the class of skilled operatives, particularly in Lancashire, and throughout the north of England. Sometimes the interest is purely detached. It is a love for a specialism like that of the weaver-entomologist, Mary Barton's friend, without whom, Mrs. Gaskell well knew, her wonderful picture of Manchester in the 'forties would have been incomplete. More often, of course, it is stimulated by practical needs, by the desire of the trade union leader, or the co-operative secretary to get to the bottom of the practical questions with which he has to deal, or at least to see what light the books and the theorists have to throw upon them. It is natural and healthy that the main demand of the working-class students should be for the teaching that may throw light on the problems of citizenship and of industry which so beset them in their daily work. Not that they are mere learners in these matters. The lecturer who goes with open mind to a class like that which might be found at Ruskin College, not to lay down the law ex cathedrâ but prepared for the give and take of discussion, will find that his own ideas gain in concreteness and meaning from the contact with minds to whom the problems of work and wages represent very hard realities. Mere words get winnowed away like chaff from the discussion and the ideas that have the seed of reality in them remain. The situation is well expressed in a passage from the Report of the Joint Committee of University and Working-Class Representatives as quoted by Mr. F. W. Kolthammer in the January number of the "Sociological Review."

> "It too often happens that a teacher with a good knowledge of his subject and the gift of expression fails almost entirely when confronted with a working-class audience, because he has started from a point of view so different from theirs as to make it impossible for the minds of students and teachers ever to come into real contact with each other. The things he regards as important have seemed to them trivial, and he has never really touched the problems upon which their minds are exercised, perhaps never read the books through which alone they have approached the subject. Every teacher of economics, for example, who has lectured to a working-class audience must have been for the moment at a loss when confronted with unfamiliar formulae on the lips of men to whom they seem exactly to answer all their problems. In the same way working-class audiences who listen for the first time to economics being taught by a University man have an uncomfortable feeling of being played with by a clever dialectician."

Such a situation is full of difficulty, but for that very reason full also of potentialities of good. Economics and political science generally not merely lose influence by being couched in terms which are not understanded of the people. They also miss much of truth for the very same reason. They are but half sciences, dealing with abstractions and half-realities, unless they can, when adequately expounded, bring conviction to men at grips with real problems of industrial life and social organisation. When the teacher who has not forgotten how to learn finds himself in the position described he is forced to go back on his formulæ, and criticise them in a wholly new spirit. He has not only to ask which of them will enable him to give a good dialectical retort to a puzzling heckler, but which really expresses a truth that the practical man finds operating in his daily life, and which, on the contrary, is only words and wind. The two kinds jostle one another in the world of the academy where, for want of the living test, thoughts and things are too readily confused. It is only by a sifting process that social theories can be made real and vital, and there is no such stimulus to this process as the continuous contact of the academic teacher with the mind of men thirsty for guidance in practical affairs.

On the other side the worker-student has all to gain from the system, the detachment, and the all-roundness of the better academic teaching. The untrained man who begins to teach himself is very much at the mercy of the first book which states his own problems to him in a way that catches his attention and offers him any outward form and semblance of a solution. It may be a Marxite text-book, it may be a Spencerian, it may be a Georgeite. The particular brand does not matter. The point is that he absorbs the formulæ, and, having absorbed them, becomes drunk with them. Talk with him on any subject, and begin where you will, and in three sentences he has settled everything with the Marxian, the Spencerian, or the Georgeite formula. He sees Marx, or Spencer, or George everywhere and in everything. The net result of learning for him is that his mind can no longer move freely at all. He is bound over to a master and his magic words, and he is more academic in his essence than the oldest—nay, than the very youngest—Don. His mind is ice-bound, and the first aim of any teacher who can diagnose his case is to thaw him out. A loosening process is necessary. He must learn that the wisdom of the world is not to be summed up in a single equation, and that all learning and knowledge do not revolve round the sayings of a single master. A little judicious personal teaching will save this type from becoming the intellectual slaves of some narrow dogma at the outset of their excursion into the realm of books; in so doing it can save the intellectual element in working-class life from sterility.

The furtive question may be asked whether the student so trained will remain a member of the working class, or will merely use his education to raise himself in the social scale. The answer depends largely on the methods used and the numbers affected. As long as it was a question of a single student of working-class origin, getting a scholarship at an Oxford College and going through the ordinary academic career, there were but two alternatives—on the one hand sheer failure, on the other complete absorption into University, and thence into professional, life. That such openings should exist for clever boys from the Board schools is right and proper. The Universities of the future should represent the pick of the intellect of all classes. But, on this side, the democratisation of the Universities is merely one method of opening the career to the talents. The aim of the present movement is to adapt University education to democratic needs, to educate working men, not that they may become something else, but simply that they may be and remain educated working men. Is that ideal possible? For all the leaders we believe that it is, and not only so, but that the moment it is found to be possible it will become necessary. A sound academic training, that is to say, will be as much a part of the normal equipment of the branch secretary of a trade union, or the chairman of a local co-operative society as it is to-day of a barrister or a clergyman. The world of organised labor will be governed and administered by men with the same kind of intellectual training which, whatever its defects, is at present the solid basis of middle-class supremacy in the State. If this result is possible, and we believe that the movement of which Ruskin College is a part has gone far enough to prove its possibility, it contains in it the germ of changes no less profound than those which first broke down the walks of political and social privilege. These gave the working classes power. This will give them the knowledge how to use their power.

Life and Letters.

THE POWER OF PITY.

It is a common saying that the march of social progress depends upon the pace of the rearguard. We are now engaging upon a more serious and organised attempt than ever before to bring into line the weaklings and the laggards. Those who are at close grips with this work are soon made aware how feeble and how rare is the passion of social justice as compared with the personal appeal of pity. For the realisation of justice seems to chill the natural play of human sympathy by too close an alliance with reason. Moreover, the sense of justice seems no keener to-day than it was a century ago, whereas there is a general agreement that the sentiment of pity for personal suffering is stronger in all classes. Thus there is good ground for regarding social progress as consisting pre-eminently in an economy of pity. Appeals for justice, involving disturbances of the accepted order, interferences with rights of property or social privilege, awaken resentments and the instincts of personal and class defence. Pharaoh hardens his heart and will not let the people go. But pity saps the interior defences of pride and selfishness; face to face with an actual case of human suffering none but the stoniest-hearted will refuse succor and some measure of self-sacrifice in rendering it. If every owner of brewery shares could be persuaded to stand in the bar-room of the lowest of the pot-houses that he owns for four consecutive Saturday nights, the drink problem in this country would be solved, for not one in ten amongst them could resist the cogent sense of personal responsibility for human folly and recklessness he would feel. If the Dean and Chapter of Eastborough would spend a few hours each week in the rookeries where live the laborers or seamstresses whose pittances are drawn each week to swell their comfortable incomes, would the Church throw its weight so firmly upon the side of "the vested interests"? If the charitable lady who drives fur-coated in her motor to the committee meeting of her Social Service League could once be got to see the precarious, miserable life of the people whose labor yielded the interest of those profitable shares that helped to buy the furs and the motor, the poignant humor of her social service would become too oppressive.

If such true revelations of the nature of our "social system" could be made, there lies in the human breast a genuine force of pity which would indeed become a revolutionary force. There lurks, indeed, a half-instinctive recognition that pity has this dangerous explosive power, upsetting all conventions and discretions and disregarding interests. If every man were clear-eyed enough to interpret all his intricate relations to, and his dependence upon, his fellow-men in terms of the human gain and suffering they carried, such knowledge would "get upon his nerves," and make him uncomfortable. Selfish motives of ease and pleasure have, therefore, secretly conspired to blind his eyes and pad his heart that the darts of pity may not penetrate. Such selfishness is very cunning. She does not attempt to stamp out pity or to refuse it all expression. She only seeks to render it innocuous. The simplest way of doing this is to confine its operation within a short circuit. Cruder charity has always served this purpose, affording a discharge of pity by little acts of hand-to-hand benevolence. Such a practice shuts out reflection, and prevents all dangerous accumulation. In a simple society with fixed personal status, this simple outpouring of pity in immediate personal aid seems to work well. Though here, as elsewhere, the rich man lives on the poor, neither knows it. The benevolence and the gratitude are genuine, and no danger arises.

But it is far otherwise when society has grown complex, unsettled, and multitudinous. The old personal nexus is no longer possible, and the real menace of "indiscriminate" charity emerges. Shut off now from simple almsgiving, how shall pity find innocuous relief? If I may not myself relieve the misery I see, my frustrated pity will rankle in my breast in dangerous criticism, poisoning my confidence in the rationality and justice of the "existing order." To stop this is invented a monstrous era of organised charity, in which I must not give to a poor man, but only to "the poor." The personal contact which seemed so essential is broken, and I must put my money into an institutional slot. Now, pity is not like mercy, "a word invented in the courts of tyrants." It is the purest, most spontaneous, and most elemental feeling. To organise it is to kill it—its flow dries up before official scrutiny. Rich men and women may pour money through the scientific medium of detective sieves. Some forms of material assistance may emerge, but the healing virtue of pity is no longer true, for there is no love in those who give, no gratitude in those who receive.

This system of long-circuit pity, in which expert helpers conduct charity to deserving cases, has failed because it was "against human nature." Not that it was destitute of merit, but this sort of voluntary social service demanded a benevolent austerity of character, which was too rare, while the waywardness of ordinary emotional humanity proved invincible. The despairing lamentation of organisers of charity at the impending prospect of some Mansion House Fund is a most instructive lesson in social psychology. The failure of voluntary organisation is admitted: charity is now to be made a State department; public officials, helpers, detectives, educators, are to displace private ones, to sift efficients from inefficients, deserving from undeserving poor, and to prescribe the proper medicine for each in the State dispensary. Will the new experiment succeed? There will be ampler funds, finer apparatus, more stable machinery, more specialised expert treatment. There are those to whom it appears that there will be no need for the sentiment of pity and of charity now that the full "rights" to work, to food, to health, and care, and education are conceded. Justice at last has got rid of charity!

But others are not so sure. Those most experienced in the ways of "institutions" are best aware how much depends upon the enthusiasm of some director, some doctor or teacher, and the personal infection of human interest and love which can suffuse a "staff," and they ask how many of such men and women shall we find in our new labor colonies, our penal settlements, our training schools, our employment bureaux, and will they have the liberty needed to keep alive their interest and love? The pain of pity now seeks relief in an assurance that every hungry child shall be fed in a public kitchen, that every sick man shall be tended in a public hospital, that State provision shall be made against invalidity, unemployment, aged penury, and all the other miseries to which "the poor" are exposed. The uneasiness of the tender-hearted rich is now removed by some increased contribution to the rates and taxes, and everything that is necessary will, it is hoped, be done. But will it? Social pathology is the most delicate of arts. Where voluntary organised charity has failed, it is not likely that State mechanised charity will altogether succeed. For, in spite of all attempts to disguise the form and name, the spirit of official charity will cling to the whole apparatus, as it does to-day to the new municipal relief works or the old age pensions. There will be hundreds of thousands of "cases" to be booked and tabulated, and subjected to a departmental system, with checks and registers, and all the necessary elaboration of a routine that eternally fails to reach the live real needs of a human being.

We do not say the new system will not work, or that it will not grind out useful slabs of substantial relief. But there will be innumerable injustices and hardships, prodigious waste, and no diminution of the supply of fresh cases to enter the machine and find employment for the official tenders. This must be so as long as the driving motive of this new social service remains what it is, viz., the desire to evade that deeper analysis of social causation which would disclose the real meaning of the poverty and inefficiency to which these palliatives are applied. If human pity were to become clear-eyed enough to trace amid the intricacies of our social system the roots of poverty, ignorance, inefficiency, and vice, so that, not here and there a man or a woman, but whole classes of rich, educated, comfortable people came to recognise, not in vague theory but in pungent reality, how their riches made others poor, their culture others ignorant, their comfort others' sufferings, the final inadequacy of these new social schemes which are struggling into being would become evident.

Then would pity come by her own. Benevolent men and women would no longer be satisfied to humanise the relief of the poverty they caused, founding labor colonies to train or coerce the inefficients of their slum estates, feeding the starved children of their ill-paid employees, subsidising Magdalen Homes for the women they had driven on the streets, and Inebriate Homes for the drunkards of their manufacture. But such clear-eyed pity does not come easily, with its disturbing thoughts and actions. For a host of specious sophisms blind our eyes. Wholesale perversions of history, solemn moralities, and a whole brood of showy sociological doctrines have come into being and popular acceptance in order to prevent the pity for human suffering from seeing true causes and seeking true remedies. Some revive sentimental charity, others stiffen themselves with "natural selection" or the doctrines of Nietzsche, some trust to education, others to eugenics, while others, again, are led cunningly along some plain, attractive slope of profit-sharing or of land reform into a cul de sac. Countless are the silken cocoons which the comfortable soul of man has woven round it, lest pity should become intelligent, and so stop man from causing misery instead of trying and failing to cure it.

---

HOW AH SIN SANG.

The primitive myths of great races assume that all mankind is descended from one father and one mother; and to most of us the assumption seems natural, for long habit has blinded us to its wonder. In reality, it results from astonishing powers of insight and generalisation. Much as the species in other classes of mammalia vary; wide as is the gulf between the great watch-dogs of the Caucasus and the "toy Poms" of Kensington's imbecility; it is doubtful if even dogs differ so much from each other as men. No visitant to earth would suppose that the negress of Nigerian swamps, suckling her young over her shoulder, belonged to the same genus as the pale Duchess receiving her guests at the top of the branching staircase. It would need a long training in morphology, as well as in philanthropic habits, before he could speak of the negress as the Duchess's sister cut in ebony. Yet from the beginning it seems that man has never hesitated to identify his kind. He has always included hairy pigmies in brotherhood with Plato, but has drawn a steady bar between pigmies and the highest gifts of Consul, though the difference may be called infinite in one case, and hardly perceptible in the other.

But among all the varied races it has appeared most difficult to recognise a common parentage for ourselves and the Chinese. It is not so much the difference in appearance that matters. After all, they are far more like us than any African tribe. Apart from the sprouting of the hair, and eye-sockets cut like slits in a flat surface, there is not much essential difference in form. It is in the soul that the difference seems generic. When you ask a mangrove negroid his thoughts on ju-ju and the surrounding world of spirits, he draws a film over his eyes, no thicker than covers the eyes of a seal, though impenetrable as the mangrove forest itself. But between you and a Chinaman the barrier is always there, solid and inexpugnable, like the Great Wall where it is reduplicated ten times over. That our fathers should have believed even Chinamen to have sprung from Eden out of the same types of human perfection as themselves is evidence of a faith before which our little systems shrivel.

The obvious distinctions in mind and custom are, indeed, astonishing. The Chinese honor the man of peace and despise the soldier. They wear their gayest clothes in civil life, and dress their officers in rags or anything. They enjoy kite-flying more than killing or being killed. If possible, they allow the enemy to run away without hurting him. They decorate a distinguished man with a button instead of a garter, and they are honest in trade. To such glaring differences we may add a few more subtle, after reading a little book on Chinese lyrics, called "A Lute of Jade," by Mr. Cranmer-Byng (Murray). The author has here translated a number of old Chinese songs. True, they are not old as Chinese history goes. Very few come from the collection made by Confucius about the time when Solon was enacting laws for Athens. Nearly all date from what stands for the classic period of Chinese literature—the time when in our country, as Carlyle said, the gluttonous race of Jutes and Saxons were lumbering about in pot-bellied equanimity, not dreaming of heroic toil and silence and endurance such as lead to the high places of this universe, and the golden mountain-tops where dwell the spirits of the Dawn. In other words, they date from the three or four centuries before the Conquest.

Like those gluttonous ancestors of ours, the Chinese poets did not dream much of heroic toil, silence, and endurance. As was to be expected of so pacific a race, their songs are of peace, and war is mentioned only with abhorrence. But one thing that sharply distinguished their people from ours was a veneration for literature and learning. The veneration is still maintained in a country where the highest positions are open to the scholar, no matter how humble his birth and position. So we find that verse-making has always been a second nature with the Chinese, and it is, above all, the recreation of statesmen and great officials—"a means of escape," we are told, "from the weariness of public life." It was a means that Gladstone tried, though but rarely, and in a foreign tongue: else even his reputation could not have withstood the suspicion that attaches to a poet. But in China, emperors themselves were poets, and not merely by proxy, like those of our nobility, who put their names to books which others have written. We read of one great emperor who is described as "poet and sportsman, mystic and man of this world, a great polo player, and the passionate lover of one beautiful woman"—a description that reminds one of an eighteenth-century portrait in Dulwich College, bearing the brief biography, "He was six foot high, a good jumper, skater, and scholar, athletic and humane." We also read that, unlike the majority of modern poets, the Chinese singers meditated much on the sanctities of home, and were so gentle that one of them "spent his time in angling, but used no bait, his object not being to catch fish."

But, after all, some of our writers, too, have been meditative, and some gentle. Mark Pattison used to dig a garden bed in which nothing was ever planted, his object not being to grow plants. Many of our hunters pursue a smelling rag, their object not being to catch foxes; and if we stood angling without a bait it would not be the first time for most of us. The more we look into Chinese nature as revealed by this little book of songs, the more we are convinced that our fathers were right in speaking of man's brotherhood, incredible as it appears. It is true we cannot judge much from the present form of the poems, for the translator has an excellent gift of verse himself, and that is dangerous in the translation of texts we cannot read. He would have done better to give us the literal prose in a few lines as well. But we gather that the Chinese classics used rhyme not unlike the Persian rhyme, and that alone is a wonder in human relationship as surprising as the Chinese discovery of gunpowder some ages before Roger Bacon. For the pleasure of Europe in rhyme is quite recent, and very difficult to explain. Otherwise, the only hint as to form that we get from this book is the Chinese love for brief lyrics that set, as it were, a note which the hearer may carry forward in his own thoughts. The poet's meaning is not fully expressed, but is intended to vibrate in the memory like music. The Japanese gain the same effect in their tiny poems of fifteen syllables. Let us take an example from Wang Seng-Ju, who lived while the Saxons were driving the Celts off our fattest land:—

"High o'er the hill the moon barque steers,
The lantern lights depart,
Dead springs are stirring in my heart,
And there are tears;
But that which makes my grief more deep
Is that you know not when I weep."

It is a sudden jet of emotion, almost instantly suppressed and left to the hearer to feel and understand. And the emotion is just the human longing for the absent—the yearning, "Sehnsucht," "desiderium"—of European poets. "How can these earwigs love each other?" asked the little girl, but through all the varied, and perhaps repellant, species of mankind the deep feelings at the base of nature are very much the same. There is a longer poem on the same theme by Chang Jo-Hu, who sang about the time of Charlemagne; it is also full of moonlight, for among all races the moon sheds the natural light for love and mischief. Here are a few lines:—

"Though they mingle not,
Our thoughts seek one another. In the lilt
Of winds I hear her whisper: 'Oh that I Might melt into the moonbeams, and with them
Leap through the void, and shed myself with them
Upon my lover.' Slow the night creeps on;
Sleep harbors in the little room. She dreams—
Dreams of a fall of flowers. Alas! young Spring
Lies on the threshold of maternity,
And still he comes not."

But it is natural to sing of love, the transfiguration of the soul. Even the Zulus, between their war-songs of Chaka and their praises of cattle, will pause for interludes of love. There are other notes in the Chinese lyrics more surprising for their harmony with ourselves. Frequently there is the note of life's brevity, the uselessness of striving, the wisdom of snatching pleasure as it flies. To the same Horatian mood belongs the frequent lament for vanished glory. Compare with Omar's "Courts where Jamshyd gloried and drank deep," this little poem made by Kao-Shih, four centuries before Omar:—

"There was a King in Liang—a King of wondrous might—
Who kept an open palace, where music charmed the night.
Since he was lord of Liang, a thousand years have flown,
And of the towers he builded, yon ruin stands alone.
There reigns a heavy silence; gaunt weeds through windows pry,
And down the streets of Liang, old echoes, wailing, die."

In China, as in Persia, in Ireland, and among the English lakes, the mind of poets has been haunted by these visions of a past which man never believes to be really dead. Sometimes, too, though seldom, we hear in the Chinese poets the echoes of battles long ago, and it is characteristic of the peaceful and self-deprecating race that the one great battle-song in the book is a noble lamentation by Li Hua over an ancient field, the scene not of victory but of overwhelming disaster.

Far more often we have the brief meditations of a soul in harmony with the universe,—"made one," as they said, "with the pulsations of eternity." It is a state to be attained, as all Orientals know, by suppression of transitory desires and concentration of thought upon the things that are more excellent. It leads to the spiritual freedom thus expressed by Ssü-K'ung T'u about the time of our Danish invasions:—

"I revel in flowers without let,
An atom at random in space;
My soul dwells in regions ethereal,
And the world is my dreaming-place.

As the tops of the ocean I tower,
As the winds of the air spreading wide,
I am 'stablished in might, and dominion, and power,
With the universe ranged at my side.

Before me the sun, moon, and stars,
Behind me the phœnix doth clang;
In the morning I lash my leviathans,
And I bathe my feet in Fusang."

Which is all a very satisfactory result of spiritual freedom, and reminds one somehow of Shelley's coursers fed with the lightning and drinking of the whirlwind's stream. But, on the whole, we turn with relief from the Oriental bliss of abstract meditation back to those feelings, those joys and pains and undying regrets, which are the heritage of all mankind, whether we bathe our feet in Fusang or the Severn or the Orinoco. For, as Ou-Yang Hsiu of Lu-Ling said, while the battle of Hastings was raging far away:—

"There yet is man—
Man, the divinest of all things, whose heart
Hath known the shipwreck of a thousand hopes,
Who bears a hundred wrinkled tragedies
Upon the parchment of his brow."

"A hundred wrinkled tragedies!" Oh, with what disjointed syllables of Chang and Chi and Bo did that ancient poet of the Sung dynasty contrive to express so fine and Elizabethan a thought?

---

JUDAS IN LEGEND AND FOLK-LORE.

It is impossible for the mind to conceive words more terrible than these, "It had been good for that man if he had not been born." For long ages the words, as they fell upon men's ears, seem to have called forth a sense of fierce exultation. The mystic hatred of the Betrayer was in proportion to the adoring love of the Betrayed. One should not, perhaps, too hastily assume that the dying out of this feeling is pure gain. In the case of the great mass of the people, it is probably due, not to any growth of imaginative human sympathy, but to loss of interest in the great drama itself.

Over the wild medieval stories of the childhood of Judas we will not linger. The real popular indignation against him begins with the murmuring at the waste of the precious ointment. This murmur is the first moment of a drama which moves through the scenes of the Supper, the Kiss, the Remorse, and the Hanging. The Golden Legend says: "Then it happed that he was angry and sorry for the ointment that Mary Magdalene poured on the feet and head of our Lord Jesus Christ, and said that it was worth three hundred pence, and so much he had lost, and therefore sold he Jesus Christ for thirty pieces of that money, of which every penny was worth tenpence, and so he received three hundred pence. Or after that, some say, he ought to have of all the gifts given to Jesus Christ the tenth penny, and so he recovered thirty pieces of that he sold Him." Legend has invested these thirty pieces with a long mysterious history. They were made of the precious metal brought by Adam out of Paradise, and were coined by Ninus, King of Assyria. Abraham carried them into the land of Canaan, and with them Joseph was bought by the Ishmaelites. They were in the treasures of Pharaoh, of Solomon, of Nebuchadnezzar. The Magi offered them to the Holy Child. At last, by command of Jesus himself, they were given to the temple at Jerusalem, whence they were paid by the chief priests to Judas, and afterwards to the soldiers who watched the tomb.

The scene of the Supper has stamped itself upon men's minds as few others in all history have done, and has evoked a whole world of wonderment and fancy. It is unnecessary to mention the superstition about the number thirteen. "He sat down with the twelve." Judas sat on the right hand of Our Lord, between St. John and St. Peter. One thinks of the last days of those three comrades—of the hideous death of Judas, of the world-making martyrdom of St. Peter, of the figure described by the great Russian seer, the old St. John, all white, a keeper of bees, smelling of wax and honey. In Leonardo's picture the hand of Judas is upon the salt-cellar, which he upsets as he says, "Lord, is it I?" This little detail, carried all over Europe as the faith spread, may have given rise to the superstition expressed in the proverb, "He who spills salt, spills sorrow." The idea that the ill effects may be warded off by throwing the spilt salt over the left shoulder is, no doubt, explained by the old belief that the Good Angel is stationed on the right side of every man, the Demon on the left.

The Kiss of Judas is the climax of the story. To the natural feeling of hatred for the treacherous slayer, "the smiler with the knife behind his cloak" was added in the Middle Ages the mystic horror of the Betrayer of his God. Judas is "the traitor" par excellence. Dante calls treachery "the lance with which Judas jousted." All such proverbs as "langue de miel, cœur de fiel," have in them a backward glance at Judas. The "Judas kiss" was proverbial everywhere. Shakespeare is full of references to it. He makes Richard II. say:—

"Did they not sometimes cry All hail! to me
As Judas did to Christ? But He, in twelve, found faith
In all save one; I in twelve thousand none."—(Act IV.)

Again he makes the detested Richard Crookback enact the very part of Judas, himself adding in an aside:—

"So Judas kissed his Master,
And cried All hail! when as he meant All harm!"—
(III. Henry VI., v. 7.)

Legend is pitiless in dealing with his Remorse and Death. A palsied death-struck terror fell on Judas "when he saw that He was condemned." An old French charm for a burn was:—

"Feu, feu, perds ta chaleur,
Comme Judas sa couleur,
Quand il trahit le Sauveur."

Of his suicide it was said that he was not allowed "to die on the earth, because all earthly creatures ought to hate him, but in the air where devils and evil spirits are, because he had deserved to be in their company." The "Prince of the Powers of the Air" claimed him in his own domain, as he did afterwards Simon Magus. The pre-figuring traitor Absalom had also died hanging from a tree. The tree of Judas is said to have grown over a hollow ravine, down which "he fell headlong, and burst asunder, and his bowels gushed out." The traditional belief is that it was an elder. This again is found in Shakespeare, whose plays are a perfect mine of the folk-lore of the Middle Ages. "Judas was hanged on an elder," says someone in "Love's Labor's Lost." (Act V. 4). So in "Piers Plowman" we read:—

"Judas, he japed with Jewen silver,
And sithen on an elder hanged himselve."

The present writer was once told by a poor man in a country village, "I've often sat cold rather than burn elder." It makes a weird picture to imagine an old crone in a remote hamlet, say, in the Sussex downs, muttering evil spells by the flickering flames of this unholy wood.

The traditional red hair of Judas was, curiously enough, also ascribed to Cain. In the "Merry Wives of Windsor" Simple says of Master Slender that "he had but a little wee face, with a little yellow beard, a Cain-colored beard" (Act I. 4). In Shakespeare's time all these traditional details were doubtless known to the mass of people through the Mystery-plays. A medieval Latin proverb says, "vix reperitur homo ruffus sine proditione." In many countries the Jews were compelled by law to dress in yellow. There was a curious folk tale that Judas Iscariot was turned into a squirrel, which in parts of England gave rise to the custom of hunting the little russet creature on Good Friday.

The like vindictive scenes are still enacted all over Christendom in the last days of Holy Week. In springtime in Provence, when the beans are in flower, and the orchards are rosy and white with the blossom of almond and cherry, children, shrill and merry as crickets, laugh and shout at the game of "hammering Judas." Spanish sailors hang him each Good Friday from the yard-arm of their ships. In old England he was carried round in scarecrow effigy all through Lent, and burned on Good Friday. This figure was called a "Jack-a-lent." Strange as it seems, this vengeance-taking formed part of the Easter joy. The Paschal Candle itself was called the "Judas," because the wax effigy of Judas was hung from it. There is no mercy shown him anywhere, except in the Celtic legend of St. Brendan, and even here, in the original story, it is strangely tempered with justice.

It was over and over again forbidden by the Church that a child should be baptised by the name of Jude. To this day the name probably does not exist outside Mr.

Hardy's novel. With regard to great sinners in general, and Judas in particular, the feeling was, "I will not make mention of their names within my lips," "Let his name be clean put out."

The briefest sketch of the lore of Judas must include some mention of Psalm cix., the terrific Psalm of cursing known as the "Judas Psalm." The traditional interpretation is fixed by the words of St. Peter in the Pentecostal sermon, "For it is written in the Book of Psalms, Let his habitation be desolate, and no man dwell therein, and his bishopric let another take" (Acts ii. 20). In this sense it has been commented upon in the minutest detail, verse by verse. In Germany it was known as the "todt-beten," and was used as a kind of "black Paternoster," efficacious in causing the death of an enemy. The Jews had used it in this way before the Christians. It was their custom to put mustard and water into a new vessel, to say this Psalm over it three days in succession, and then to pour it out before the door of the enemy they wished to destroy. But all the stored-up vengeance of the awful words, as of black masses of cloud, heavy with hail and quick with lightning, breaks in a storm of cursing upon the head of Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon, who also betrayed Him.

THE MOVING OF THE WHEELS.

It is a narrow, winding street, with house cliffs three times as tall as the way is wide, and an average of four people abreast jostling on a two-yard pavement. There are three or four up-river towns that can fill the specification, and we need not say which one is this. There is blue sky overhead, and as we turn a corner we come suddenly on a basket of mimosa and daffodils standing in the sun. Still later, the odour of them reaches us—a hot enlivening scent of pollen and honey, both of them manifestations of sunshine. Dingy houses all round, rent, as it were, with this glory of pale gold emitting the very glory and comfort of paradise. And hanging before the golden blooms, two eager bees, free merchants in this world of marketing, hesitating in so rich a world as to which cup to enter and pillage. The blooms are from Scilly, and the bees from some garden up there and down there beyond the houses that seem to end the world.

These bees, one of which, to the astonishment of the flower-vender, we catch, inspect, and release, represent one of the wheels of spring. At the right time, neither a day too soon nor a day too late, they awake, or are born (for they come from the chrysalis) in their underground and lately frozen quarters. And they always find that, obeying the more direct, open-air message of the sun, the first flowers of the white arabis, their especial flower, are open. (Mimosa and daffodils from Scilly are a luxury unwarranted by former experience, and the Fates grant that they prove not a delusion and a snare.) These are the males of the handsomest of our solitary bees. Their time is a day or two ahead of the females growing in the same burrow as they, but needing to grow longer before they reach the greater perfection of wifehood. For the males, the flowers provide just snacks of food, sandwiches for mere gadders-about and foragers for self. But we see even now the anthers swelling and ripening, so that a second and greater wheel shall be ready at exactly the right time to fit the pollen-collecting and family-providing female. Then will emerge a third bee, a cuckoo that can only rear progeny in the nest of these other provident mothers, and the wheel that fits this second species is the red dead nettle, which infallibly blooms in time for their nourishment.

Everywhere the inquirer will notice an astonishingly exact timing of apparently distinct phenomena. Our insectivorous summer birds come sometimes early, sometimes late, but whenever they come they find the leaves just so sprouting that the caterpillars are just so ready to eat them and be eaten by their guardians. They all follow the message of the sun, and the birds somehow make allowance for the fact that in the clear air of the Mediterranean he is usually faster (in addition to the difference of latitude) than in our misty and uncertain climate. But that is by no means all. The mathematician would tell us that a frŏst going twelve inches deep in sand and only ten inches deep in loam, minus an inch or two owing to the shelter of the arabis leaves, would throw the arabis wheel and the anthophora wheel right out of gear; that other seasons would so much favor the bee and retard the flower that the former would emerge and starve before the other opened. Anyone who had seen our indoor daffodils a month ago would have said that the doubles (planted three weeks earlier) would blossom long before the singles, and that of the singles there were three buds that would open long before the others. But the singles overhauled the doubles and waited for them. Both bowls opened a blossom on the same day, and all the single blooms were open within two days of one another.

However early or however late the first month of spring, the year usually keeps time with its own average from the middle of April onward. There is a month's difference between the earliest and latest recorded first appearance of the chiff-chaff and wheatear, while the nightingale and swallow are rarely a week out one way or the other, and the cuckoo, ringdove, nightjar, and landrail come every year on practically the same day. Last year the "tiny leaf" on the elm tree bole could be found anywhere in the south on the 1st of April, but this year the trees seemed till two days ago hopelessly out of date. It is better so. Nothing is more encouraging than the splendid rush that nature makes at the beginning of April, when she has been well held in leash through March. From one day to another we see marked changes everywhere. The shoots of the balsam poplar exude varnish plentifully, then thrust out their tightly rolled and fragrant leaves. The green points on the lilac trees grow, as it were, from mere color into luminosity, and fatten almost while we watch them. The dead-looking, lichen-covered twigs of the apple, that looked as though they could never blossom or even leaf again, suffer an astonishing change within a few score hours, and every tree, according to its kind, puts forth its summer kharma.

Every manifestation of the power of the sun, however diverse-seeming, is intimately related to some other, and therefore to them all. As soon as the anthers are ripe and shaking out their pollen, the stigmas on some other tree are ready to receive it. If an insect is necessary to effect the introduction, at the right moment bees, moths, flies, or tiny beetles rise from the grave with a craving for honey which they proceed to satisfy without knowing what is the true end served. One cue calls them all, and they rush on the stage from opposite wings, not guessing that the author intends to turn their seriousness into fun or their fun into tragedy.

Note the appointments that are kept every year with one tree; for example, the oak—blows of fate from which there is no escape. When the catkins are hanging, comes a fly from the debris of last year's foliage on the ground, whose bite, delivered in just this one week of the year's cycle, produces or makes the protoplasm of the tree produce the currant gall. When the leaves open, another fly keeps rendezvous, and with early incision guarantees that by the 29th of May there shall be huge, spongy, rosy "oak-apples." These and a score other gall-flies keep appointment with the oak alone, and of all the other creatures to which the oak is a kingdom we need only mention the oak weevil. It is now asleep—in a sense unborn—and certainly without any intention of the part it is to play. When the leaves are tender and pliable, whether that be earlier or later than usual, the weevil will be there with its cutting instruments and its foreknowledge of the best way yet discovered of cutting to the mid-rib, folding and rolling the leaf so that a complete hanging shelter for its progeny shall be formed. The cleverest man that, not having seen one of these shelters, shall attempt to design one will find that the weevil has improved on it. But here are wheels quite beyond our comprehension.

And is a simple fact like the migration of the redstart within our comprehension? The nearest conception we can get of the impulse that moves the migrants at the right time is a kind of Hertzian-wave apparatus born in each of them, and capable of responding to the same thermo-electric stimulus that has moved its ancestors for untold generations. How subtle and extra-material this impulse must be is shown by the way in which it penetrates artificiality. The Canadian goose moved to another hemisphere, fed comfortably in a public park, even reared from the egg in this country, yet raises its clipped wings and makes ineffectual attempt to fly north what time the descendants of its ancestors in North America are hastening to their banquet of snails and crustaceans in the pools of British Columbia. Or consider the still stranger case of a fish that now looks like a brown trout, which has been living for some years in a tank at the Zoo. It is really a salmon, hatched in a Thames hatchery for the restocking of that river, now salmonless. About May or June each year this fish grows silvery—an undoubted salmon. It rushes to the top of the water, and leaps in an evident desire to leave the sea and ascend the river. Yet it is not in the sea, but in a tank of fresh water. And where is it that each human being desires to go? What longing is it that stirs him each year when the spring madness is upon him? Perhaps he feels that he is not playing precisely the right part in the universal scheme. Perhaps he only then realises the oneness of the world in which he lives.

Present-Day Problems.

THE POOR LAW COMMISSION AND VOLUNTARY AGENCIES.

> "Our object is to bring these agencies into some continuing relation to one another, and, as a body, also with relation to the public administration of relief. We propose, therefore, the establishment of Voluntary Aid Committees parallel to the Public Assistance Committee on these lines. These Committees would be specially concerned with relief and aid at home, the personal help of those in distress, the prevention of distress, the visiting of cases of all kinds in connection with applications made to it directly, or in connection with public health or educational authorities."—Majority Report.

The above extract, from the report of the Majority of the Royal Commission on the Poor Laws is, among many other recommendations embodied in that epoch-making document, certain to cause considerable discussion and contention. It is, therefore, somewhat surprising that the Press, as a whole, have permitted these proposals to pass with practically no comment.

Until we are in possession of the bulky volumes containing the evidence submitted to the Commission, it is impossible to examine all the facts, or trace the line of argument that must have influenced them to suggest such a sweeping change in the present relation of the Poor Law to outside or voluntary agencies.

We are nevertheless familiar with the tendency in other States, which was in a contrary direction. In Australia and New Zealand, for example, the every-day experience of the working partnership between the State and voluntary effort in relieving distress is not satisfactory. In Australia, State-aided charities, like State-aided churches in these Western spheres, are doomed. Whatever view is entertained by the present Premier of New Zealand, his shrewd and liberal-minded predecessor (Mr. Seddon) more than once declared that he did not obtain value for his money grants to voluntary institutions. But here, with the current of experience running in favor of State responsibility and control, it is proposed to bring in an outside and difficult partner. I contend that the forces of State and eleemosynary institutions cannot be successfully united. Sooner or later, in one way or another, they come into collision to the injury of the persons whose circumstances they both aim at improving. The Commissioners can, of course, point to the results of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, and other institutional agencies, in support of their recommendation, but, for all practical purposes, these and similar agencies are branches of the State, and it is impossible to imagine even the Charity Organisation Society—not to mention the Church and Salvation Armies—submitting to the inspection and semi-control of the system outlined in the report of the Royal Commission.

Even if their respective managements were so disposed, think of the possibilities in a country like ours for political intrigue, religious rivalry, and philanthropic aggressiveness that the extension of the principle suggests! Of late years there have been striking developments in the work of social palliation by the Churches—Anglican, Nonconformist, and Roman Catholic. Church Congresses and Free Church Federations have disclosed new, and, in a sense, laudable ambitions to "broaden the basis" of their influence by grafting on to Church effort all sorts of social agencies, including workrooms for destitute men and women, shelters, emigration, and so forth. There is no limit to overlapping in this realm of philanthropy, and although the proposal to establish a council to determine local needs and promote co-operation among workers in charity is both sound and necessary, it does not appear to me that the Commissioners have paused to consider the effect that will be produced by the drastic change they propose among the rivals for religious ascendancy among cardinals, archbishops, conference presidents, and Salvation Army colonels. It requires a small stretch of the imagination to depict the efforts that will be resorted to to obtain monetary and other favors from Local Government Board presidents and the new Council Boards.

Happily, we are not without an up-to-date illustration of the danger that lurks in the recommendations of the Poor Law Commission. That illustration is strikingly conveyed by the Salvation Army. For twenty years now its social work has been before the country, and as the distinguished leader of that organisation has, in commenting upon the Majority Report, offered to relieve the State of some of its poor law problems, we are in a position to anticipate what would follow in the event of his army and the Church Army becoming auxiliaries of the State in this particular line of work. I have no hesitation in declaring that the effect would be disastrous alike to the politics and social life of the country. General Booth and his coadjutors have perfected their organisation, and in one respect the result is mystifying by reason of their silent lips when a controversy rages round some such institution, for example, as the settlement in Hanbury Street, Whitechapel, for destitute joiners and carpenters. Into the full merits of that controversy it is not necessary that I should enter; but in view of the recommendation of the Poor Law Commissioners, it is well to remember that the Salvation Army is one of the movements that would probably aim at securing a large slice of the administrative work of the new council, and this, I repeat, would be attended with pernicious consequences. Take some phases of the controversy over its Hanbury Street settlement: it is clear that the Truck Act there is eluded in spirit, if not in letter, by its management. In the Salvation Army's Bermondsey settlement men work for a mere pittance, beginning with sixpence per week and their board and lodging, seldom rising higher than five shillings The Army officials do not disguise the character of these "grants." They admit that whether a man is expert or otherwise on entering their establishments, he must begin with a sixpence. Destitution under such a system must be expected. While the Royal Commission would abolish the very name of pauper, such a method penalises a man for his poverty, and there will always be the temptation to such a council as the Commission proposes to set up, to avail themselves of a cheap method of discharging their obligations. It is but fair to state that General Booth, through the mouths of his social leaders, affirms that no profits are made by these settlements. And yet the bulk of the waste paper or raw material for the Bermondsey settlement is contributed gratuitously by the London public, while the manager of Hanbury Street states that he loses contracts in his own society because his tenders are too high. It is impossible to discover from the balance-sheets—or, rather, financial statements issued by the headquarters—how this loss arises. When details are asked for by men who have established their reputation as publicists, they are given evasive and general replies.

The fact is that the dominating note in the service which this society renders to the poor is religious. It is not essentially humanitarian. The inmates of its settlements, or colonists, are soon brought into an "atmosphere" which almost compels them to satisfy its dogmatic requirements. They are not quite forced to devote their pennies to the Self-Denial Fund, but it does not help them to refuse. They are compelled, in the name of discipline, to attend certain religious services each week, where they come under the persuasive appeals to come to the penitential altar. Dr. Clifford refuses to pay his education rate because part of the money is allocated to a special form of dogmatic teaching; but here is one of the greatest organisations relieving distress using public money to advance its special ideas—and at the same time refusing to supply the data on which alone the public can estimate its moral and material value to the State. Did the Royal Commission take this fact into consideration? Were they aware that the leader of this society has again and again refused an enquiry into the serious charges that have been made against it on the ground of sweating, underselling, and defective management? Did they enquire whether these and similar societies would be prepared to keep their accounts in conformity with the instructions and requirements of the new Poor Law? Did they put questions to the chairmen of philanthropic agencies bearing upon the supervision that would attend the introduction of this proposal?

We shall know these things bye and bye. Meantime I have made a cursory allusion to a phase of the question that must demand the closest attention from the Cabinet Committee appointed to consider the Commission's report with a view to legislation.

SOCIAL REFORMER.

The Drama.

DOLLS' HOUSES.

THE weakness of our modern British drama is nowhere seen more clearly than in the decline of talents which, in their first essays, seem to promise some fresh contributions to our stock of tolerable plays. What becomes of our "society" playwrights after the play-going world and its caterers have bent them to their uses—of our Grundys, Pineros, Joneses, Esmonds, Maughams, and the innumerable stage puppets which they have fashioned? Well, as these dolls go back to their cupboards, their makers, too, cease to interest the thoughtful playgoer. Such gifts of grace, or ease, or adaptability of manner as they possess, lose their freshness, or even though they persist, share the fate of unfashionable things, like last season's hats. Take Mr. Davies, for example. His puppets are dressed a little differently from those of his companions, more ingeniously. They move now and then almost like their living prototypes: their small, waxed faces wear a rather cynical expression, which their author has painted with some cleverness. None the less they are bodiless, soulless things, being merely stuffed suits of clothes—frock coats, dress coats, lounge coats, fancy waistcoats and "ties," footmen's lace and knee-breeches, tea gowns, evening gowns, motor caps and wrappings. As the manner and wearing of these articles change year by year in the Bond Street or Oxford Street shops, and the buyers' fancy lightly turns from one shape and tint to another, so do Mr. Davies's stage-dolls appear from time to time more amusing that Mr. Jones's, and vice versâ. But in the meantime, new caterers arise, with new dolls that have quite an artful turn of the eyebrow, or something neat in frills and laced petticoats. And Mr. Davies and Mr. Jones are forgotten.

"Bevis," whose appearance at the Haymarket seems a trifle incongruous, will have as short a life as its blooming companions. It, too, contains no human being; only assortments of well-made clothes. All these things, indeed, are pulled by one string. They want money and comfort, and they do not want to do any kind of work for them. "Bevis" himself, the young Marquis of Bewdley, wants money for motor cars, and is willing that a woman (young, pretty, dressed in the right way and using the right phrases) shall find it for him. His mother, the Dowager-Marchioness, wants money so that she can go on gambling at cards; his uncle that he may go on doing nothing; and these, again, look to the young woman and her father, a brewer, to satisfy their wants. Their pursuit presents no difficulties. The brewer is willing to sell his daughter for settlements on the Marquis, with something on account for the Dowager and the uncle, and the go-between, while the daughter is willing to be sold, provided she gets some sentimental love-making thrown in. This, the Marquis, who is merely idle and ill-bred, but not vicious, provides, until, by a ruse that could hardly have deceived an experienced fortune-hunter like the Dowager, the girl persuades Bevis that her father, who is crazy for the match, will cut her off with a shilling if she makes it. The worthy Bevis, having engaged to purchase a young lady for cash on delivery, declines on the spot to take her without it. Exeunt the brewer and the ingénue, the latter in tears, to the confusion of the attendant harpies—mother and uncle—who have been trying to make their private account out of the settlements, and of the lady who expects her little commission on the introduction of successful "business."

Such knots are easily untied and tied again. The lady who expects a commission undertakes this job. She does it at Bevis's request, for this gentleman now knows that Miss Hopkins is still on sale for a Marquisate, and he has his zeal of the chase and something that looks like love to gratify. The familiar medium is a week-end party at the go-between's cottage where all the parties meet in one of those intentionally comic, and really mirthless, complications round which these machine-made plays revolve. Here the girl is brought to surrender her outraged pride, and to offer herself to Bevis, on the understanding that the bargain is a business one in which money and a title are the only exchangeable assets, and affection and respect are left out of the account. But the young Marquis thinks this suggestion injurious to his personal pride, and as he has been declined by the maiden after he has disclosed himself as a fortune-hunter, now declines her when she avows that she merely assents to and joins in her father's chase after a Marquis. However, the mutual wants of these ingenuous creatures persisting, and the motor car and the gambling debts and the commission being still unredeemed—it remains for the author to bring sentiment to the aid of reason. This is done by leading the pair to the woods on a fine summer morning, and making the young lady discover Bevis's clothes by the river bank. Her distress at the thought that he has been drowned proves her love and satisfies Bevis's pique, so that the curtain descends on the reasonable hope that the voice which breathed o'er Eden will soon whisper its accustomed benediction over this delectable pair. I found myself a trifle troubled in my mind as to whether Mr. Davies meant this final note to sound in the cynical or in the sentimental key. No such doubt, however, seemed to disturb the audience, to whom Miss Lottie Venne's gurgles and starts and rushes supplied an exhilarating sauce to the milder delights of this refined comedy. I have only to add that Mr. Matthews, learning something from Mr. Hawtrey, knows exactly how to play Modern Young Men of the type of Bevis, and that when I see such accomplishment as Miss Henrietta Watson's wasted on such a part as the Marchioness of Bewdley, I sigh to think how much better it might be employed.

H. W. M.

Communications.

A RADICAL MEMBER'S VIEW.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The interval before the Budget proposals are made known to the country is an opportune moment for the Liberal party to indulge in a little self-examination and reflection. While looking back on the record of their performances, meditating on future prospects, and comparing the present with the past, will Liberals find themselves exultant or despondent? And if there is cause for despondency, let us try to discover the disquieting elements from which it originates.

There are three factors to be taken into account under the term Liberal Party—first, the Government, or, more correctly speaking, the Cabinet; secondly, the Liberal members of Parliament; and, thirdly, the Liberal electors in the country. These three elements are by way of starting in complete accord after a general election. The strength of the Party as a whole depends on how complete that accord remains during the years that pass before the next appeal to their constituencies. The electorate remains silent, closely observant and keenly critical during this period, and is only forced into articulate utterance—often of a completely misleading character—at bye-elections, when all the doubtful expedients of modern electioneering methods are concentrated on isolated constituencies to make them express an opinion But the general verdict of the country as a whole remains a mystery till the moment comes for it to be given. It is with the Government primarily that the responsibility rests to maintain unity and harmony. Their success in this must depend on the extent to which they continue rightly to interpret the political sentiments of the party in the country and the opinions of their supporters in the House. And failure awaits them in so far as they allow themselves to drift from their original course and try to impose upon their followers a policy which is not in strict conformity with the acknowledged ideals of the party, and which does not harmonise with the promises and pledges expressed in the last appeal to the country.

All Governments working in conjunction with the great departments of State, manned by permanent officials who may be invaluable as experts, but are not—and, indeed, cannot be—men passionately devoted to party principles, must gradually get detached in some directions from their followers in the country, and become hedged round with the mysterious dignity and aloofness of officialism. This phenomenon is more or less natural, but the present Government have been affected by it more acutely, perhaps, than others, from the fact that only a small minority of them had any experience of departmental and official work before they were called to office in 1905, and that they should be greatly influenced by able official subordinates was only to be expected. This, however, need only be noted in passing. In ability, there can be no question, the present Government are immeasurably superior to any which could be formed out of members of the Opposition. But the main consideration to be taken into account is the fact that in the fourth year of their existence the Government have strained the patience and loyalty of their supporters by putting forward a most unappetising programme, dull, spiritless, wanting in originality, lacking in vigour. While eating our words with regard to expenditure on armaments, while shirking the long-promised conflict with the Lords, while preparing ourselves for a meaningless and ineffectual struggle over Welsh Disestablishment, it is impossible to expect enthusiasm and the high quality of work which enthusiasm alone can produce. On the contrary, the absence of a bold fighting policy is causing a listless indifference and lack of interest which might in time amount to estrangement between the Government and the main body of their supporters. But even this does not cover the whole ground, for it is a state of affairs that can still be cured to some extent by a strong and comprehensive financial policy, dealing with land, licences, and large incomes. To scrutinise the course of events more closely, we must recollect the complexion of the party as it was returned in 1906. We must remember the type of Liberal that led the party to victory and steered them through two years and more of useful activity, and at the same time reflect that he represented accurately the tone, and was throughout in intimate touch with the feelings, opinions, and principles of the very great majority of his large majority.

Are there signs that the complexion has changed? Is there any truth in the oft-repeated phrase, "The Imperialists have got the upper hand"? And do Radicals feel some misgivings when they hear of the desire which has been expressed to form a "Moderate" party, and of the very significant refusal given lately from high quarters to a proposal for at last disbanding the Liberal League? Although the Radical element may have diminished almost to vanishing point in the Cabinet, it is still strong in the House of Commons, though cowed, and for the time apparently bewildered. But Radicals, conscious that by the party in the country anyhow their views are greatly preferred, should remember their numerical strength, should stand together, organise and realise that they have power—power even to dictate. If they are content to drift, if they do not lift an insistent voice of protest, if they submit to be carried along with the tide, the inevitable result must be that a policy which entails compromise with our opponents on many vital points—the flaccid policy of the Liberal League—will certainly become the accepted policy of the Liberal Party.

Here is food for reflection for all who are not indifferent to the future of Liberalism.—Yours, &c.,

House of Commons,
April 6th, 1909. RADICAL M.P.

Letters to the Editor.

THE HERO CULT IN MODERN IRISH LITERATURE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have been waiting in breathless suspense for some weeks past expecting to hear "noise and battle," and to have news of the gathering of the clans of the Gael; but it would seem that the aforesaid clans have been too busily engaged in cementing the German Alliance, which has resulted in Dr. Kuno Meyer's triumphal entry within the precincts of London University.

In a recent number of the "Cornhill Magazine" Mr. Andrew Lang contributed an article entitled "Irish Epics and Homer," which contains the possible casus belli. There is nothing to object to in the criticism of the Irish Epic tales as regards their literary value, their shortcomings (as compared with Homer), their lapses into barbarism. The appreciation, on the whole, is a just one. For Mr. Lang says: "I naturally love les primitifs——, and no way of living known to us has so much in common, perhaps, with the Homeric way of living, as that described in the most ancient Irish romances."

Mr. Lang's complaint is that the Irish people have not sufficiently valued the grandest of all these romantic tales, that is, those of the Red Branch Cycle. "The Iliads and Odysseys of heroic Ireland," he says, "have never, or only of late, been published, while not till 1904 did Miss Winifred Faraday give us her prose translation of a portion of 'The Tainbo Cuailnge,' and recently a French translation by Monsieur d'Arbois de Jubainville has appeared in the austere pages of the 'Revue Celtique.' Might one not suppose that Celtic enthusiasts would long ago have published these ancient Irish romances in critical editions, and translated them for the benefit of all Europe and the glory of Erin? One is amazed that Celtic patriotism has kept the good wine till so late."

Well, a whole article could be written as to why Ireland has fallen behind in this matter of Celtic research in comparison with Continental scholars. The new universities in a few years may give us another tale to tell; meantime, in humble admiration of the great achievement of Windisch, we might have been disposed to submit meekly to Mr. Lang's reproach. But listen to this: "Nothing did more to spread the renown of Scotland in the eighteenth century than Macpherson's pretended translation of Ossian. That work was at most a modernised pastiche. Macpherson's hero Fingal was a parvenue, an upstart compared with Conchobar and Cuchalain, Madb, and Fer-Diad, the men and women of the ould ancient epic of all."

Is not this an insinuation that the Irish have not even done so much in the way of popularising the Red Branch tales as Macpherson did in his "pastiche"?

Mr. Lang might have mentioned that the publication of Macpherson's fantasies was followed in Ireland by the scholarly editions of nearly all our Ossianic literature. The Red Branch tales were more cumbrous, clothed in more archaic language, requiring to be interpreted by the greatest Celtic philologists. Hence we were not given the actual texts in any large quantity. But the material of the tales has been well known to such scholars as we had, and since Mr. Lang brags of Macpherson, I will now give some account of the amount of literature in English by Irish writers which deals with the Red Branch tales. I will in no case mention any writer who has simply treated the subject on the Macpherson lines. Mr. Standish O'Grady, the well-known author and journalist (not to be confounded with Standish Hayes O'Grady, the Celtic scholar), published some time in the 'seventies, under the title of "A History of Ireland," a splendid prose epic of the Cuchalain era. This work has been the inspiration of poets and dramatists in the Irish literary revival. His "The Coming of Cuchalain," published in 1894, put the opening episodes of the hero's career in an attractive form for young readers. Miss Eleanor Hull more recently compiled her "Cuchalain Saga"; and then came Lady Gregory's "Cuchlain of Muirtheimne." Sir Samuel Ferguson had written so many poems dealing with that era that they were after his death collected in one volume as "Lays of the Red Branch." These included "The Tain-Quest," "The Healing of Conal Cearnach," and his wonderful "Naming of Cuchulain." There were also "Deirdre's Lament," and a poem in dramatic form called "Deirdre." Aubrey de Vere attempted to render the whole story of the "Tain" in Spenserian style in his "Foray of Queen Meave."

There is a whole literature dealing with the "Deirdre" episode. Dr. Douglas Hyde in his college days wrote a Tennysonian narrative poem, and Robert Dwyer Joyce another, entitled "Deirdre." A Feis Ceoil prize cantata by Signor Esposito was written to a "Deirdre" libretto from the pen of T. Rolleston.

On the stage we have had an exquisite play from the mystical pen of "A. E." It has been acted in Dublin, and was one of the earliest productions of the Ulster Literary Theatre in Belfast.

Mr. W. B. Yeats dealt with the subject in a more tragic and turgid manner. Mrs. Patrick Campbell has appeared as the Yeats "Deirdre" at the Abbey Theatre in Dublin.

There have been other Red Branch plays at the Abbey. Mr. Yeats gave us "On Baile's Errand," the story of Cuchalain's death, and "The Golden Helmet," an episode of his youth. Mr. Wilfred Blunt's "Fand" dealt with the hero's love for a fairy lady and the only jealousy of Emer. Passing from the literary sphere to that of recited tradition, the Red Branch tales are fewer by far than the Ossianic among the country Seanachies. Mr. Stephen Gwynn got the story of Cuculain's combat with his son from a Gaelic speaker in Donegal. There are legends in Co. Antrim about Conal Cearnach, and the Red Branch names cling to many a dun and hillside. Meave's cairn is shown near Sligo, Cuculain's house at Dundalk. They have not forgotten Emer at Lusk. In conclusion, to disturb a little Mr. Lang's satisfaction with Macpherson, I would draw his attention to the epic poem rendering of the "Tain" written in the modern Ulster capital, Belfast, by Mrs. Arthur Hutton. A daring feat was attempted in reconstructing the old Celtic tale into poetic books on the Homeric model. But the attempt was preceded by a dozen years of patient research into the original documents. The author acquired laboriously a knowledge of old Gaelic, and went to the facsimile reprints of the Book of Lienster and the Leabhar na h-uidhre for her material. The result is an epic in fifteen books of fairly well-sustained literary merit, with frequent passages which rise into real poetry. It is a book which may be well compared with the standard translations of Homer, and which at the same time might be turned to as a book of reference, as to the characters and typography of the Red Branch cycle.—Yours, &c.,

ALICE L. MILLIGAN.

LONDON UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I will only put two questions to Mr. Spindler:—

(1) Does he think Dutch education greatly inferior on the intellectual side to English, or is it not true that the average Dutchman knows more than the average Englishman?

(2) Why does all Dutch opinion condemn the system of external examiners if it be obviously the best? Are the Dutch "almost childishly simple"?—Yours, etc.,

K. LAKE.

Leiden University,
April 5th, 1909.

LOYALTY TO PARTY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letter of R. Henderson Smith from South Edinburgh raises a difficult question. Is it advisable to withhold a vote if the weight of social influences and "expert" tendency drives a Liberal Government into dangerous courses? But the reactionary party hail with delirious joy any fall in the Liberal vote, and any winning of seats. The temptation to withhold a vote is enormous for earnest men; but though we may punish for the moment, we might consider the impetus given to a real retrograde movement in policy. Everything counts, and there is the question of political momentum. How far is the swing to go?—Yours, &c.,

X.

Leamington.

THE ART OF J. M. SYNGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is an interesting, sympathetic letter in your issue of April 3rd on "The Art of J. M. Synge," which contains an error too slight to notice were it not that it may strengthen some fool in his folly. Your correspondent quotes me correctly as having said that Mr. Synge's work before he went to Arran was too literary, too full of "images reflected from mirror to mirror," but he is wrong in supposing that it was "the morbid remote poetry" that "Englishmen and Frenchmen were writing at that time," or that it showed the influence of "the poets of Montmartre." He has been reading some Irish journalist (generally a mistake when literature is the subject) who believes, or pretends to believe, that the author of "The Play Boy of the Western World" borrowed something of his genius from "French decadents." If there are "decadents" in Montmartre, or elsewhere, Mr. Synge knew nothing of them. When I met him in Paris I found him reading Racine, and because he wished to make a little money by criticism of French literature, I urged him vainly to read the writers of his own time. He read throughout his life the great classics and these alone, and even in those early imitative poems and essays there was no other influence.—Yours, &c.,

W. B. YEATS.

Abbey Theatre, Dublin,
April 6th, 1909.

VOTES FOR WOMEN AND ADULT SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Two things strike me as being left, to some extent, out of the discussion in THE NATION on women's suffrage and "petticoat government," as adult suffrage has been called. First, the probable readjustment in numbers of the proportion of women to men; and, secondly, the rapidity with which women to-day are being educated politically. To take the last first.

The extension of votes to men has come about very gradually; it is nearly eighty years since some men had votes, and yet we are far from giving votes to all men. It may be just as long again before we give them to all women, and shall we of this generation presume to say whether or not the bulk of women will be "fit" for the vote in generations to come? Large numbers at least are fit now, and their education, politically and economically, will be immensely stimulated by the possession of the vote.

When Mrs. Travers writes as if adult suffrage might be upon us in the near future, she seems to me to be either raising a bogey to frighten the fearful or showing a complete ignorance of the political situation.

With regard to the relative numbers of the sexes, there are more boy babies born than girls, but they die more easily, and, also, women are longer lived than men. So far as the latter fact is due to accidents, it will probably be partially remedied by legislation, which more and more looks after the health and safety of the worker, and reduces the hours of work. So far as it is due to the greater temperance of women, both as regards alcoholic and other indulgences, it will probably be partially remedied, also, by the gradual raising of the status of women, and its effect upon their economic condition. When women are influential enough to set a more equitable standard of morals between men and women, the general health of the country, and the heritage of the innocent babies in particular, may be improved. If the limited vote is good for women now—and what anti has a single argument against the limited Bill?—it seems to me not statesmanship, but hysteria, to stand in its way because of a possible extension in the future—an extension which may be granted as undesirable now, but may be shorn of any "danger" by altered conditions in the future.

When womanhood suffrage is in the realm of practical politics, the limited vote will have been educating women for years or generations, and bettered conditions and bettered morality will (we may reasonably hope) have done something to make the male person as fit to survive as the female.—Yours, &c.,

H. B. Dowson.

The Park, Nottingham.

P.S.—Since this letter was written there has been a leader in The Nation pleading for the support of Mr. Geoffrey Howard's Adult Suffrage Bill. "Convinced democrats," who are also women suffragists, see more clearly than ever since that debate in the House that the question of adult suffrage is of academic interest only, and it is difficult to believe that politicians who know anything of the cautiousness of the average Englishman really expects that all women will be enfranchised together, and in the near future.

The writer of the leader says that the Limited Suffrage Bill will not be accepted by the present House of Commons, but an overwhelming majority are pledged to it, and have already accepted it; and, in stating that Mr. Howard's Bill would gain the "patronage of the Government itself," he was again prophesying without knowing. Mr. Asquith voted against it. We suffragists, who do not like Mr. Howard's Bill, and who feel that we have once more been deserted by trusted Parliamentary supporters, show no "dislike of democracy"; we only show that we realise—what to the writer is evidently a very secondary consideration—the only way of getting votes for some women without undue delay.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mrs. Gerald Paget, complains that the Women's National Anti-Suffrage League comes late upon the scene. It is not clear to her that the League objects to any woman having a vote, because they base their objection partly upon the fact that adult suffrage would result. She states that woman's suffrage is a reform that contains no element of revolution, but that adult suffrage is in the nature of a revolution.

Now, all this is subject to one explanation, namely, that Parliamentary votes are not a matter of individual right, but of utility to the State. The franchise should be enlarged or decreased exactly, as it would be most likely to benefit the nation. John Stuart Mill, writing on "Liberty," lays great stress upon this point.

Now, so long as the woman's suffrage movement confined itself to spreading the belief that woman suffrage was desirable for the good of the nation, the question was open for sober discussion, and no active opposition was necessary or desirable; but directly the suffrage was proclaimed throughout the country as a right that was being unfairly withheld from women, active opposition became imperative. For if any women were granted the suffrage on the basis of "no taxation without representation," or, in other words, on the individual right of those taxed, there could be no logical conclusion to the extension of the franchise until adult suffrage for both sexes was granted, and the vote given to every individual who is taxed in some form or another.

There can surely be no doubt that woman suffrage compels adult suffrage: that it would be a very great revolution, and that active opposition is necessary to ensure that the measure gets adequate discussion, and that it is submitted for the decision of the electorate.—Yours, &c.,

Lionel Barrett.

110, Heath Street, Hampstead.

---

THE APPEAL TO FORCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Have you noticed how a certain "League" seeks to appeal to the men of this country with the words addressed by the arch-fiend to all his poor brother devils, "Awake, arise, or be for ever fallen!" For my part, I do not like being classed with such company, and do not intend to respond. If I mistake not, it is the same Satan who makes the wise remark to the same audience, "who overcomes by force hath overcome but half his foe."—Yours, &c.,

A Lover of Milton.

April 6th, 1909.

---

A SECRET DOCTRINE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In the review of Mr. Waites' book on "The Holy Graal"—that "entrancing" work, as the reviewer rightly calls it, great doubt is cast on the possibility of a "secret doctrine" being a feature of the Christian Church. But, Sir, if there is anything more clear than another, it is that Jesus of Nazareth invariably clothed His teaching in forms which, while their meaning was clear to a few, was hidden from the multitude. His words have two applications, one literal, the other spiritual. As a rule, the literal or obvious meaning is the one more generally laid hold of, and, in consequence, its real meaning eludes the hearer. The spiritual meaning is distinctly hidden, cryptic, recondite, not for a time, but eternal in its application. In this sense, I would suggest that there is, and always has been, a "secret doctrine" in the Church, to which a few, in all ages, have had access. Those, indeed, who have spoken of it have been "open as the Day That they may better hide themselves." Who would read, e.g., in the reference to the Prophet Jonah, St. Matthew, xii. 39, a most tremendous and enlightening command to an "evil and adulterous generation" to seek initiation, with its mystic death and burial and resurrection? Who would see in the story of the Prodigal Son the whole arcana of a mystic rite, with its "robe" and "ring" and "fatted calf"? Instances crowd upon one as one ponders the Gospel story, and one wonders for what reason Christendom has been so blind for so long, when there was so much yet to be learned of which at present we know hardly anything. It was His method: "Without a parable spake He not to them" (St. Matthew, xiii., 34). But yes, He explained to His disciples; yet even to them I doubt whether the whole truth was revealed. "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now" (St. John, xvi., 12) is a disclosure of their inability even then to grasp all He had to say.

If I might add one further word, it would be in defence of the "gibberish" of the Pistis-Sophia and the Gnosis generally. To "A.M." it may be a dream or a nightmare. But I think that a further acquaintance with that magnificent conception of a world scheme converted to a world religion would induce him to modify his view in this respect. Is it not plain that the main teaching of the Christ is a teaching of the Gnosis, that He Himself was a Gnostic, and that it is only by applying the Gnostic key that we can hope to arrive at the true inner meaning of His Message?—Yours, &c.,

F. G. Montagu Powell.

April 5th, 1909.

CRIMELESS IRELAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As a Crown Prosecutor connected with the administration of the criminal law of Ireland for upwards of twenty years, I desire to give you some figures for the information of your English readers, which, I venture to suggest, afford a conclusive answer to those, who, in Parliament and elsewhere, persist in representing Ireland to be in a state of chronic crime and disorder. The Spring Assizes for this year have just concluded, and accurately analysing the charges of our eminent judges to the Grand Juries of the thirty-two counties, I find that the total number of indictments presented for those counties, and those of the most ordinary character, only reached a total of 138. That number is, of course, exclusive of the returns for the cities of Dublin, Belfast, and Cork, which were of a very normal type.

These figures work out to a fraction of over four cases for each county, or taking the rural and town population of Ireland at, say, four millions, would give thirty-five indictable offences for each million of the population.

Do the records of any country in the world exhibit such immunity from crime? I enclose my card.—Yours, &c.,

VERITAS.

Dublin,
April 2nd, 1909.

DIFFERENTIATED INCOME-TAX.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As it has been announced in several papers that the Income-tax will probably be raised on incomes that accrue from money saved, as contrasted with money in process of being earned, will you allow me to point out how disastrously this would affect persons in my condition, of whom there are many? I have been teaching all my life in a post which did not permit me to save more than enough to live very economically on my retirement, which has now occurred owing to age. I am unable to work any longer, and the result will be that I shall be obliged either to remain in England in reduced circumstances, or to go and live on the Continent where life is cheaper. I find that many in my position are adopting the latter alternative.—Yours, &c.,

EX-TEACHER.

April 6th, 1909.

NAVAL EXPENDITURE AND THE SUFFERING OF THE PEOPLE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I express the absolute dismay one feels on reading that increased naval expenditure is contemplated by the Government which so triumphantly set out three years ago to walk the pleasant paths of peace, retrenchment, and reform? Is the nation's strength to be further sucked out just as she is turning the corner, after the worst attack of unemployment—(the national influenza fiend of modern times)—from which our country has suffered for years?

Quite apart from hunger-marchers and unemployed processionists, some of the workers in poor districts could testify that hunger and want have been severely felt even among the upper stratum of the artisan class during the past months. A quiet young curate, who lives and works among the people in a poor parish of one of our great Midland industrial towns, told me that he knew, as a fact, that some of their regular church members had pawned everything, including their underclothing. Women and girls came to parish functions in mid-winter clad merely in outer garments. These church members do not belong to the chronically poor: they are more or less skilled factory hands. They belong to the class which is the backbone of these manufacturing islands. That such people should have to face the damp and cold of winter without adequate food and clothing, means—in the future—weakness, disease, degeneration, impaired vitality among the very class on whose strength and ability England's economic welfare so largely depends. From personal experience, I could tell of shortness of work, meaning shortness of food for skilled artisan families in more rural districts of the West of England. And these people are to contribute directly and indirectly to the price of Dreadnoughts! This at a time when they want every penny for food, or to redeem their pawned clothing and furniture. Would it not be the best way of preserving Britain to see that she does not rot at the core?—Yours, &c.,

C. E. PLAYNE.

February 23rd, 1909.

Poetry.

THE BALLAD OF O'FARRELL.

ALL that O'Farrell had
  Is slipping from his hands—
The home that was his of old,
  The tilled and the grass lands,
The bed where he used to sleep,
  And the roof over his head;
The heaven is now his roof,
  And the road his bed.

Once O'Farrell had wealth,
  Gold enough and to spare;
His were the fattest sheep
  That came to the Callow fair;
His was the finest house
  You'd see in a three days' ride;
And his was the hardest heart
  In all the countryside.

To O'Farrell's door one day
  A beggar woman came,
Asking a bit and a sup
  In God's holy Name:
She had left the back of the hills
  Before the dawn of day
With never a crust of bread
  To help her on her way.

O'Farrell looked at her dress
  And saw it was poor and worn;
O'Farrell looked at her feet
  And saw they were sore and torn;
O'Farrell looked at her face
  And saw it was old and gray:
"You may go to the devil," he said,
  "For all you'll get here this day."

When the woman heard those words,
  She turned from O'Farrell's door;
She said, "You have cursed me now
  "Because I am old and poor:
"That you may be poor and old
  "And begging from place to place,
"And that folk may drive you away
  "And slam their doors in your face."

O'Farrell has had no peace
  From that day, day or night;
His wealth has vanished away
  Like mist in the sun's light;
Before the lambing-time
  He has lost the half of his sheep;
His crops have grown black in the field
  Before it was time to reap.

All that O'Farrell had
  Is slipping from his hands—
The home that was his of old,
  The tilled and the grass lands,
The bed where he used to sleep,
  And the roof over his head;
May the heaven be his only roof
  And the road his bed!

C. H. BEWLEY.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

WE understand that Professor Courthope has practically finished the sixth volume of his "History of English Poetry," and that it will appear in Messrs. Macmillan's list for the coming autumn. Readers will be glad to hear that this great work, the first volume of which appeared in 1895, is now approaching completion. Since Warton published his "History of English Poetry" towards the end of the eighteenth century, no English scholar has been courageous enough to undertake a task of such magnitude.

* * *

"THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JAMES WOLFE," which Mr. Beckles Willson has nearly ready for the press, will contain over forty letters that have never been published before, and will also incorporate fresh biographical material of interest. Mr. Willson points out that although there are upwards of forty lives of Nelson extant, no adequate biography of Wolfe is available for the general reader. Wright's memoir published in 1864 has long been out of print. Parkman's "Montcalm and Wolfe," while presenting a clear outline of Wolfe's character, deals almost exclusively with his last campaign, and Mr. Bradley's monograph, though excellent, is too short to give many intimate details of its subject.

* * *

IN his interesting introduction to the selection from George Gilfillan's "Literary Portraits," just published in Messrs. Dent's "Everyman's Library" series, Dr. Robertson Nicoll recalls the satire which proved so destructive to the "Spasmodic School." This was Aytoun's "Firmillian, or the Student of Badajoz: A Spasmodic Tragedy." It was one of the most effective skits of the kind ever written, for, although Sydney Dobell, Alexander Smith, and Gilfillan produced work of distinct value after its publication, they never recovered their former reputation with the general public. Gilfillan is a critic well worth reprinting, for although Dr. Nicoll claims no permanent place in literature for him, he acknowledges that he had great merits. "No one perceived earlier or more steadfastly the genius of Shelley. Hazlitt and Lamb were hailed by Gilfillan at a time when many critics miserably under-rated them. Of Macaulay, Gilfillan from the first took his own view undismayed by the clamor of the hour. The justice of one estimate from which he never deviated has yet to be decided. From first to last he unhesitatingly put Tennyson in the second rank of English poets." Gilfillan's style was always highly finished, with a certain formal brilliancy, which we do not enjoy so keenly as did an earlier generation of readers.

* * *

A BOOK on "The Life and Works of Ruskin," by Mr. Ashmore Wingate, is about to be added to the "Great Writers" series issued by the Walter Scott Publishing Company. An excellent feature of this series is the copious bibliographies with which all the volumes are furnished.

* * *

A NEW, and what promises to be a most useful series of books, descriptive of the world's art, is announced by Mr. Heinemann for the autumn. The series has been suggested by M. Solomon Reinach's manual, "Apollo," a work that has met with a deserved success, and has now been translated into nearly every European language. As Dr. Reinach traced art through all ages and countries, so each of the coming books will trace the art of one particular people. At present fifteen volumes have been arranged for, the first dealing with "Art in the British Isles" being by Sir Walter Armstrong, while Dr. Bode and Dr. Max Rooses will be among subsequent contributors. A feature of the series will be the large number of illustrations in each volume, though great pains will be spent upon the critical appreciations of the progress of art in each of the countries dealt with.

* * *

"THE Secret History of the Court of Spain, 1802-1906," is the title of a book by Miss Rachel Challice which Mr. John Long has in preparation. The main feature of the book is that its material is drawn from Spanish sources, and that it thus presents in a new light facts which have hitherto been looked at from an English or a French point of view. During her stay at Madrid Miss Challice was given facilities for research by the Spanish authorities and was enabled to consult documents preserved at the library of the Royal Palace.

* * *

A TRANSLATION of the late Arvède Barine's "Madame, Mother of the Regent," is to be published shortly by Messrs. Putnam's. The heroine of the book is, of course, the second wife of Louis XIV.'s younger brother, the Duc d'Orleans. Arvède Barine's historical biographies are among the best of their kind, showing skill in dramatic presentation and a keen eye for character. The book, now to appear in English dress, is quite up to the level of its predecessors.

* * *

ALTHOUGH the novels of Otto Ernst enjoy a great popularity in Germany, none of them have up to the present, been translated into English. However, Mrs. A. C. Caton has made a beginning with a version of "Asmus Semper: The Story of a Boyhood," which will be published this month by Mr. Francis Griffiths.

* * *

GREAT interest has been aroused in the United States by the statement made by President Eliot of Harvard that he intends to make a selection of books sufficient to fill a shelf five feet long, the reading of which, for ten minutes a day, would insure a liberal education. Hundreds of letters have been sent him bearing upon the selection, which he proposes to call the Harvard Library. Many similar lists have been made, and publishers have been prompt to issue the selected volumes in uniform binding, usually with advantage to themselves. We may expect to see the Harvard Library among the most popular of such series.

* * *

IN his interesting volume of reminiscences, "Pre-Tractarian Oxford," the Rev. W. Tuckwell gives, "with all deference," a list of the seven great biographies in the English language. They are, Boswell's "Johnson," "Lockhart's "Scott," Southey's "Nelson," Lewes's "Goethe," Carlyle's "Sterling," Trevelyan's "Macaulay," and Stanley's "Arnold." Most readers will agree with Mr. Tuckwell's choice, but if a list of the twelve greatest biographies had to be made, it would be very much harder to find anything like a general consensus. We mention five works which might be added to Mr. Tuckwell's list, viz., Froude's "Carlyle," Purcell's "Manning," Ticknor's "Prescott," Forster's "Dickens," and the "Memoirs of Dr. Currie," a book which Mr. Birrell has been praising of late. It is noteworthy that out of all the biographies named, only one, Boswell's "Johnson," was written before the beginning of the nineteenth century.

* * *

THE late François Coppée left among his manuscripts a volume of memoirs, which will probably be published during the coming autumn. It is sure to contain some interesting details about the beginnings of the Parnassian school, and the period when Coppée numbered such men as Sully-Prudhomme, Théodore de Banville, Heredia, Verlaine, Mallarmé, Catulle Mendès, and Anatole France among his literary associates. Another autobiography announced for early publication is that of M. Camille Flammarion.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette." By Lieut.-Col. Andrew Haggard. (Hutchinson. 2 vols. 24s. net.)

"A History of Art." By Dr. G. Carotti. Revised by Mrs. S. Arthur Strong. Vol. II. "The Middle Ages." (Duckworth. 5s. net.)

"A Vindication of Warren Hastings." By G. W. Hastings. (Frowde. 6s.)

"Stories from the Greek Legends." By C. Gasquoine Hartley. (Werner Laurie. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Insurance Against Unemployment." By D. F. Schloss. (P. S. King & Son. 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Gospel and Human Needs." Hulsean Lectures. By J. N. Figgis, Litt.D. (Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.)

"The Mantle of Ishmael." By J. S. Fletcher. (Nash. 6s.)

"Bibliothèques: Essai sur le développement des Bibliothèques publiques et de la Librairie dans les deux mondes." Par Eugène Morel. (Paris: Mercure de France. 15fr.)

"Silhouettes d'Outre-Manche." Par Jacques Bardoux. (Paris: Hachette, 3fr. 50.)

"M. Anatole France et la Pensée Contemporaine." Par Raphael Cor. (Paris: Pelletan, 5fr.)

"Le Conte fantastique dans le romantisme français." Par J. H. Retinger. (Paris: Grasset. 2fr.)

Reviews.

GREENWOOD v. SHAKESPEARE.*

"We talked of a gentleman who was running out his fortune in London; and I said, 'We must get him out of it. All his friends must quarrel with him, and that will soon drive him away.' Johnson: 'Nay, sir; we'll send you to him. If your company does not drive a man out of his house, nothing will.' . . . . 'She is in the right to flatter Garrick. She is in the right for two reasons: first, because she has the world with her, who have been praising Garrick these thirty years; and secondly, because she is rewarded for it by Garrick. Why should she flatter me? I can do nothing for her. Let her carry her praise to a better market.'" These citations are taken at random from the "Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D.," by James Boswell; and the reader is requested to compare them with the following description of Icolmkill:—

> "We were now treading that illustrious island, which was once the luminary of the Caledonian regions, whence savage clans and roving barbarians derived the benefits of knowledge, and the blessings of religion. To abstract the mind from all local emotion would be impossible if it were endeavored, and would be foolish if it were possible. Whatever withdraws us from the power of our senses, whatever makes the past, the distant, or the future, predominate over the present, advances us in the dignity of thinking beings. . . . The man is little to be envied, whose patriotism would not gain force upon the plain of Marathon, or whose piety would not grow warmer among the ruins of Iona."

Now this passage is an excerpt from the "Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland," published under the name of the Samuel Johnson mentioned above; and it may be said at once that the contrast might easily have been made greater. "Johnson," the talker, was sometimes more direct and more colloquial than in the passages cited; "Johnson," the writer, was often more ponderous and antithetical than in the description of Iona. And yet, so far as the writer is aware, no one has pointed out the improbability of the two "Johnsons" being one and the same person. Yet the discrepancy between the spoken word and the written word is assuredly very great. Furthermore, the reasons for doubting the generally received account of "Johnson" and his works are not by any means limited to such evidence as has been given. Johnson, we are told, was the son of an extremely foolish and unsuccessful provincial bookseller, who ended in bankruptcy, or something very like it; and this offspring of the little Lichfield shop became, so the story goes, a miracle of learning. He was almost blind—he would run into people in the streets from defective vision—and yet he was a most acute observer of all about him. He went to small local schools, then confessedly at a low ebb of learning; left Oxford without taking his degree, and—became one of the greatest scholars in England. He is represented as a man of the most atrocious manners; and also as conducting a conversation with his sovereign with the dignity and composure of a duke: he was a welcome guest at the houses of noblemen; and yet behaved at table in a fashion that would have disgraced a ravenous ploughboy. He was the idlest man in London; and devoted years of his life to the toil and drudgery of dictionary-making: he loathed the name of Scotchman; and made a Scotchman his principal friend. On one occasion he is represented as defending every article of the Roman Catholic faith; on another as declaring that the Roman Catholic Church, in so far as it differed from the English, was utterly and absolutely in the wrong. On one page he appears as harsh, brutal, intolerant, and overbearing; on another as exercising the heroic virtues of a primitive saint. His biographer presents him as a typical English Tory, of the highest and driest kind, carrying the doctrine of blind submission to an impossible exaggeration—and also as drinking to the next insurrection of the negroes. He despised actors, and would not suffer anyone to say a word against Garrick. Surely these considerations must incline us to doubt the received theory of Johnson, to suspect, at all events, that there were in reality two Johnsons—one the bookseller's hack, son of the bankrupt provincial tradesman, a man of a certain rough capacity and racy directness of speech; the other a courtly scholar, who, for some obscure reason, preferred to mask his identity under the name of the Grub-street scribbler. At least, we should do well to suspend judgment on the matter; more especially as the "Life" of Johnson, admittedly and incomparably the best biography in the world, is said to have been written by an idle, drunken, dissipated Scottish laird, whose conversation usually verged on idiocy, whose letters are the babblings of a sheer, unadulterated fool, and a fool of a very bad character. And this drivelling Don Juan is supposed to have lived on terms of the closest and most affectionate intimacy with the wisest man and the austerest moralist of the age.

And yet, in spite of all these inconsistencies and discrepancies, which might be multiplied almost to infinity, we are all of us perfectly sure that there was one Samuel Johnson, and that James Boswell of Auchinleck wrote his life; and thus it is that we are not likely to be much moved by the arguments adduced by Mr. G. G. Greenwood, author of "In re Shakespeare: Beeching v. Greenwood. Rejoinder on behalf of the Defendant." Mr. Greenwood has his list of inconsistencies, improbabilities, discrepancies; and it is submitted that the case against William Shakespeare of Stratford-on-Avon being the author of "Hamlet" is by no means so strong as the case against the son of old, unhappy Michael Johnson of Lichfield being the author of the "Rambler," and the companion of the most brilliant and distinguished men of the time. The fact is that with Shakespeare, as with Johnson, there is no case at all for suspecting a mystery of any sort; though in either instance it is possible to fabricate phantasmal arguments which may seem to wear a delusive robe of reality.

What, then, are Mr. Greenwood's arguments? Well, in the first place, there is the spelling of the name. "Shakespeare," says the author, was the Great Unknown; "Shakspere," "Shagspere," "Shaxsper," or "Shaxbere" was the "Stratford rustic" who could not have written the sonnets to save his life. Mr. Greenwood quotes Dr. Furnivall to prove that the rustic always wrote his name Shakspere; but even the citation from this great authority shows that the fifth undoubted signature ends "eere." And then one of Mr. Greenwood's points is that the pronunciation of the two names varied—the Stratford man pronouncing his name as "Shackspur." But Dr. Furnivall declares that "the 'e' and 'a' had their French sounds, which explain the forms 'Shaxper,' etc." And then, again, the Unknown presumably wished his identity to be lost in that of the player. Surely that end would not be served by carefully distinguishing in spelling and pronunciation between "Shaxper" and "Shake-speare"? And though Mr. Greenwood makes a point of the fact that some of Shakespeare's "fellow-countrymen" spelled his name "Shaxbere," "Shagspere," and in other odd ways, he also states that Ben Jonson calls the "player" "Will Shake-speare," and that some of his Warwickshire associates knew him as "Shakespere." And there is a deed which contains the two spellings: "Shakspere" and "Shakespere." What, then, is left of the argument as to varying pronunciation? Mr. Greenwood, of his own free choice, compares his various arguments to "many strands that together form a strong rope." The analogy seems unfortunate; for the "strand" of the name is decidedly of the weakest.

There is another "strand." Shakespeare was a "Stratford rustic." One really does not see what follows from this statement. The word "rustic" signifies, presumably, that Shakespeare was not born in London. We may readily grant the proposition, and vainly seek for any possible ergo. Burns was an Ayrshire ploughboy, Hogg was an Ettrick shepherd, Dickens was a lawyer's clerk. And what are the major propositions that are to be added to these "minors," and what possible conclusions are we to deduce from them? Surely we are not to argue:—

> Lawyers' clerks are never possessed of genius.
> Dickens was a lawyer's clerk.
> Therefore, Dickens did not write "Pickwick."

Other arguments are that Shakespeare's father was illiterate, that Shakespeare when he went on the stage occupied a subordinate position, that he never rose above the Ghost in "Hamlet," that the scholarship of the masters at Stratford school is uncertain, that as a young man he was a wastrel, that twelve years after the publication of the Great Folio the proprietors of the theatres call him a "man-player" and a "deserving man," instead of "the great poet and dramatist." To which it may be replied that the illiteracy of Shakespeare's father is absolutely non-significant, that actors, like other people, often begin from the bottom, and not from the top, of the tree, that Shakespeare's abilities as a player are nihil ad rem, that the exact scholarship of his teachers is unimportant, that men of genius are not invariably persons of regular and austere life, and, finally, that we have no means of probing the intelligence of the theatrical managers. And against all these "strands," which make up a great part of Mr. Greenwood's "rope," we have to set the fact that Jonson, speaking of the playwright, calls him a supreme artist, but an indifferent scholar. Such a description would hardly apply to the Great Unknown, who, according to Mr. Greenwood, represented the highest culture of the age.

* "In re Shakespeare. Beeching v. Greenwood." By G. G. Greenwood, M.P. Lane. 2s. 6d. net.

The controversy, indeed, seems an intolerably idle and unfruitful matter. It is interesting, however, at one point, when it turns on the question of Shakespeare's "education." If we accept Jonson's account of the author of the plays, we must take it that, roughly speaking, he was a man who could make sense of a Latin author without being a critical scholar, while his Greek, elementary to begin with, had become a vanishing quantity. And it is extraordinary that everybody should not see that such a "smattering" was amply sufficient—for a man of genius. Keats could not read a line of Greek; and who has written more exquisitely of things Greek than the author of the sonnet "On first looking into Chapman's Homer," of the "Ode on a Grecian Urn," of the "Hymn" to Pan? What did Keats know critically of the romantic spirit of the Middle Ages? And who has embodied that spirit more wonderfully than the author of "La Belle Dame sans Merci"? What did Keats understand of "Provençal song"? He had probably some vague recollection of having read some vague passage about troubadours. It seems that it must be stated—not surely for the first time—that genius is in itself an education, nay, that it is the only true education, for which the scholastic training is the pale and feeble substitute. By infinite pains, by many years of labor, with daily drudgery, we, who have not genius, may, if we have some degree of perception, arrive at a shadow of the knowledge which Keats, by a mystic and intuitive process, gained from a little Virgil and a good deal of Lemprière. And, seeing that it is granted on all sides that Shakespeare, the playwright, was not only a man of genius, but the man of genius of all ages, it will be seen at once that all questions as to whether Mr. Roche, one of the Stratford schoolmasters, was or was not "Walter Roche, of Corpus Christi, fellow 1558, B.A. 1559, and presumably M.A. in 1562" are utterly beside the mark. Falstaff, Shallow, Romeo, Hamlet, Othello are not matter of the schools—high-grade or low-grade: they are works of the supreme creative imagination, transmuting legend, tradition, fact, fable, into immortal masterpieces. The case of Shakespeare is the case of all men of genius, exalted to the highest power: in him eminently, in his fellows in a less degree, it may be said that there is no ratio, no relation, no proportion between scholastic information and the accomplished work. "Venus and Adonis" owes, in all probability, nothing whatever to Mr. Roche or to his tribe; the materials may have been gained in the chance conversation of an afternoon; from a casual phrase or two overheard in the theatre or in the tavern. The "Ancient Mariner," according to De Quincey, had a dry and insufficient origin enough from a passage in a book of voyages; and perhaps if Coleridge had been less "educated," we should have had many splendid and completed poems instead of a fragmentary, misty, and incomplete philosophy. And, finally, it must be remembered that Shakespeare was an Elizabethan; and he who breathed the Elizabethan air received ex opere operato, the most liberal of all educations.

RELIGIOUS THOUGHT IN THE LAST CENTURY.*

Viewed as a stage in the progress of mankind, the nineteenth century ranks with the Renaissance. No two periods of history witnessed so great an extension of knowledge. And it is impossible to isolate the knowing faculty; an intellectual connotes a moral advance. We could wish that Miss Wedgwood had given us an appreciation of the century as a whole. But, occasional and unsystematic as these sketches are, they excel in detail, and have the merit of including men who, though of less than the first reputation, have perhaps influenced their fellows to a greater extent than those of more universal fame. Among these may be noticed Thomas Erskine, of Linlathen, a precursor and prophet of whom it is well said that "it was a lofty peak which reflected the morning light so early." He united in a singular degree spiritual and intellectual gifts too seldom found in combination; "his writings were a channel through which many of those convictions, which are now common property, have entered into the spiritual life of our time."

In England more than elsewhere religion is a microcosm of current ideas. That this is so is due to the Puritanism which has left so permanent a stamp on our national character, those furthest removed from its dogmatic system being often most imbued with its temper. This Puritanism knows nothing of watertight compartments, of an unreal assent accorded by custom or policy to a conventional creed. It is, before everything else, in deadly earnest; it sees human affairs sub specie aeternitatis, and in God. Hence the prominence of religious interests in writers not professionally religious—Carlyle, Tennyson, Browning; hence the failure of any sectarianism to take more than a passing hold of the English mind. For us, every large view of life must be religious; and religion must cover and represent life as a whole. From this point of view, Miss Wedgwood's book may be regarded as a study of nineteenth century religion; and, since that century witnessed a notable broadening of religion, it deals principally with what is, or used to be, called the Broad Church. No Evangelical or High Churchman comes under consideration. The omission detracts from the completeness of the outlook. Neither Simeon nor Newman is a negligible quantity. The Liberal protest is conditioned by the tendencies against which it was directed; a man is known not only by the company which he keeps, but by that which he avoids.

The Liberal movement in theology starts with Coleridge.

> "With a warning sense of the misleadingness of all labels attached to a thinker, we would venture to describe him as the father of the Broad Church. . . . He looked beyond the rising wave of public thought; he saw clearly, not only what men were beginning to see dimly, but what they were not for some time to see at all."

The existing orthodoxies, Evangelical and Tractarian, had this in common; they had separated religion from life. Such a separation comes naturally to men worked up to a certain pitch of enthusiasm, who desire to emphasise the transition from their former state to their present; it finds support in the prevalence of moral evil in ourselves and in the world about us, and in the explanation of this given in the doctrine of original sin. Orthodoxy so conceived inevitably degenerates into sectarianism: no valid solution of the problems with which religion presents us can be reached unless their factors as a whole are taken into account. Here nine-tenths of them were dropped. It was necessary to pick them up—"to indicate the sacredness of things secular, to reclaim the world from the shadow of Godlessness, to break down the barrier that both the other parties in the Church set up around a particular part of life, and spread the sacred influences they would confine within its limits over the whole." Kingsley did this for human nature, violated by asceticism; Milman and Stanley for history, stretched on the Procrustean bed of dogma; Jowett for theology, which had been made by contending disputants to reflect not the features of God, but the passions, too often the worst passions, of men. The task was open to misconception: of those who set themselves to it not one but incurred the charge of heresy; "fat bulls of Bashan compassed them on every side." There was sufficient point in these attacks to divert attention from the tendencies that lay behind them. "If men realised the suppressed alternative of what is chosen, half the controversies of the world would be ended." But this is seldom the case.

* "Nineteenth Century Teachers and Other Essays." By Julia Wedgwood. Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.

> "Those who declare, 'Such and such an influence is not exclusively there,' will always seem to those who do not agree with them to deny that it is there at all. . . . If the Spirit of God is not shut in by obvious and unquestionable barriers, it will seem to many that the only proof of its operation is taken away from us. To declare that it is everywhere will seem much the same as to deny that it is anywhere."

In other words, we may unify experience by raising the natural to the supernatural, or by reducing the super natural to the natural—by levelling up, or down. It is possible that some of the liberalisers were not sufficiently careful to show that the former, not the latter, was the method to be adopted; but the result of the movement as a whole was the vindication of knowledge of life and nature in their entirety for the Divine. The so-called "natural" virtues are disparaged by pietists. Six of the Great Ten Words, it may be answered, enjoin these virtues; but in truth the antithesis breaks down when pressed; antitheses exist for thought, not in things.

> "Those He approves that ply the trade,
> That rock the child, that wed the maid;
> That with weak virtues, weaker hands,
> Sow gladness on the peopled lands,
> And still with laughter, song and shout,
> Spin the great wheel of earth about."

This outlook over life takes different shapes in different minds, and is influenced by the circumstances of the time and place which form its environment. The aim of Coleridge was to spiritualise the received teaching, to "transform dogmas that most men had learned into truths that all might believe." Maurice "left his trace on popular theology in its deliverance from the dogma of endless misery"; Erskine substituted the conception of education for that of probation; Kingsley embodied "the strong secular tendencies that are more characteristic of the Broad Church than are any opinions"; Hutton represented that peculiarly English temper which a "Saturday Reviewer" had in view when, Miss Wedgwood tells us, he "confessed he found a difficulty in the way of reading the 'Spectator'—it was so just." Some of the ideas for which they contended have become current coin in the religious world, which has a singular aptitude for canonising the iconoclasts of yesterday in order the more effectually to anathematise those of to-day: their temper, a power in Germany and Scotland, has suffered an eclipse in this country; there are probably fewer Broad Churchmen in England than a generation back.

> "Forty years ago that school of Liberal theology which accepts both the tradition of antiquity and the alliance of modern speculation, had the effervescence resulting from any combination of previously hostile elements of thought. To-day it has the flatness which must needs succeed to such effervescence. Whatever is true in it is as true now as it was then. But whatever was new in it then has now that association of triteness which clings even to important truth, if it has been emphasised for more than a generation. At no stage of thought, it will be found, is truth so difficult to appreciate."

In the fourteen years that have passed since this was written the situation has changed. The medievalism which then seemed on the wane has reasserted itself, and this assertion has provoked a reaction which goes further than the old Liberalism, and threatens graver consequences to established institutions and beliefs. The weight of lay opinion on which men like Stanley and Jowett could count has shifted: part of it has been transferred to the side of militant clericalism, part has moved outside the Churches, whose problem is how best to recover it and employ it for religious ends. They will do well to fall back on the temper and methods of the teachers commemorated in this book. With all her appreciation of them as men and thinkers, Miss Wedgwood, we think, does less than justice to the position which they represent. That the average man does not live upon or greatly concern himself with ideas is true; but ideas react upon the atmosphere in which those least accessible to ideas live. The Churches have to give a sufficient reason for their existence: nor will energy in the practical sphere dispense them from the necessity of proof in the intellectual; human nature, in its last resort, is one. The Broad Churchmen, whatever their limitations, undertook, not without success, to demonstrate to the men of their generation that the opposition between the sacred and the secular in life was apparent, not real; that the questions in connection with which it is believed to manifest itself touch not the substance, but the accidents of religion—the human and variable setting in which an unchanging truth is enshrined. The theologians of to-day must take up the work where they left it. This standpoint is not popular: those who adopt it need not expect—they certainly will not receive—praise of men. For to the spirit of party, secular and religious, it is suspect: the devotees of the obvious are impatient of qualified statements, of suspense of judgment, of reserve.

> "The truth, then, be thy dower," will be the judgment of the world on such. Yet, if the acceptance of this involves a sacrifice,

> "Upon such sacrifices
> The gods themselves throw incense."

To work for the future and those who will guide its destinies is nobler than to command the applause of the moment and the unwise.

---

THE TURKISH MIRACLE.*

Alike to those for whom history is a moving pageant and to those for whom it is a record of some hopeful and intelligible purpose, the Turkish revolution offers a glowing and moving chapter. Even if one were to read it coldly, in the mood of a man who cares nothing for the happiness or misery of distant race, it is still a many-colored romance, a tale which has every element of the dramatic and the picturesque. But to most Englishmen and, above all, to Liberals, it is more than that. It is the story of the sudden fruition of hopes which for a generation had seemed intolerably doubtful and remote. The more sanguine had believed that one day or other, whether by a naval demonstration, or war, or by an act of partition, some sort of tolerable if bureaucratic administration might be achieved for Macedonia. For Armenia few of us dared to hope at all, and the rest of Turkey was commonly consigned to a long process of decay, with absorption or partition as its end. The change which has at last come has redeemed not Macedonia alone, but the whole Empire, and it has come without intervention or war, by the spontaneous action of the Turks themselves.

This book of Mr. Buxton's is the first full and consecutive narrative of the miracle which has appeared, so far as we are aware, in any Western language, and it meets with admirable tact the needs of both classes of readers. It is mainly descriptive in form. It never wearies by formal history, or diplomatic detail, or abstract political discourse. It is primarily the record of the impressions of a sympathetic and sensitive observer, already acquainted with the miseries of the old régime, who found himself, during a few exciting weeks, the guest of the rejoicing Turkish nation. Mr. Charles Buxton went as one of the representatives of the Balkan Committee to convey to the Young Turks its congratulations on the opening of the Ottoman Parliament. They received him with open arms—he had been as they were themselves, the avowed and uncompromising enemy of the old despotism. He met their leaders and their rank and file, from the veteran Achmet Riza down to the enthusiastic subalterns of the Macedonian regiments, whose simplicity and courage gave to the whole movement the charm of youth and the romance of adventure. He talked with the Sheikh-ul-Islam—the personage who used to typify for the late Canon MacColl all the hopeless and mysterious conservatism of Islam. He was even received by Abdul Hamid himself—a somewhat embarrassing honor which betrayed the Sultan's intense anxiety to conciliate his conquerors, who were Mr. Buxton's hosts. He saw the elections in progress, elections carried out, not with the dull mechanical routine of Western formalism, but with the spontaneous joy and the decorative instinct of a simple people to whom the ballot-box was the symbol of their regeneration. He attended the opening of the Parliament as a privileged guest. He witnessed, side by side with the real Enver Bey, a revolutionary play in which an actor "made up" to resemble Enver Bey was acclaimed on the stage. He has succeeded in conveying a fascinating and moving impression of a rare and historic experience. His style is readable and vivid, and the appeal of the letterpress is heightened by a capital collection of photographs and cartoons.

* "Turkey in Revolution." By Charles Roden Buxton. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.

To the reader who thinks less of the pageant and more of the purport of this miracle in the evolution of a free and peaceful Europe, the book will also be valuable. In the first place, it is a testimony to the Young Turks from a member of a family which is in our day as honorably and as closely identified with the campaign against Turkish despotism as it was in earlier generations with the campaign against slavery. The success of the Young Turks has brought them many friends, including a horde of financiers and the remnant of the old Tory Turcophils who were ever ready to make excuses for Abdul Hamid, but it is the admiration of the Balkan Committee which best typifies the revolution in British opinion. Mr. Buxton forms a hopeful but temperate estimate of the prospects of Young Turkey. There are angry and perplexing problems before it, and it is too much to hope that it will solve them all without difficulty. But even if the evolution towards better things should prove to be both troubled and slow, we do not think that British opinion need ever reproach itself for the encouragement it has given to Young Turkey. While it upholds its ideals there is at least a chance of a lasting regeneration. Without it there could be no regeneration, but only conquest, coercion, or partition, with the inevitable incidents, perhaps of war, and certainly of diplomatic quarrels. There has been of late some reaction in official and financial circles against the Young Turks since they overthrew Kiamil Pasha. It may not have been quite unconnected with the fact that Kiamil Pasha was a singularly docile instrument in the hands of English advisers. One notes that the "Temps," for example, does not share the pessimism of the "Times" about recent events. There could, we think, be little security for the new régime if the Young Turks were to dissolve their organisation as these English advisers summon them to do. Neither the Sultan nor the ex-officials of the old régime who have been installed as Ministers, can be trusted to run straight, unless there is in the background a force which can maintain what revolution won. To the capacity, the disinterested aims, and the rare idealism of the "Committee," Mr. Buxton's book bears witness.

---

THE CENTENARY OF GOGOL.

One of the more aggressive formulae of criticism, and one by no means confined to this country, is to attach the label "Dickens" to this or that distinguished Continental novelist. For example, we have formed the distressing habit of calling Alphonse Daudet the French, and Dostoévsky the Russian Dickens. But neither the author of "Sapho," nor the author of "Crime and Punishment" could by any possibility have fitted in with Dickens's scheme of life, any more than the English novelist could have fitted in with either of theirs. Again, Bélinski, the famous Russian critic, hailed Dostoévsky as "the new Gogol," a salutation which suggests to Anglo-Saxons the shallow and obvious comparison of the author of "Dead Souls" with the author of "Pickwick." Apart from this, however, the fact that Gogol's centenary is being celebrated this year calls attention to that elusive personality who undoubtedly created the realistic novel of Russia.

French realism may be said to have accentuated the hitherto excluded. Russian realism had no tradition of romanticism, and therefore no tradition of exclusion to combat. Gogol, so far as any human being since the Greeks has ever done so, looked out at the world around him with his own fresh eyes. Gogol communicated his own new wonder. He wrote down scramblingly, tumultuously, without precision, but also without hesitancy, exactly what he saw. "Don't blame the mirror if your mouth is crooked," is the Russian proverb that he prefixed to his famous comedy "Revisor." His avowed aim in all his work—work that was in reality largely unconscious—was "to drag into light all that was bad in Russia." Sobakiévitch observes of the Procurator in "Dead Souls" that "he is the only decent-mannered man in the town—and even he is a pig."

"Heavens," exclaimed Pouchkine, after reading the great satire, "what a dreary place our Russia is." And Gogol had drawn up the curtain from this inarticulate, inchoate Russia and shown it to the world, frankly, naïvely, as though nobody had ever seen it before. It was in this spirit that Dickens, so alien from the Russian in almost every intellectual quality, had shown England in the earlier part of "Pickwick." But "Tom Jones" had already been written, and before that a long series of masterpieces had supported the tradition of the Renaissance which had won back from the Greeks the seeing vision of external life. But Gogol, child of that blighted country which had experienced the sunlight of the Renaissance on neither its artistic nor its moral side, breathed in the sorrow of the desolate steppes and wrote it down with a sobbing and convulsed laughter that was utterly new to the world. Here is this Russia of ours, he seems to say; look at them, scoundrels and fools, all of them, wallowing in dull lies, their very dreams hovering wingless about the starved, black earth. But he is sorry for them. He does not, however, judge them, for he is one of them, a Russian of the Russians when all is said. Rogues, blackguards, swindlers, misers, hogs, slave-drivers, slaves—what of it? Homo sum; humani nihil a me alienum puto—the great phrase of Terence might have been placed beside that Russian proverb on the title page of the "Revisor." Gogol, in short, is incapable of being censorious either after the deprecating, self-satisfied English fashion, or with the bloodless detachment of the French.

What is the method, the strange method, that finds expression in that Iliad of the steppes, "Taras Boulba," in such tales as "St. John's Eve," in the remorseless comedy of "Revisor," and in that bitter Slav Odyssey, "Dead Souls"? It is not a method that can be formulated in words. Ivan Turgenev himself, the man who was to bring it to the very consummation of art, was unable to formulate it. Flaubert was once explaining to him and to others just how and why Prosper Merimée's style was bad. Turgenev could not understand. "I go to Oka," he exclaimed. "I find his house—that is to say, not a house, a hut. I see a man in a blue jacket, patched, torn, with his back turned to me, digging cabbages. I go up to him and say, 'Are you such an one?' He turns, and I swear to you that in all my life I never saw such piercing eyes. Beside them a face no bigger than a man's face, a goat's beard, not a tooth." In the face of that little picture what is the use of discussing "the torment of style"? Long ago it was acknowledged that "the Barbarians have lizards' eyes," and Gogol brought into Russia the same blazing scrutiny that Turgenev brought into that peasant's hut.

"Dead Souls" reads to us like a cruel satire upon the Russian people, and yet, even in this book, Gogol expresses his devout, unreasoning belief in Holy Russia: "Is it not thus, like the bold troïka which cannot be overtaken, that thou art dashing along, oh! Russia, my country? The roads smoke beneath thee, the bridges thunder; all is left, all will be left, behind thee. . . Yes, on the troïka flies, inspired by God! Oh, Russia, whither art thou dashing? Reply! But she replies not; the horses' bells break into a wondrous sound; the shattered air becomes a tempest, and the thunder growls; Russia flies past everything else on earth; and other peoples, kingdoms, and empires gaze askance as they stand aside to make way for her!" Gogol, indeed, as K. Waliszewski says so justly, "unconsciously performed a work of revolution, while he himself, in his own soul remained patriarchal and submissive."

Mysticism breaks in suddenly upon the realism of the lizard's eye. Gogol, the man, is as elusive as his style, which, in the words of a French critic, "even Michelet might have envied, now popular, now eloquent, now exact as any picture, now shadowy as a dream." He seemed to Turgenev to possess "a fox-like face with something of the air of a professor in a provincial town." To M. de Vogüé, he was described as "a little man with legs too short for his body; he walked crookedly, clumsy, ill-dressed, and rather ridiculous-looking, with his great lock of hair flapping on his forehead, and his large, prominent nose." His equivocal personality, however, evades all such descriptions as easily as quicksilver evades the deftest fingers.

In the same way "Dead Souls" cannot be accounted for in the least by the fact that Pouchkine had introduced Gogol to Cervantes not long before the Russian satire was written. Still less can it be accounted for by that story of the Russian traveller, Boutaïev, who, in 1840, noticed Gogol sitting apart from a group of artists in a café and reading a novel by Dickens. Gogol has been placed midway between Cervantes and Le Sage; he has been set side by side with Swift. One can almost see the grin of derision that would assuredly have passed over the Russian's features at any such effort at "placing" him in any company of the sort, august or the reverse. His savagery separates him for ever from Cervantes; his mysticism severs him from the joyous companionship of Le Sage. His often irrational prolixity has nothing whatever in common with the grim precision of Swift. Nor is he, in any deep spiritual sense, the father of "the Russian Dickens," Dostoévsky, though, outwardly, he perhaps resembles him. Like Dostoévsky, he sympathised with the tatterdemalions of destiny, the humiliated, the distressed, the disinherited. Like Dostoévsky, he experienced that strange passion for self-abasement which is so alien from the comparatively-cultivated, regulated, and, above all, sane pity of Dickens. But unlike Dostoévsky, his gaze, in spite of his mysticism, was, on the whole, fixed firmly upon external things, and he painted Russian life primarily for the eye and from the eye.

For the eye and from the eye, but never in the sense of French realism in which one too often detects the photographer beckoning, waving, focussing as he drills his puppets into an arranged naturalness. Gogol, like all his true followers, knew nothing of such manipulations, and if there is anywhere in the world a "new Gogol" he is to be found in that rebel even against rebellion—in Maxim Gorky.

---

AMERICA OF THE 'FIFTIES.*

Readers of these scenes and episodes of the author's "early life in Illinois and Missouri" in the late 'fifties will scarcely know whether to admire most the extraordinary tenacity of his memory or the living freshness of his vivid picture. Even if we are to conclude that Mr. Grierson has refreshed his memory by reference to the literature of his subject, his feat of conjuring up the primitive atmosphere of the Illinois prairie of fifty years ago remains an astounding one. For this description of "the old democracy and the old social system," of the America of 1858, abolitionists and slave hunters, planters and settlers, politicians, explorers, and emigrants, "a wonderful people, living in a second Canaan, in an age of social change and upheaval, in a period of political and phenomenal wonders," is so detailed as to read almost like a contemporary chronicle. In one respect at least the author's recollections have gained by lying fallow for so long a period: time has mellowed the mental picture and unified his judgments of men and manners, insensibly removing circumstances and accidental data which might have marred the harmony of its historical outline. History has a remarkable fashion of magnetising the opinion of the independent witnesses who turn up with their belated testimony confirming the verdict already delivered, and our only regret in Mr. Grierson's case is that his own and his family's sympathies did not happen to run counter to the cause of the North, for memoirs and memories that go against the popular current have a scarcity value. "The Valley of Shadows" is, however, a genuine document of much historical interest and artistic force, and the spiritual glow in its pages seems to have been created in impressionable youth by the "impending innovation and upheaval" of those wonderful Abolitionist days when Abraham Lincoln's figure came to stand for the will of the people.

Chapter I.: The Meeting House, emphasises the view that the impelling impulse of the Abolitionist movement was a wave of religious revelation proceeding from the old puritanic stock of New England settlers. In the rambling, but thrilling, sermon preached by Brother Azariah James to his mixed congregation of "old Whigs, Know-Nothings, Democrats, Republicans, militant Abolitionists, and outspoken friends of slave-owners in the South," we have the old "wrastlin' with the Sperit," and inner ecstacy and yearnings "of dead generations and the unfulfilled desires of their pioneer parents" coming to a re-birth. In Chapter XII.: The Camp Meeting, the efforts of the revivalist preachers to work up a huge meeting of many thousands of people to a proper conviction of their sins, and the efforts of the rowdies, whisky-drinkers, and pro-slavery Christians to break up the meeting and duck the preachers are described with that strange mixture of pithy humor, horse sense, and religious fervour which seem specifically American. Mr. Grierson's remarkable talent for catching and reproducing an atmosphere is best illustrated by a quotation:—

> "Just before the hurricane passed away a dazzling bolt struck the big elm beside the platform. It fell in a blue-white zigzag, and to many of the more superstitious it resembled nothing so much as a fiery serpent framed from a vial of wrath overhead, for it split the elm in two, the peal of thunder and the cleaving timber mingling in one terrific report.
>
> "A great shout arose from the people near the tree, and the commotion in that part of the meeting had hardly subsided when a voice was heard as one calling from the shores of Tartarus.
>
> "Elihu Gest stood on the platform facing the assembly, and a new meaning was added to the confusion and the ghostly candle-light. A picture of peculiar fascination was now presented to the wondering and half-dazed people. Arrayed behind the Load-Bearer, in a jagged semi-circle that stretched from one end of the platform to the other, sat all the preachers and exhorters. Witnesses who had once mourned as penitents before the altar now marshalled to make others mourn, as fixed and hewn as statues hewn from syenite; for there was about them something of the mien of Egyptian bas-reliefs seated at the door separating life and death. Some were bearded and grimly entrenched behind a hairy mask; others, in their long, pointed goatees, sharpened the picture; while others again, clean-shaven and peering straight before them, presented a death-like pallor, at once frail and frightful, suggesting the keynote of the incommensurable symphony of human emotions now about to begin.
>
> "A deep apprehensive solemnity pervaded every portion of the congregation when the Load-Bearer shouted in tones that penetrated to the far end of the camp: 'You are being weighed in the balance! Tophet is yawning for the unregenerate!'
>
> "A sensation as if the ground had begun to move and float spread through the multitude, and when a little later he cried, 'You're hangin' to the hinges of Time by a hair!' all doubts vanished. Heads began to droop, bodies swayed from side to side, and then, one by one, in couples, in groups, everywhere in the meeting, people fell to the ground, while stifled groans and loud lamentations issued from hundreds of throats at once. . . . The night of nights had come! It seemed as if hundreds were in the throes of death, and would never rise, so that a mingling of pity and dread filled those who had long since professed religion; for the strange union of material and spiritual forces, the upturned faces, the gaping mouths, the gasping sighs, the clenched hands, the sudden falling away of all worldly props, the swift descent from the mountain of vanity to the vale of sorrows rendered, for a moment, even the helpers and exhorters speechless; but, as Elihu Gest finished, the exhorters on the platform rose and scattered, each to a particular work, some descending among the people, some addressing them from the stand."

This vivid picture of the power wielded by the Abolitionist preachers, such as Elder Johnson, Isaac Snedeker, Azariah James, and Elihu Gest, over "a people plumb sot in the sins o' the flesh," would leave a dubious impression on the critical reader if it were not fortified by the life-like narrative of the daring and vigor shown by the good brethren in succoring runaway slaves, sheltering them from the slave hunters, and smuggling them, in wagon-loads, out of the country. Chapters VIII.-XI., which recount typical scenes of the kind at the homes of the militant Abolitionists, "impulsive and enigmatic seers," seekers after the Grace of God, bring home to one that the spiritual fervor of these men rendered them as irresistible antagonists as the Cromwellian Ironsides. The human interest of these varied scenes is moreover skilfully enriched and enlivened by the clever portraiture of "originals," such as Zack Caverly, hunter and trapper, a Socrates of the Illinois prairie. Many of the sayings of this worthy are so good that we feel impelled to bestow half-a-dozen on the reader: "A politicioner's 'bleeged to deal with them what's on the fence, kase he knows the crows air jes' waitin' to see which side the fattest worms air a-comin' upon." "Some folk air too good for this world 'thout bein' plumb ready for the next." "Them as reads newspapers knows too much 'bout other folk's sins en not 'nough 'bout thar own." "The Lord ain't afeared to show His hand; but I

* "The Valley of Shadows." By Francis Grierson. Constable. 6s. net.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING FICTION.

SARAH TULDON'S LOVERS Orme Agnus

"Sarah Tuldon is a splendid central figure, round whom are grouped many others, mostly simple country folk, but each one distinct and interesting, and perfectly natural. Around them spreads the Dorset landscape, fresh and fragrant, a charming setting of a story full of grace and charm."—Westminster Gazette.

THE LONG ARM E. Phillips Oppenheim

"There is no story-teller living who can be more surely relied upon than Mr. Oppenheim for conceiving a daring plot and then working it out with such ingenuity. 'The Long Arm' is a clever story, which no one will lay down till every line is read."
—World.

A CRIME ON CANVAS Fred M. White

"There is sufficient of mystery in this story to stock half a dozen ordinary romances."—Sheffield Independent.

THE SIN OF ALISON DERING L. G. Moberly

"The plot of this story is cleverly conceived and well carried out. Miss Moberley writes with great charm and skill, and the reader is not likely to put down the book until the tangle is finally cleared up. As a character-study, the figure of Alison Dering is drawn with considerable insight."—Financial Times.

THE DUKE IN THE SUBURBS Edgar Wallace

"Mr. Wallace is at his best in the broad spirit of comedy, and his humour is always infectious."—Yorkshire Post.

PURPLE AND HOMESPUN Austin Fryers

"A most entertaining and readable story."—Aberdeen Free Press.

MONEY Marie Connor Leighton

"Marie Connor Leighton's 'Money' will provide all that can be expected—and more. The amazing fertility of invention is undeniable."—Daily Express.

A POACHED PEERAGE Sir William Magnay

"The book is written in a style delightfully fresh and natural, and does not contain a dull page. It is rich in striking situations, strong dramatic power, and a keen sense of humour, and is one the reader would fain finish at a single sitting."—Irish Independent.

THE SOCIALIST Guy Thorne

"Mr. Thorne does nothing by halves. He thrilled us by showing us the possibilities of the extinction of the Christian religion. He now shows us what a force Christian Socialism might be if only it were inspired. Accordingly he packs 'The Socialist' with rousing incident."—Liverpool Post.

HIS FATHER'S HONOUR David Christie Murray

"As we know from 'Rainbow Gold' the late Mr. Christie Murray was capable of really fine work, and in 'His Father's Honour' we have the work of a skilled writer."—Morning Leader.

SIR MORECAMBE'S MARRIAGE Florence Warden

"Miss Warden has a task quite to her talent and to her liking, the book being without a dull page, and well up to the standard of 'The House on the Marsh.'"—Newcastle Journal.

A BID FOR LOYALTY James Blyth

"Mr. Blyth is to be congratulated on this powerful and original work. It is one of the best novels of the season."
—Manchester Courier.

PRINCE KARL A. C. Gunter

"Amusing—almost every line of it."—Sportsman.

SHILLING GUIDE-BOOKS.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, round corners.

WITH MAPS AND PLANS AND MANY ILLUSTRATIONS.

ENGLAND AND WALES.

Aldeburgh and the Suffolk Coast.
Bangor and North Wales.
Bath, Wells, Glastonbury.
Bexhill and District.
Bideford, Barnstaple, &c.
Bognor, Chichester, Selsey.
Bournemouth and District.
Bridlington and Filey.
Brighton and Hove.
Bristol and Environs.
Broadstairs and N.E. Kent.
Buxton and District.
Canterbury and N.E. Kent.
Channel Islands.
Clevedon.
Clifton, Bristol, and District.
Colwyn Bay and North Wales.
Cromer, Sheringham, &c.
Dartmoor.
Dawlish and S.E. Devon.
Deal, Walmer, &c.
Dover, St. Margaret's Bay, &c.
Dovercourt, Harwich, &c.
Eastbourne, Seaford, &c.
English Lake District.
Exeter and S.E. Devon.
Exmouth and District.
Falmouth and S. Cornwall.
Felixstowe and District.
Folkestone, Hythe, &c.
Harrogate, Ripon, &c.
Hastings, St. Leonards, &c.
Herne Bay, Whitstable, &c.
Ilfracombe and N. Devon.
Isle of Man.
Isle of Wight.
Leamington, Warwick, &c.
Littlehampton.
Liverpool, Birkenhead, &c.
Llandrindod Wells and District.
Llandudno and N. Wales.
London and Environs.
Lowestoft and District.
Lyme Regis.
Lynton and Lynmouth.
Malvern and District.
Margate.
Matlock and District.
Minehead, Exmoor, &c.
Newquay and N. Cornwall.
Nottingham and District.
Penzance and W. Cornwall.
Plymouth and S.W. Devon.
Portsmouth and District.
Ramsgate, Sandwich, &c.
Rhyl and North Wales.
Scarborough and District.
Sherwood Forest, Nottingham, &c.
Sidmouth, Seaton, &c.
Southsea and District.
Southwold.
Stratford-Upon-Avon.
Swanage.
Teignmouth.
Tenby and South Wales.
Thames, The, from Putney to Cricklade.
Torquay, Paignton, &c.
Wales, North (Northern Section).
Wales, North (Southern Section).
Wales, South.
Weston-super-Mare.
Weymouth and District.
Whitby and District.
Worthing and S.W. Sussex.
Wye Valley.
Yarmouth and the Broads.

SCOTLAND.

Aberdeen and District.
Edinburgh and District.
Glasgow and the Clyde.
Highlands and Islands.
Inverness and District.
Oban and the Western Highlands.

IRELAND.

Antrim, Portrush, Giant's Causeway, [&c.
Belfast and District.
Cork, Glengariff, Bantry Bay, &c.
Donegal Highlands.
Dublin and County Wicklow.
Killarney and South-West Ireland.

HALF-CROWN SERIES.

These Volumes are issued in superior Cloth Binding, with many Maps, and Street Plans of the principal Cities.

Belgium.
Holland.
London and Environs, with complete INDEX TO STREETS.
The London Guide is also issued in uniform 1s. edition.
Paris and Environs.
The Paris Guide is also issued in the uniform 1s. edition, with Plan of the City only.
Switzerland.

OTHERS IN PREPARATION.

WARD, LOCK & CO., LIMITED, Salisbury Court, London, E.C.

ain't never see a kyard-player thet'll let ye look at his kyards," said the Load-Bearer. "'Kase it air we uns thet do the shufflin'," observed Socrates; "Providence allers leads and allers wins." "T'other party ain't got no [Abolition] flag, but thar whisky makes 'em see the stars, en they make the niggers feel the stripes."

Some very interesting pages on Lincoln and the famous debate he held with the popular Stephen A. Douglas, United States Senator, nicknamed "The Little Giant," at Alton, on October 15th, 1858, confirms the verdict now universally accepted. Mr. Grierson's reminiscences of the society and the churches of St. Louis give us a telling glimpse into the feelings of the Confederate camp. The writer's natural bias comes to the surface, perhaps, most in the chapter on the Torch-Light Procession in St. Louis, just before Lincoln's election to the Presidency, where he contrasts the firmness of Lincoln's supporters, with "the hang-dog look of the bodies" of his opponents, many of whom were under the influence of liquor. Very amusing is the sketch of a typical Southern fire-eater, "a down-river bowie-knife man," who haunts the famous hotel, the Planter's House, and fastens a quarrel on the "silent listener," who hedges and prevaricates successfully till a rival fire-eater appears who is "plumb gone on Fremont." Of General Fremont and "his disastrous expedition from St. Louis to California in 1848," Mr. Grierson has a noteworthy account, derived mainly from the scouts and pioneers who accompanied him. And the chapter on Grierson's Raid through the heart of the State of Mississippi, though brief, is quite as exciting. In conclusion, we may note that the author of these entertaining and picturesque recollections promises us in a future volume, his reminiscences of the passing of the Third Empire, in 1869-70, when he was resident in Paris. We may add that though we shall be most grateful for the promised volume, we hope that he will find time to write a criticism of recent developments in American life, from the standpoint of one who evidently ranks spiritual before material civilisation.

MILITANT ART CRITICISM.*

The translation into English of Dr. Bode's "Florentiner Bildhauer der Renaissance" adds a highly authoritative work on Italian sculpture to the list of those we already have in our language. The original text—though the fact is not stated in this volume—was first published in 1902, but it has been brought up to date by numerous footnotes added by the author, and is, for all practical purposes, his latest word on the subject under review. Even without the footnotes many of the essays are as sound to-day as they were six years ago, since little has occurred in the interval to disturb the facts and deductions then set forth by the accomplished director of the Berlin Museum. Dr. Bode has devoted a large proportion of his gigantic energy, if not a lifetime, to the study of plastic art in Renaissance Italy. He published his first work on the Robbias in 1878. Since then he has written profusely on the greater and lesser sculptors of the same period, and one can pay him no finer compliment than by saying that his knowledge of these is only second to his knowledge of Titian, on whom, indeed, he may be accounted the greatest living authority. The translation, therefore, of the "Florentiner Bildhauer," which has been ably carried out by Miss Jessie Haynes, should be welcomed by all students of art history who have not ready access to the German edition. Furthermore, the book is interesting in that it affords a striking example of the difference between the methods of English and Continental art criticism. The English critic, engaged in the attractive pursuit of attributing works of art, is generally disposed to state his case, in any matter where there may be room for doubt, with a sweet reasonableness amounting almost to deference. The better informed he is, the more does this tendency appear; only the ignorant are really dogmatic. But on the Continent it is otherwise. Controversy in matters of art is as strong-flavored as it is in politics. The gentle remonstrance is out of place; reticence must be regarded as timidity; to convince one must be emphatic, and to be emphatic one must be, to a certain extent, personal. Dr. Bode is a prominent member of the race of strong critics who delight in displaying their strength, when an opponent has to be demolished, with a forcefulness that just falls short of frenzy. His handling of M. Marcel Reymond is an instance in point. It may be true that Dr. Bode can substantiate every word of his crushing indictment of the French author's "Les della Robbia," and that he has justification for refuting vehemently M. Reymond's theories in the fact that they have misled succeeding writers. But was it necessary to impute wholesale ignorance to M. Reymond, or to state so bluntly that the "chief purpose" of "Les della Robbia" was to advertise the Alinari photographs; or was it, at any rate, advisable to perpetuate in the English edition of 1908 a dispute that began in 1897, the date of M. Reymond's publication? It is a question of critical ethics which English folk, who have different ones, are not quite qualified to decide, but, from our point of view, the personal touch might have been expunged from this part of the English edition with no loss of dignity to its author.

Yet the highly militant tone of Dr. Bode does not discount the value of the studies of the princes in Florentine sculpture that he gives us in this volume. As he is polemical in his treatment of other writers, so has he been ruthless in the investigation of his subject. Contrary to what one might expect, he is, on the whole, generous in his attributions; his list of authentic works by Luca della Robbia and Leonardo is far larger than that of most critics. In regard to the latter, for instance, he gives as authentic a number of bronze reliefs, including the "Strife" at the Victoria and Albert Museum, which he asserts was executed not by Verrocchio, but by the greater master in Verrochio's atelier; and these attributions are the more significant in view of the fact that most critics, not excepting so recent a Leonardo student as Mr. McCurdy, virtually deny the existence of any sculpture that this genius wrought. The essay on the partnership between Donatello and Michelozzo, the architect, is devoted to proving that the former was responsible for more of the architectonic part of the work than is generally supposed. Similarly, his vindication of Bertoldo, sculptor, medallist, master of Michel Angelo and intimate of Lorenzo the Magnificent, considerably increases the relative importance of this master, of whose personality and life, strangely enough, little or nothing is known. Necessarily, the four great figures of the Quattrocentro—Donatello, Luca della Robbia, Leonardo, and Michel Angelo—are the main pivots of this survey of Florentine sculpture, but there are others who receive scarcely less attention. Among the latter is Desiderio da Settignano, who modified Donatello's grand, but austere, conception of the Madonna and Child into something that was more humanly tender and natural, though far removed from the familiar genre character that crept in towards the end of the century, and remained till Savonarola's thunder expelled it as an impiety; another who closely followed Desiderio's lead was Antonio Rossellino. Then there are the makers of figurines, objects of vertu, and medals, notably Niccolo Spinelli and, as Dr. Bode claims with reason, Bertoldo, all of them enrolled in the great army of plastic workmen who labored for public buildings, palaces and churches, for the honor of Florence and the glory of God.

It is worth remarking how the history of Florentine art resolves itself into well-defined cults of religious or semi-religious character. The prime subject was, of course, the representation of the Mother and Child together, but there are also distinct cults of the Mother and of the Child, called into being half by the idea of human beauty and half by the religious instinct that ran like a vein of fine silver through every class of the civic community. There was the cult of St. John, the city's patron saint; and the rôle played by the putto forms the theme of one of Dr. Bode's most interesting essays. As Dr. Bode more than suggests, the whole history of Florentine art, with its many opportunities for speculative enquiry, has not yet been written.

We regret it was not thought necessary to include a bibliography in this volume, inasmuch as the text, being six years old, contains no reference to the several works of importance on the sculptors mentioned that have been published in the interval. Apart from Continental critics, we may instance Miss Maud Cruttwell's painstaking volume on the Robbias, Mr. E. McCurdy's on Leonardo, and the Michel Angelo of Sir Charles Holroyd. The ninety-four half-tone plates are, however, magnificent.

* "Florentine Sculptures of the Renaissance." By Wilhelm Bode. Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

Messrs. Methuen have just published, or will publish immediately, the following books :—

A SUMMER IN TOURAINE. By FREDERIC LEES. With 12 illustrations in colour by M. Armfield and 87 from photographs. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. This magnificently illustrated book is a complete and absorbing description of France's most delightful province.

The Sixth and last volume of MY MEMOIRS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS, is now ready. Crown 8vo, 6s.

IN A GERMAN COLONY. By B. PULLEN-BURRY. With 8 illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net, is now ready and gives a full account of life and manners in New Britain, recently colonised by Germans.

WALKS IN PARIS. By GEORGES CAIN. Translated by A. R. Allinson and abundantly illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net, is a book indispensable to all visitors to Paris. It is a delightful medley of description, gossip and antiquarian lore.

DANTE IN ENGLISH LITERATURE is Dr. PAGET TOYNBEE'S new book ; it is full of a most elaborate account of the connection of Dante with English literature, quoting all the references to the great poet from Chaucer to the death of Cary in 1844. It is a novel and most interesting chapter in literary history. It is in two volumes. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

CRIMINAL TYPES IN SHAKESPEARE. By AUGUST GOLL and translated by Mrs. Charles Weekes. Crown 8vo, 5s. net, is one aspect of Shakespeare's psychology. The book reviews the great criminals of the plays and shows how Shakespeare by his genius was fully up to the modern standard of criminal psychology.

The second and concluding volume of Mr. DAVID HANNAY'S HISTORY OF THE ROYAL NAVY, Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net, is nearly ready. It begins in 1689 and ends in 1815. The two volumes form the standard history of the Royal Navy.

GENERAL LITERATURE

NAPOLEON'S MARSHALS. By R. P. DUNNP-ATTISON. With twenty Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
"This well-illustrated book has been sympathetically, yet judiciously, compiled."—Daily Chronicle.

THE BLUE BIRD: a Fairy Play in Five Acts. By MAURICE MAETERLINCK. Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. F'cap. 8vo, deckle edges, 3s. 6d. net.
"A fascinating thing, of singular delicacy in its humour and fantasy."—Morning Post.
"There are scenes of amazing beauty of dialogue and setting and scenes full of whimsical and delicate humour."—Truth.
"Here is a fairy poem, in truth—so radiant, so gossamer in touch and conception, so full of charm and scent."—Observer.

GALICIA: The Switzerland of Spain. By ANNETTE M. B. MEAKIN. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
A complete description of a little-known but lovely province, full of historical, artistic, and antiquarian interest.
"Altogether the book is wonderfully comprehensive and valuable." —Glasgow Herald.
"It is a fascinating country, and Miss Meakin's is a fascinating and extremely well-written book."—Observer.
"Miss Meakin shows a complete mastery of her subject."—Glasgow News.

THE COMPLETE HOCKEY PLAYER. By EUSTACE E. WHITE. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 5s. net.
"The Complete Hockey Player" comprises an historical sketch of hockey, its evolution, progress, and present popularity, and chapters dealing in an interesting and informative way with club, county, interdivisional, international, and University hockey.
"A most interesting and comprehensive book on the game." —Daily Mail.
"As an up-to-date and readable work upon the game this book has no equal at the present time."—Scotsman.
"No 'complete' hockey player can afford to be without it." —Globe.

THE TRIALS OF FIVE QUEENS. By R. STORRY DEANS. With 12 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
A book dealing with the Trials of Mary Queen of Scots, Anne Boleyn, Katherine of Aragon, Marie Antoinette, and Queen Caroline.

TRAGEDY QUEENS OF THE GEORGIAN ERA. By JOHN FYVIE. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
This book is a series of biographical sketches of all the most prominent English tragedy actresses of the eighteenth century, from the famous Madam Barry and the fascinating Oldfield down to the majestic Siddons.
"Mr. Fyvie's work is sound throughout, and is not marred by the vulgarity of extravagant enthusiasm."—Morning Post.

A HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW. By W. S. HOLDSWORTH, D.C.L. With a Plan. Vols. II. and III. In 4 vols. demy 8vo, each 10s. 6d. net.
The first volume of this general History of Law in England contained a history of the various Courts which have administered English Law, together with an account of their jurisdiction, and dealt with the beginnings of the various branches of English Law—of Equity, Admiralty, Commercial, and Ecclesiastical Law—which make up the Common Law of the present day. In these volumes the detailed history of these branches of law is traced.

THE CONFLICT OF RELIGIONS IN THE EARLY ROMAN EMPIRE. By T. R. GLOVER, M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
This work is an attempt to make the reader see the Founder of the Christian movement and some of His followers as they appeared among their contemporaries; to represent Christian and Pagan with equal goodwill and equal honesty, and in one perspective.

GEORGE SELWYN AND THE WITS. By S. PARNELL KERR. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
Mr. Kerr has been fortunate in obtaining access to a series of unpublished letters by Selwyn. They are addressed to a relative, and contain many intimate and personal touches. The book, which is illustrated, also deals largely with Selwyn's circle—a circle which included practically all the famous wits and men of fashion of the eighteenth century.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH PARALLELS. An Advanced Class-Book for the Study of Languages. By F. R. M. FURSDON. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
A selection of French and English idiomatical phrases and idioms, and over a thousand examples of French and English metaphors.

THE CREED IN THE EPISTLES. By WILFRID RICHMOND, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

FICTION

THE LOVE-STORY OF ST. BEL. By BERNARD CAPES. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Altogether a fine piece of craftsmanship, full of colour and thrilling withal."—Sketch.
"A romance of romances. Not for one moment does the interest flag; the story is told with the most fascinating skill."—Bystander.
"An original work, romantic and moving. Mystery, passion, romance, the book is full of them all."—Times.
"The book has a fine individuality, and Mr. Capes is at his best in this rich and powerful book."—Morning Leader.

KATHERINE THE ARROGANT. By B. M. CROKER, Author of "Peggy of the Bartons." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Fourth Edition.
"The charm of the book is the tenderness of the human touch throughout."—Liverpool Post.
"Bright, and smart, and witty, and full of amusing situations." Morning Post.
"Mrs. Croker is always amusing; her theme is made fresh and vivid, and Katherine herself is delightful."—Standard.

MY LADY OF SHADOWS. By JOHN OXENHAM, Author of "The Gate of the Desert." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.
"Wholesome and invigorating from first to last."—Scotsman.
"An intensely interesting story, whose characters are charmingly drawn."—Liverpool Post.
"Just a simple story, the work of a master story-teller, and full of charm."—Sheffield Independent.

THE GIFTED FAMILY. By BARRY PAIN, Author of "Lindley Kays." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.
"A delightful mixture of laughter and tears."—Onlooker.
"Mr. Barry Pain has a remarkable command of all the leading motives of fiction, and his book is full of good things." —Pall Mall Gazette.
"A delightful novel, interesting from the first page to the last . . . kindly and humorous. I repeat that this is a delightful book." —Punch.
"In Mr. Pain's best vein, and is full of shrewd observation." —Liverpool Post.
"It is all immensely, superlatively happy, very charming, and very human."—Court Journal.
"It is all very true, all very amusing."—Standard.

THE STORY OF VIRGINIA PERFECT. By PEGGY WEBLING, Author of "Blue Jay." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.
"The book is gracefully written and is full of humour." —Daily Mail.
"There is a charm and a freshness about Miss Webling's style that is infinitely refreshing after a course of machine-turned fiction." —Onlooker.
"Miss Webling is a writer of whom we have heard before, and of whom we shall hear again. She tells her story charmingly, and it is very nearly perfect Miss Webling—please go on."—Daily Graphic.
"Here is a book that the New Year will find hard to beat, welcome as the aconite and snowdrop, full of tears and laughter and true human things."—Morning Post.

BROTHERS ALL: More Stories of Dutch Peasant Life. By MAARTEN MAARTENS, Author of "An Old Maid's Love." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.
"It is both carefully and sympathetically written, and bears throughout the impress of reality."—Outlook.
"Each story is a finished piece of work."—Daily Telegraph.
"Mr. Maartens' creative faculty is vigorous, clever, effective, and fertile."—Daily News.

THE FLOWER OF THE HEART. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.
"Alice Eversley is one of the sweetest, most delicately charming women of modern fiction."—Daily Mail.
"A fine and powerful novel. No one can question the sincerity and power."—Daily Telegraph.

A SON OF THE EMPEROR. By NEWTON V. STEWART. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Mr. Stewart works out with great skill the pattern of the story, and has written a book of unusual interest."—Daily Mail.
"Mr. Stewart has written his story with spirit, and he has an eye for colour and the picturesque."—Daily Chronicle.

TO BE PUBLISHED LATER

BARBARY SHEEP. By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Garden of Allah." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SET IN SILVER. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON, Authors of "The Lightning Conductor." With a Frontispiece in Colour by ARTHUR H. BUCKLAND, and other illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.
In this new novel, which describes a motor tour through England, Mr. and Mrs. Williamson again are faithful to the motor car, into which they pack their characters, and from which are caught those glimpses of England which they give so alluringly.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The first three articles in "The Nineteenth Century and After" deal with armaments and have evidently been called forth by the late scare. Last week we said something about Sir William White's authoritative and reassuring article on the naval situation. A very different note is struck by the Earl of Erroll, who takes the inflammatory line that Germany's sole object in strengthening her navy is to conquer this country. "On no other assumption," he says, "is it possible to justify this sudden and rapid advance of her naval policy." Statements of this sort would be merely ludicrous except for the fact that they are calculated to create ill-will between the two countries. Mr. J. Ellis Barker out-does Lord Erroll in strength of language and weakness of argument. Mr. Asquith "has shown that he does not possess the most elementary qualifications required for directing the policy of Great Britain and of the Empire"; and "Mr. Asquith and his colleagues are a danger to the State" are specimens of his controversial tone. Lord Hugh Cecil contributes a powerful article on "The Unionist Party and Its Fiscal Sore." He recognises that by continuing to co-operate with the Unionist Party those who share his views are endangering Free Trade, but defends this attitude by the argument that "Free Trade can afford to run some risks precisely because it is a sound cause." Sir William Baillie Hamilton writes an interesting account of his forty-four years' experience at the Colonial Office, and Mr. J. A. R. Marriott in an article on the Poor Law Report urges that fuller consideration is a necessary preliminary to adopting its provisions. "Vacare considerationi was the sage advice of an ancient Father. It cannot be inapplicable when, on the strength of the revelations of a Report which it will take years to digest, we are invited to plunge into a social revolution." Other articles are "National Afforestation" by Sir Herbert Maxwell, "Some Experiences of the Great Earthquake," by the Hon. Alexander Nelson Hood, "The Taxation of Land Values," by Mr. John Orr, and "Quo Vadis? a Prospect in Indian Politics," by Sir Bampfylde Fuller.

* * *

An altogether painstaking and informative volume is that which Mr. Charles Henry Ashdown has compiled on "British and Foreign Arms and Armor" (T. C. & E. C. Jack, 10s. 6d. net). The period covered extends from the prehistoric age to the seventeenth century, by which time the use of gunpowder in warfare had made such progress that devices for the protection of the human body against sword and pike were of secondary interest; certainly it was not worth while inventing new ones. Until the publication of Mr. Ashdown's work, Charles Boutell, the translator of Lacombe, was the only author who had dealt with this subject in really serviceable fashion, and it is his arrangement of armor in periods "in consonance with the salient features it possessed" that is followed in the present volume. In accordance with this method, the first three chapters are devoted to the arms and armor of prehistoric man, and of the Assyrians, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans; we are then introduced to the military equipment of the Saxons and Danes, which takes us to 1066, when, with the Norman rule in this country, the subject becomes more definite owing to the Bayeux tapestry and other surviving witnesses of contemporary styles in armor; the different epochs up to 1600, each having its special characteristics, are next dealt with, and the concluding chapters are devoted to the half-armor period after 1600, to some famous weapons of the Early and Middle Ages, to projectile-throwing engines of war, the influence of various nationalities on armor, and the introduction of gunpowder. Inasmuch as such armor as was made after 1600 had every regard to utility and practically none for beauty or picturesqueness, the interest in this phase of the subject is necessarily confined to a great extent to the first portion of the book. In this connection the development of knightly and other armor through the "Camail and Jupon" period (1360-1410), which was followed by the "surcoatless" period (1410-30), and that again by the Tabard period, is especially interesting to trace, though the British reader is warned that the credit for initiative in its manufacture belongs to other nations, such as Germany and Italy, rather than to ourselves. Another warning is against the confusion of the armor specially made for "tilting in tourneys," such as that to which Emperor Maximilian gave his name, with that used in warfare. The book is profusely, and often quaintly, illustrated in line and half-tone from actual examples, illuminated MSS., brasses, &c., located in our museums, old churches, and private collections.

* * *

Mr. F. A. Calvert, the energetic editor of the Spanish Series, has now produced his long-promised volume on "El Greco" (John Lane, 3s. 6d. net). The work has been written in collaboration with Mr. C. Gasquoine Hartley, contains 136 reproductions of celebrated pictures, and maintains in most respects the standard of the series to which it belongs. Although essays on the art of the Greco have appeared in this country from time to time, Mr. Calvert's is the first critical biography to be published in volume form; and while the author acknowledges his indebtedness to Señor Cossio, the well-known Spanish critic, for much of the information given in regard to Greco's career, his elegant, if rather too brief essay shows welcome evidence of first-hand investigation and original opinions. The Greco is a mysterious and fascinating personality who, notwithstanding his evident importance as an artist, would appear to have been curiously neglected by contemporary biographers. Mr. Calvert advances the theory that this was due to the artist's expressed wish and intention; if so, one more peculiarity may be added to the wholly peculiar character that his work proves him to have possessed. Broadly speaking, Mr. Calvert sees in him the embodiment of the spirit of the Counter-Reformation, and the argument of the book is devoted to showing how the Greco, who was born in Crete, was educated under Titian in Venice, and studied at Rome, was yet emphatically fitted for the expression of that spirit in its Spanish phrase, so soon as destiny transferred him from Italy to Toledo. The Spanishness of the Greco is insisted on most strongly. Correspondingly, the Titian influence is greatly discounted, and the traces of Tintoret in the Greco's work are explained by the similarity of temperament between the two men. Be this as it may, there is no doubt that the Greco performed a vast service to Spanish art by introducing his restless and daring genius into the second-rate Italianism that dominated the Peninsula during the second half of the sixteenth century. He was, above all, individual and independent; and when he exchanged for the warm colors of his Roman-Venetian period the cold tones of the Spanish period, he might truly be said to have made Velasquez possible and to have paved the way for Goya. The book is well worth reading both as an account of Greco and as a study of the innate seriousness, dignity, and other prominent characteristics, of Spanish painting.

* * *

Biblical scholarship is deeply indebted to Dr. Charles for by far the best edition of the Testaments of the twelve Patriarchs which has yet been published. He has reconstructed the text of this ancient document, "The Greek Versions of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Oxford" (Clarendon Press) from nine ancient manuscripts, and Messrs. A. & C. Black have published a translation of this text, which is also the work of Dr. Charles. In the opinion of Dr. Charles, the book was written in the last quarter of the second century before Christ in support of the high priesthood of the great Maccabean family, and especially in support of the messianic claims of John Hyrcanus. According to Josephus, John Hyrcanus was the only Israelite who enjoyed the triple offices of prophet, priest, and king. But the claims of the Testaments to historical importance are overshadowed by its still greater claims as being the sole representative of the loftiest ethical standard ever attained by pre-Christian Judaism. It is a proof of the existence of a type of thought in Judaism which was the natural preparation for the ethical conceptions of the New Testament. Some of the most striking thoughts and phrases in the Sermon on the Mount are pervaded by the same spirit as the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, and a great many passages in the Pauline epistles are directly or indirectly traceable to the teaching of this ancient Jewish book. Compare, for example, this passage on Forgiveness with the teachings of the Gospel: "Love ye one another from the heart; and if a man sin against thee cast forth the poison are now published by Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN. A complete list of the Volumes and prices will be sent post free on application. 1, Adelphi Terrace.

BAEDEKER'S GUIDES

READ THE FOLLOWING IMPORTANT ARTICLES IN THE APRIL

INTERNATIONAL

RELIGIOUS TEACHING AND SECULAR MORAL INSTRUCTION. By THE EDITOR.
THE HOUSING PROBLEM. By HENRY VIVIAN, M.P.
THE INCOME TAX. By A. MACCALLUM SCOTT.
THE ECONOMIC CRISIS IN GERMANY. By Dr. EDUARD BERNSTEIN.

On sale everywhere. Price 1/- net.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

Turkey in Revolution.

By CHARLES RODEN BUXTON. With a Map and 33 Illustrations. 7/6 net.

The Westminster Gazette says: "Mr. Buxton has made telling use of the splendid opportunity which he enjoyed. He was a friend of the young Turks in the days before the triumph, and he was on the scene when the revolution came. It is a graphic story he tells of the change."

T. FISHER UNWIN.

The Panama Canal and its Makers.

By VAUGHAN CORNISH, F.R.G.S. With a Map and 63 Illustrations. 5/-.

The Academy says:—"We have nothing but praise for Dr. Cornish's remarkably interesting and impartial book."

T. FISHER UNWIN.

Industrial Insurance.

By CHARLES RICHMOND HENDERSON. 9/- net.

Write for a copy of the April issue of M.A.B. (Mainly About Books). It contains an account of the Ordnance Survey and its work, and the history of Baedeker's Guide Books. Sent free on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

Buy The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because
it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

STANLEY PAUL'S
New Six-Shilling Novels.

THE TRICKSTER . . . . . G. B. BURGIN
THE CITY OF THE GOLDEN GATE E. EVERETT-GREEN
DID SHE DO RIGHT? . . . . . A. J. MACDONNELL
AN ADVENTURE IN EXILE . . . RICHARD DUFFY
THE DREAM AND THE WOMAN . . . TOM GALLON
THE BROKEN SNARE . . . . LUDWIG LEWISOHN
BANZAI! . . . . . "PARABELLUM"
THE LEVELLER . . . . ALEXANDER McARTHUR
STOLEN HONEY . . . ADA AND DUDLEY JAMES
THE FLAME DANCER . . . . . F. A. MATHEWS
IN CALVERT'S VALLEY . . M. PRESCOTT-MONTAGUE
THE GAY PARADINES . . MRS. STEPHEN BATSON
THE BOTTOM OF THE WELL FREDERIC UPHAM ADAMS
THE SECRET TERROR . . . . . "BRENDA"
THE GHOST PIRATES . WILLIAM HOPE HODGSON
CO-HEIRESSES . . . . . E. EVERETT-GREEN
SHOES OF GOLD . . . . HAMILTON DRUMMOND
HEARTBREAK HILL . . . . HERMAN K. VIELÉ
THE ADVENTURES OF A PRETTY WOMAN FLORENCE WARDEN

BALLADS OF BRAVE WOMEN

Records of the Heroic in Thought, Action, and Endurance.
Edited by ALFRED H. MILES (Editor of the "Famous Al Series" &c.)
Suitable for Recitation by Women at Women's Meetings.
Crown 8vo, Red Limp, 1/- net; Cloth gilt, 1/6 net, and in various Leather bindings.

Nothing more exhilarating for those suffering from the Blues . . . than:—

THE WIDOW TO SAY NOTHING OF THE MAN.

A New Humorous Novel by HELEN ROWLAND.

YOU MUST! Read this book . . . Wit sparkles on every page. . . . Other widows are not to be compared with THIS WIDOW.

In Cr. 8vo. 8 Illustrations. Cloth Gilt, 2/- net. Paper, 1/- net.

STANLEY PAUL & CO., Clifford's Inn, Temple Bar, E.C.

Recently issued. Demy 8vo, 736 pp., cloth, including Bibliography and copious Index. Price 12/6 net.

THE HIDDEN CHURCH OF THE HOLY GRAAL:

Its Legends and Symbolism. Considered in their Affinity with Certain Mysteries of Initiation and other Traces of a Secret Tradition in Christian Times. By ARTHUR EDWARD WAITE.

". . . this entrancing book . . . is one which no lover of romance, of our old literature, of the Celtic spirit, or, more particularly, of the Graal Legend can afford to leave unread. . . . His book is a conspectus, as it were, of the whole subject, and stands alone as a magazine of information concerning the Sangraal. The reader . . . will find all the materials significant to the problem laid before him in this encyclopædic treatise."—Nation.

To be published on April 21st. Crown 8vo. 6/-

THE ROMANCE OF A NUN

By ALIX KING. Author of "The Little Novice."

Those who have been privileged to read the proofs of this book say there has been nothing finer or more poignant since Olive Schreiner's "Story of an African Farm." A novel of high literary qualities, and one that will probably excite controversy.

IN PRESS. READY ABOUT THE END OF APRIL.

In two Demy 8vo. Vols. Over 1,000 pp. Price 21/- net.

PROGRESSIVE CREATION

A RECONCILIATION OF RELIGION WITH SCIENCE.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON, M.A.

This book is of the deepest interest to many classes of readers and thinkers. It appeals to so many sections of human society, being a serious contribution to published thought in current scientific research. It is a definite and positive advance of the Evolutionary theory which started from the publication of Darwin's memorable books "The Origin of Species" and "The Descent of Man"; and it guides the scientific mind through the portals of psychology (as, in effect, Darwin himself prophesied would be the case) into the wider regions of the so-called "Supernatural" and the Spiritual planes, breaking down the time-worn barriers which for so many ages have been reared up between the Spiritual and the Material, and between Science and Religion. It affords a theory of the Origin of Life, of Being, of Nature and Forms, of Evil, and of the Earth and Heavenly Bodies, which has never before in the history of modern literature been propounded; a theory of the deepest interest and importance to scientific students.

LONDON: REBMAN, Ltd., 129, Shaftesbury Avenue, W.C.

of hate and speak peaceably to him, and in thy soul hold not guile; and if he confess and repent, forgive him. But if he deny it do not get into a passion with him, lest catching the poison from thee he take to swearing, and so thou sin doubly. And though he deny it, and yet have a sense of shame when reproved, give over reproving him. For he who denieth may repent so as not again to wrong thee; yea, he may also honour thee and fear and be at peace with thee."

* * *

"William Callow, R.W.S., F.R.G.S." (Black. 7s. 6d. net), is an autobiography which Mr. H. M. Cundall has edited and prefaced with an introduction. This well-known water-color artist, who died less than a year ago, was born in 1812, and began life with little beyond a taste for drawing. From a position of comparative penury, he rose, by the practice of his art, to be one of the best known and the most successful members of the Old Water-Color Society, and to enjoy a reputation as a teacher which few have equalled. During the early part of his career he lived in Paris, where, after the revolution of 1830, he became instructor to the family of Louis Philippe, particularly the Princess Clementine; and when he left France, and exchanged the Court patronage for a highly aristocratic English connection, he pursued his art with such success that he could have given up teaching much earlier than he did had he so wished. He was a great traveller. A life, therefore, that lasted so long and included personal experiences of so many countries and personages, including crowned heads, might be expected to provide an interesting record, and in this short volume we have related such interesting episodes as the visit to the Crown Prince at Potsdam, a walking tour through France in the 'thirties, and, on the art side, memories of the Old Water-Color Society in the days of David Cox, Peter de Wint, and Copley Fielding. Yet, as an autobiography, the book is rather disappointing. It tells of a number of things that happened without giving an impressive picture of any one of them. It reveals a little of Mr. Callow's personality, but less than is suggested by the very short introduction. It is a simple narrative of facts, lacking the frankness and intimité that make an autobiography interesting to the outside world. Mr. Callow was, we believe, regarded by those who knew him at his home in Great Missenden as a brilliant conversationalist, but there is hardly a sparkle in these decidedly prosy pages. The editor cannot be held responsible for this, since, as he tells us, he did little more than re-arrange Mr. Callow's notes; but we regret that an art so fine as Mr. Callow's should not be remembered by a more adequate memorial of the artist. However, the color plates in the volume give an admirable idea of his consistently broad manner, while the pencil drawings faithfully reproduce a talent instinct with delicacy and power.

* * *

To the "Little Books on Art" series, issued under the general editorship of Mr. Cyril Davenport, has been added a volume on Botticelli (Methuen, 2s. 6d. net), by Miss Mary L. Bonnor. Botticelli is a Renaissance master who has always appealed in a peculiar degree to the English lover of pictures, and has been the object of special investigation by Mr. Berenson, Mr. Horne, and other eminent art-critics. It was Mr. Berenson, for instance, who, as Miss Bonnor says, "invented an author" for certain pictures in Botticelli's manner, which were not executed by Botticelli; the hypothetical history and paintings of this "Amico di Sandro" are set forth with much ingenuity in "The Study and Criticism of Italian Art." But Mr. Berenson did more than invent the Amico. He suggested the identity of this unknown with one of the more obscure painters of the time—and left it for some other Botticelli student to follow up the clue. No one, however, has done so yet, neither does Miss Bonnor depart from the rule of the majority, which is to acknowledge the probable existence of Mr. Berenson's Amico, and pass on. Her book, nevertheless, while it contains nothing new or startling, is a coherent sketch of the artist's career, and a sane and catholic judgment of his work. In discussing Botticelli, the literary critic has more than the usual temptation to gush, to read motives into pictures, which probably never existed in the artist's mind, to emphasise his spirituality at the cost of his æsthetic accomplishment. Miss Bonnor is by no means lacking in enthusiasm, but she contrives to avoid this pitfall, and she brings out the salient qualities of Botticelli's painting, his superabundant decorative instinct, his mastery of line and movement, with considerable skill. Neither does she attempt to disguise the fact that the pictures painted under Savonarola's influence were bad art, if good religion. The thirty-three illustrations include most of the well-known paintings and a few interesting specimens of drawings.

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning. April 2. | Price Wed'sday morning, April 7. |
|---|---|---|
| Consols 2½ per cent. ... ... ... | 84⅞ | 85 1/16 |
| L. & N.W. ... ... ... ... | 135 | 135¾ |
| French 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 97 | 97 |
| German 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 85½ | 85 |
| Peru Pref. ... ... ... ... ... | 32⅜ | 33⅜ |
| U.S. Steel Pref. ... ... ... ... | 116 | 116¼ |

The Stock Exchange is entering the Easter holidays in a cheerful and even buoyant mood. All the members of the institution seem to be optimistic, and to expect prices to rise. In view of the superabundance of money, these opinions may prove correct, especially if the Bank rate is really destined to be reduced in the course of a week or two to 2 per cent. A 2 per cent. Bank rate always acts as a lever to Consols and gilt-edged securities, and when Government stocks rise other markets usually follow suit. On the other hand, there is also the problem of new issues, which are apt to flood the market in periods of cheap money. Then the Budget will probably halve the Sinking Fund. Moreover, there will be plenty of new debt coming forward before long. Prussia and Germany together will probably ask for at least 40 millions sterling to cover their deficits in the current year. Some of the big American railroads, such as the Pennsylvania and the Union Pacific, are also preparing to borrow large sums.

Some Dangers of Investment.

There is undoubtedly a good investment business going on at present, and, by all appearances, it is not unlikely to continue. Money is cheap; the Balkan difficulty has been removed, and the dividends distributed at the end of the quarter are coming back to the market for reinvestment. But, though the Stock Exchange may look forward to a good summer, members are troubled a good deal by the competition of outside houses, which canvass in all sorts of expensive ways, and try to lure the small capitalist with the offer of a comparatively high return. Many members want to meet this competition by allowing the right to advertise, but the surest way of killing it is to explain the methods of the bucket shop. I have often been surprised at the innocence of quite experienced men when they are faced with a bucket-shop tout, particularly the tout that lays great stress on general principles and the science of investment. It cannot too often be repeated that business with this type of broker is always dangerous. In the first place, an investor who buys or sells with him loses the safeguards provided by the rules of the Stock Exchange and the double security of broker and jobber, which is so important a feature of the London Stock Exchange machinery. An outside broker may do a hundred things not contrary to the law, but certainly contrary to the best interests of his client, while the "House" broker is hedged at every turn by regulations intended to protect the client. Secondly, the client cannot in many cases check the price at which he deals, for your bucket shop loses nothing better than a share for which there is no quoted price and no free market. A share of this kind once bought can never be sold, except through the bucket shop, which is probably the only market, so the client often finds that he has got his head into a hole and cannot draw it out again. It is a sound principle never to buy a stock or share for which there is not a free market and a reliable quoted price.

Lucellum.

THE LEGAL Insurance Company, LTD.

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell,
The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane,
The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Chairman - J. FIELD BEALE, Solicitor.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion.

Write for particulars. HENRY M. LOW, General Manager.

MISCELLANEOUS.

OLD-FASHIONED COTTAGE surrounded by good garden. Six rooms, good kitchen and range, and large outbuilding. Dry and convenient. Not overlooked. Tradesmen's entrance. Old-world, unspoilt part of Essex. Station about hour from City. Good service of tradesmen and postal facilities. £25 to good tenant.—P., c/o "Nation" Office.

TOURS.

The R.M.S. DUNOTTAR CASTLE (of the Union-Castle Line) is chartered for a Series of Cruises. The next is:—

£14 14s. 0d. PALERMO, TUNIS, ALGIERS, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, LISBON, April 28th.

Full particulars from the Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

If you suffer from Liver Complaints

Merit's Liverets will promptly cure you

Prepared, as prescribed by a prominent Physician from purely vegetable ingredients.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets

STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

combine both curative and tonic properties, and are especially compounded to avoid that debilitating effect which the majority of Liver medicines produce. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists or direct from MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name, Merit's Liverets, and the signature, Merit & Co. is on the package.
Spurious imitations are useless.

will promptly cure you

BOOKSELLERS.

10/6 FOR 5/6 Post Free. ABROAD 6/-

THE VARIORUM REFERENCE BIBLE

With Footnotes giving a Digest of the Various Readings and Renderings.

Edited by Cheyne, Clark, Driver, Goodwin and Sanday.

Handsome Morocco Yapp. Specimen Page post free.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER,"

will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.
Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

SUMMER TERM COMMENCES APRIL 28th, 1909.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

A few young and backward boys received in the Headmaster's private house.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.
(The Royal Naval School.)

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large Playing-fields, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath; Chemical and Physical Laboratories; Cadet Corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarships Hertford and Merton College; Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. NEXT TERM, April 28th. Apply Headmaster: Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauset Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

Head Master: ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

PREPARATION FOR UNIVERSITIES.
CITIZENSHIP COURSE.
LEISURE-HOUR WORK.

For Copies of Prospectus, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.

Six Scholarships (£60 and under) will be offered on June 16th. Examination at Giggleswick, in London, or at Preparatory Schools. Particulars from Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle Yorkshire.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

MALVERN COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATIONS, JUNE 1st 2nd, and 3rd, one of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Boys) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in Examination. Council Nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well but fail to obtain a Scholarship.—For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TEIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,

Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... ... 6d. ,,

From CHATTO & WINDUS'S SPRING LIST.

Professor Holmes's New Book.

NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE MAKING

By C. J. HOLMES, M.A.,

Slade Professor of Fine Arts in the University of Oxford. With a Photogravure Frontispiece, demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

"Professor Holmes has done a remarkable and original thing; he has applied common-sense to the art of design in an appropriate way. . . . Our author keeps constantly before him the painter's actual problem; almost all he says is of use in the studio, and we may fairly add that since Reynolds's discourses the student has never had put before him such a fruitful and suggestive guide to his endeavours."—Athenæum.

A SHORT HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES

From the Accession of Queen Victoria to that of King Edward VII.

By JUSTIN McCARTHY,

Author of the larger "History of Our Own Times." A New Edition, Enlarged. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. Also a School Edition, post 8vo, cloth 2s. 6d.

DEVON:

Its Moorlands, Streams, and Coasts.

By LADY ROSALIND NORTHCOTE.

Fully illustrated in Colours by FREDERICK J. WIDGERY. Large fcap. 4to, cloth gilt top, 20s. net.

"Both the letterpress and the illustrations of this book merit the very highest praise."—Morning Post.

"Authoress, artist, and publisher are alike to be congratulated on the result of their labours—a volume full of charm and delight in every respect."—Western Morning News.

THE ROAD OF NO RETURN

By A. C. INCHBOLD,

Author of "Under the Syrian Sun," "Lisbon and Cintra," &c. 6s.

A powerful story, with a plot never before touched in fiction, breaking entirely new ground.

A CASTLE OF DREAMS

By NETTA SYRETT,

Author of "The Child of Promise," "Anne Page," &c. 6s.

"Not only do the Irish scenes and the pleasant Irish characters depicted in Miss Syrett's new novel give it a peculiar charm, but there is a clever touch of Irish fancy in the invention which gives a new turn to an old device of the makers of plots for love stories. . . . Interesting in its character painting, and seriously sentimental without ever being heavy, the book cannot but enhance the author's reputation."—Scotsman.

THE JUNE PRINCESS

By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY,

Author of "An April Princess," 6s.

"The dominant note of the book is one of fantasy, and a very pleasing note it is. . . . 'The June Princess' is the delightful work of a poet turned novelist for the nonce. It is one of those rare books which exhale fragrance."—Sunday Times.

THE PAINTED MOUNTAIN

By PETER LAURISTOUN. 6s.

"It is a stirring tale of revolution in the Principality of the Lebanon . . . excitement sufficient to satisfy the most vivacious, tempered, however, by a solid determination on the part of the author to examine and expose the why and wherefore of the disastrous clashing of East and West."—Manchester Guardian.

THE MERRY HEART

By FRANK A. SWINNERTON. 6s.

"Many readers will be charmed with the gaiety and the frankness of Mr. Frank A. Swinnerton's book . . . It is a laughable story . . . leaves one with a better opinion of human nature."—Yorkshire Post.

IDOLATRY. By ALICE PERRIN. 6s. [3rd Impression.

"'Idolatry' is a real triumph."—Times.

JULIAN REVELSTONE

By JUSTIN McCARTHY. 6s. [2nd Impression.

"A charming tale, pleasantly told."—Daily Chronicle.

A QUESTION OF MEANS

By MARGARET B. CROSS. 6s. [2nd Impression.

"This is a quite admirable novel."—Daily Telegraph.

THE ROGUE OF RYE

By W. WILMOT DIXON. 6s.

"Here is an excellent tale."—Daily Telegraph.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, III, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

NEW MEDICI PRINTS

Will be Issued during April and May:

| | | | | Gallery. | Colour Surface. | Price. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| ITALIAN SERIES. | | | | | | |
| No. XV. | Titian. | Bacchus and Ariadne. | | London | 25 × 23 in. | * 25s. 0d. net |
| ,, XVI. | Carpaccio. | Vision of St. Ursula. | | Venice | 27 × 26¼ ,, | * 25s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, XIX. | Raphael. | Madonna della Colonna. | | Berlin | 22 × 16¼ ,, | 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ,, XIV. | Mantegna. | Madonna, Child, and Cherubim. | | Milan | 20¼ × 16¾ ,, | 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ENGLISH SERIES. | | | | | | |
| Eng. III. | Hoppner. | Countess of Oxford. | | London | 19¼ × 15½ ,, | † 12s. 6d. ,, |
| ,, IV. | Romney. | Lady Hamilton with a Goat. | | | 25 × 20 ,, | † * 21s. 0d. ,, |
| NATIONAL PORTRAIT SERIES. | | | | | | |
| N.P.S. II. | Unknown. | William Shakespeare. | | Stratford | 18 × 13¼ ,, | † 12s. 6d. ,, |
| FLEMISH SERIES. | | | | | | |
| Fl. VI. | Vermeer. | The Pearl Necklace. | | Berlin | 21⅛ × 18 ,, | † * 15s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, VII. | Terborch. | The Concert. | | ,, | 21⅝ × 17¼ ,, | † * 15s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, VIII. | Q. Malays. | The Magdalen. | | Antwerp | 17¾ × 11¾ ,, | † 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ,, III. | Franz Hals. | A Family Group. | | London | 24⅜ × 14¾ ,, | * 21s. 0d. ,, |

* Postage of Prints starred 9d., of all others, 6d. (three or less in parcel).

† Signifies that prices will be raised on publication.

List, post free. The completely Illustrated Catalogue with particulars of Annual Subscription, Frames, etc. 3d. Stamps.

THE MEDICI SOCIETY Ltd., 1B, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, London, W.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 3.] SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Diary of the Week ... ... | 72 |
| Politics and Affairs:— | |
| The Turkish Reaction ... ... | 76 |
| The Liberal Policy on Armaments ... ... ... ... | 77 |
| Impossibilists in Labor Politics | 79 |
| A Study of the Bye-elections ... | 80 |
| Life and Letters:— | |
| The Poet of Pain ... ... ... | 82 |
| The Battle of the Faiths ... | 83 |
| America Through European Eyes ... ... ... ... | 85 |
| The One Sunrise ... ... ... | 86 |
| Present-day Problems:— | |
| Organised Labor and Practical Politics. By T. Kirkup | 87 |
| Communications:— | |
| The Declaration of London. By the Rev. T. J. Lawrence... | 88 |
| Letters to the Editor:— | |
| The Budget and the Sinking Fund. By L. G. Chiozza Money, M.P. ... ... ... | 89 |
| The Fighting Value of "Dreadnoughts." By C. E. Kelway | 90 |
| The War Craze. By Facta non Verba ... ... ... ... | 90 |
| Non-resistance in Practice. By Alfred Ollivant ... ... | 91 |
| An Indiscreet Plea for Indiscretions. By W. T. Stead ... | 91 |
| Adult Suffrage. By Mrs. Vaughan Nash ... ... ... | 91 |
| London University Commission. By R. Shindler ... | 92 |
| "The Worker-Student." By C. E. Maurice ... ... ... | 92 |
| Robertson of Brighton. By A. de Bavier ... ... ... ... | 92 |
| Sir George Clarke's Daughter. By Henry W. Nevinson ... | 92 |
| Resistance to Panic. By Charlton Wilkinson ... ... | 93 |
| The Snowdrop and the Bee. By the Rev. D. K. Auchterlonie and Emily R. Wicksteed | 93 |
| The Anglican Church and Nonconformity. By Everard Wilson ... ... ... ... | 93 |
| "Deirdre Wedded." By R. Anthony Gibbs ... ... ... | 93 |
| Poetry:— | |
| In the South (from Nietzsche). By M. D. P. ... ... ... | 93 |
| The World of Books ... ... | 94 |
| Books to be Read... ... ... | 94 |
| Reviews:— | |
| The Unfortunate Argyll. By Andrew Lang ... ... ... | 95 |
| The Acropolis ... ... ... | 96 |
| Breviary Hymns ... ... ... | 98 |
| The Castle ... ... ... ... | 98 |
| Four Novels ... ... ... | 100 |
| Books in Brief:— | |
| Fresco Painting ... ... ... | 102 |
| The Week in the City. By Lucellum ... ... ... ... | 104 |

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The rule of the Committee of Union and Progress in Turkey has been temporarily overthrown by a military émeute, carried out by the private soldiers of the Constantinople garrison led by non-commissioned officers, or possibly by a few officers disguised as sergeants and corporals. The power behind the movement seems to have been the Liberal Union or Home Rule party, helped by Armenian and Albanian associations, and the Mohammedan Union, with the more conservative and ignorant Ulemas at their back. Both parties probably had traffic with the wily and embittered Sultan, while the Committee was weakened both by unwise speeches and some extremists who have lately joined it, and by its quarrel with the Sheikh-ul-Islam, a singularly enlightened man. The mutineers marched, firing in the air, to the Parliament House, which adjoins Sta. Sofia, cheered for "Liberty" and the Sultan, called for and obtained the dismissal of the Grand Vizier, the President of the Chamber, who is the intellectual leader of the Committee, and the Minister of War, held up Stamboul and isolated Pera, killed the Ministers of War and Justice, and, helped by armed crowds, pulled down the offices of the two chief journals of the Committee. Members of the Parliament were respected, but naval and military officers were insulted and imprisoned, and one of them lynched in the streets.

* * *

The movement succeeded. The Sultan, its accomplice, amnestied the mutineers, accepted the resignation of the Cabinet and appointed its successors, partly from its ranks and partly from outside. Tewfik Pasha, a weak and not altogether trusted Minister of Foreign Affairs under the old Government, becomes Grand Vizier, and Edhem Pasha, the successful Generalissimo in the Greek war, Minister of War. Achmet Riza resigned the Presidency of the Chamber, and Mahmud Mukhtar Pasha, "Ghazi" Mukhtar's son, a brave but somewhat tactless man, whose quarrel with the priesthood seems to have quickened the military revolt, was hunted from the command of the First Army Corps, and his house surrounded by a mob of soldiers. His successor, however, Nazim Pasha, is able and fairly Liberal. Nazim's first act was to protect the lives of members and friends of the Committee.

* * *

The solution of the crisis seems doubtful. The First Army Corps, with its slack discipline and Albanian and Hamidian elements, was always the weak point of the Committee's military backing. But the Second Army Corps at Adrianople, and more particularly the Third, whose headquarters is Salonica, are said to be loyal both to the Committee and to the Constitution. Enver Bey, the military hero of the Reformers, whose portrait was a few months ago in every Stamboul hawker's hands, is on his way to the birthplace of the revolution, where Achmet Riza has arrived, and this (Friday) morning the troops there and at Monastir are said to be ready to march on the capital. The new Cabinet has declared that it will follow its predecessors' programme as to the Constitution, repress military disorder, and maintain the legislative power of the Parliament. It seems possible, therefore, that if the Committee can make terms with the nationalities and keep its "modernist" ideas in some reserve, it will maintain a measure of power without running into civil war.

* * *

Mr. Churchill, in a letter to the leader of the Dundee Liberals, expresses with great force the Liberal view of the naval scare. He attacks four errors of the "Dreadnought Fear-all school," "each more stupid and vicious than the other"—the first, that only "Dreadnoughts" count, and that our immense superiority in men, guns, and "pre-'Dreadnought' ships" is of little or no account; the second, that Germany can plan and build an anti-British Armada in secrecy; the third, that the two-Power standard applies not to a "reasonably probable" combination against us, but to any two strongest Powers, including the United States; the fourth, that there is a "profound antagonism" between Great Britain and Germany. On the contrary, no countries possessed fewer causes of strife and more ties of common interest. The first duty of men of light and leading was to resist the "spirit of distrust," which, "without any physical embodiment, had already sensibly darkened the outlook of mankind."

* * *

The Draft South Africa Constitution is being debated clause by clause in the Natal and Cape Parliaments. Natal opinion has been badly ruffled by the Convention with regard to Delagoa Bay, which some Natal people think damaging to Natal, though the Ministry approve it and was consulted at every stage of the negotiations. So far only one amendment has been carried in the Natal Assembly, and this to the effect that Natal should never have a smaller representation in any South African Parliament than in the first. In the Cape Assembly discussion has raged round the color clauses. Mr. Schreiner has fought hard for the admission of the colored men to the South African Parliament, and for the preservation of the Cape color franchise. In the first of these objects he found little support, but a proposal that no change should be made in the Cape color franchise by the South African Parliament without the consent of the majority of the Cape members was almost carried. A much more vigorous onslaught was made on the clause establishing proportional representation and the principle of one man one vote. The country members want single-member constituencies in the country, and they want the countryside—as the permanent element in the State—to have specially heavy representation. An amendment in this latter direction was carried.

* * *

The American House of Representatives has sent its draft tariff to the Senate, and the Senate Committee has published its own counter project, so that we can now see into what a complete farce the revision of the tariff downwards has degenerated. The original draft of the House Tariff meant an increase even on the Dingley Tariff of the cost of living, and the debate produced no notable improvement except the placing of tea and coffee on the free list and some amendment of the cotton schedules. From the general point of view the most interesting changes made in the House were the cutting down of the proposed free trade with the Philippines by putting a duty on rice, the elimination of the patents clause intended as a retaliation to Mr. Lloyd George's Act, and the addition of a provision declaring that a preference given by a Mother-country to her Colonies would not justify the Mother-country being put on the maximum tariff. The Senate Committee draft leaves over for further consideration the question whether there shall or shall not be a maximum and a minimum tariff. It proposes to cut the House rates heavily, and to transfer the burden from the general consumer to the rich buyer of luxuries. Some articles, including cocoa, are put on the free list, but duties on many others are raised, and the net result is to leave the cost of living as high as, or higher than, under the Dingley tariff.

* * *

We are glad to hear that the question of the maintenance of peace with Great Britain is being very seriously and thoroughly considered by the German Trade Unions and the Social Democratic Party. We understand that the return visit of the German Trade Unions to this country in the early summer will be largely turned into a Peace demonstration, an object in which we hope that British Trade Unionism will cooperate. It is also, we think, of urgent importance that the Christian Churches, the Peace organisations, and Liberal Associations should set to work to countervail the action of the Tory Party, the various war Leagues, and other feeders of bad blood between nations.

* * *

The Conference of the Independent Labor Party at Edinburgh has seen an outbreak of the disaffection which has long been weakening its forces. Mr. Grayson, having declined to speak with Mr. Hardie on a Socialist platform in Holborn Town Hall, objected to a reference to this action in the report of the Administrative Council. The Conference, which had re-affirmed the I.L.P.'s alliance with the Parliamentary Labor Party by an overwhelming majority, and had otherwise stood to Mr. Keir Hardie's leadership, adopted a motion sending back this phrase of the report for revision. On this, the four leading members of the Administrative Council whom the Graysonites chiefly attack—Mr. Hardie, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, Mr. Philip Snowden, and Mr. Bruce Glasier, the editor of the "Labor Leader"—resigned their seats on the Council. The Conference, in great dismay, unanimously passed a vote of personal confidence, and asked Mr. Hardie and his friends to return. They refused, and have issued a manifesto insisting on the waywardness and narrowness of the Grayson school of Socialism, which practically revives the almost dead traditions of the Social Democratic Federation. We imagine that their control will be strengthened rather than weakened by the incident.

* * *

The French Socialists have been holding their annual Congress at St. Etienne this week. Apart from an attempt, defeated by M. Jaurès, to expel M. Hervé and his quasi-Anarchist following from the party, the chief problems before the Congress were the organising of propaganda in the agricultural districts and the determination of the party's relations with the Radicals during the coming General Elections. Hitherto French Socialists have paid little attention to the rural districts, but the recent bye-elections have proved that the movement is progressing in the countryside. A committee was given the task of drafting a programme likely to attract the small peasant proprietor as well as the laborer. The Radical party, at its Congress some little time ago, proposed co-operation during the elections with the Socialists, so that both should exchange support at the second ballots. The Socialists, however, are not likely to accept the suggested alliance. They dislike M. Clemenceau, the Radical Premier, heartily; the Radicals have lost their hold upon the country by their neglect of their programme, and the Socialists are evidently gaining much of what the Radicals are losing. On the one hand it might seem bad tactics for the Socialists to identify themselves with a party whose prestige is so affected. On the other hand, a ruthless fight at the polls might cause both parties to lose seats to the reactionaries.

* * *

On this point our Paris correspondent writes:—"For bye-elections the status quo is maintained—that is to say, it is left to the local federations to decide in each case whether or not the Socialist candidate shall be withdrawn before the second ballot. The recent overtures of the joint Radical and Socialist-Radical Committee, which proposed to revive the mutual arrangement with the Socialists and other groups of the Left, is thus for the present left without a response. The difficulty is, as M. Jaurès pointed out, that the Alliance Démocratique, which is counted as a group of the Left, has decided that its candidates shall not in any circumstances be withdrawn in favor of a Socialist, though it has agreed to the mutual arrangement with the Radicals. Probably the Radicals will have to choose between the Alliance Démocratique and the Socialists. Meanwhile, the Radicals have shown their good-will by withdrawing their candidate at Uzès, although there was no Conservative or reactionary in the field, and leaving the Socialist, M. Compère-Morel, to have a walk-over next Sunday in this formerly Radical constituency."

* * *

The last few weeks have seen a sensational rise in the price of wheat, due to a deficiency in the world's supply, especially in Argentina, helped by the cornering of the Chicago market by Mr. Patten, the Leiter of 1909. Altogether there is a deficiency of about six million quarters for the remainder of the season, of which America might normally supply four millions. This relief cannot, however, be depended upon so long as Mr. Patten holds up his stocks. The rise during the past three months has been from 36s. to 45s. and 46s. a quarter, with a corresponding increase of from three halfpence to twopence in the price of the quartern loaf. Recent reports from New York state that a reaction has taken place in the Winnipeg market, and that this has spread to Chicago, but Mr. Patten has bought largely, and so checked the fall. He is now said to hold twenty-three millions of bushels for May delivery, about one-sixth of the wheat supply in the States. The prospect, though serious, is not alarming, for the Chicago combine may break down at any moment, and the Indian crop is sure to afford relief. It would have been alarming under a preferential scheme, if we can conceive a plan that would hold water. We want the whole available world's supply always, and in times of shortage we simply must have it.

* * *

According to the Austrian papers, the Austro-Hungarian Minister of Marine intends to ask their Delegations this autumn to sanction estimates for the building of three or four "Dreadnoughts" of 20,000 tons and 22 knots speed. If this prove true, and if the Delegations make the grant, a new factor will be introduced into the international situation. Hitherto the Dual Alliance has enjoyed unquestioned naval supremacy in the Mediterranean. If Austria begins to question France's position, doubtless the French will shift some of their ships from the Channel to the Mediterranean, and probably enter the race for naval construction. Italy, too, will be affected. It is not conceivable that Italy could look with satisfaction upon the development of a powerful Austrian fleet. She would doubtless retaliate. Such a competition would shake the Triple Alliance, which already grows more and more unpopular with Italians. Austria will not be doing a statesmanlike thing in setting so many forces in agitation. Doubtless English extremists, too, would find in her action another argument or excuse for expenditure.

* * *

Lord Willoughby de Broke's Motor Bill contains some good points. The compulsory use of a speedometer, if it be made conspicuous enough for the passing policeman to read, would make speed limits a reality, and the villages would have something to gain from a speed limit of ten miles an hour. But Lord Willoughby de Broke would leave towns and suburbs in their present unlucky condition, and the country he would simply hand over to be the monopoly of the motorist by authorising a speed of thirty miles an hour. There are, of course, here and there a few miles of wide, hedgeless road where this speed is not dangerous, but for the most part our country roads, with their high hedges and frequent windings, are unsuited to the present speed limit, to say nothing of an increase. The true solution is special roads for high speed motors, maintained by those who use them, and on the ordinary roads a speed compatible, not only with the safety, but with the comfort of other people. If the thirty mile clause is insisted on, the moderate advantages offered by the rest of the Bill will not save it from determined opposition.

* * *

We are very glad to see that the Liberal cause in the Stratford-on-Avon division is to be upheld by Mr. Joseph Martin, the ex-Premier of Columbia. Mr. Martin's record as the author of the Manitoba Schools Act, his special knowledge of railway policy, and his vigorous strain of democratic Radicalism, make him a candidate of whom any constituency may be proud. Mr. Martin is also a strong Free Trader, and we hope his statement of the reasons why the Canadian farmer does not ask for Preference for his wheat in the English market will be thoroughly reported by the Liberal Press. His campaign is exciting great interest in Canada, and is a really important event in the relations between British and Colonial democracy.

* * *

Mutual.

"In a brilliant summary of the events of the past month, the writer, while dealing with the naval crisis, uses these words," &c., &c.—The Editor of the "Spectator" on the Editor of the "Observer."

"In an article as courageous, ripe, and searching as any that have ever appeared in its columns—an article we do not hesitate to hail and give thanks for as a national service—yesterday's "Spectator" laid bare the roots of the crisis which this country must either face or perish."—The Editor of the "Observer" on the Editor of the "Spectator."

* * *

Swinburne died on Saturday morning in his modest and not very beautiful house at the foot of Putney Hill at the age of seventy-two, and his body was buried on Thursday at Bonchurch in the Isle of Wight. His poetic life has lasted without positive interruption for nearly fifty years. Forty-three years have passed since the publication of "Poems and Ballads," and thirty-eight years since the appearance of "Songs before Sunrise." His great contemporary, George Meredith, who resembles him in quiet dignity of life, calls him the "most spontaneous singer of all the English children" of earth, a verdict which many will qualify by excepting the name of Shelley. He was the most literary of poets and men, as all those who even superficially knew his simple, impulsive personality, absorbed in the world of letters and scholarship, were aware.

* * *

Sir Donald Currie died on Tuesday at Sidmouth, aged eighty-three. His very amiable personal qualities were not less notable than the patience and knowledge of South African affairs which enabled him to build up the Castle line of steamships and finally to bring about the amalgamation of the Castle and Union ships into a joint line, one of the best and most comfortable in the world.—Mr. Marion Crawford, who died at Sorrento on Friday week, was a member of the considerable school of American novelists who have made modern Italy their main subject, and almost their second mother. He had nothing of Hawthorne's wizardry, but now and then he touched distinction, and his studies of the phases of Italian life which he knew well were careful and suggestive.—Dr. Whitley Stokes, who died, at the age of seventy-nine, on Tuesday, was one of the most learned of modern Celtic scholars, as well as a leading authority upon Hindu law. His Celtic studies produced many editions and translations of Irish, Cornish, and Breton texts which form a rich quarry for other workers. In 1877 he became the Law Member of the Indian Council. Here he powerfully seconded Lord Ripon, undertook the complete revision both of the Civil and Criminal Procedure Codes, and contributed in other ways to the consolidation and codification of Indian law begun by his great predecessors, Macaulay and Fitzjames Stephen.

Politics and Affairs.

THE TURKISH REACTION.

The life of the second Ottoman Parliament seems likely to be only less precarious than that of the first. A day's work has undone the miracle of July, and for the moment the Young Turks are facing serious, if not complete, disaster. The first task of the commentator who attempts to write a footnote to the history of the past week is to simplify his mind. The nice constitutional points raised by some of the actions of the Young Turks in recent months, which are so interesting and so contentious for ourselves and for educated people in Constantinople, are irrelevant to the catastrophe which came about on Tuesday. But if anyone supposes that it was these subtle points which disturbed the mutineers, who have for the moment undone the revolution of July, he must first of all be invited to consider what the brain of a Turkish private soldier is like. The Turkish private is, as a rule, completely illiterate. His experience is limited to his village and his barrack. Of the meaning of representative institutions he has only dimly in the last nine months begun to have an inkling. His view of life is still that of the Koran or the Arabian Nights. He is incomparably more backward than the least educated Bulgarian or Armenian peasant. One need not suppose that he is in principle for absolute government. The chances are that he retains a sort of superstitious veneration for the Sultan. He doubtless thinks of the Yildiz camarilla of the bad old days as a gang of rascals, whom it is well to have dismissed. He probably thinks of the Young Turks of yesterday as a gang of half-foreign atheists, whom it was also his duty to dismiss. To Parliaments he probably has no particular objection, but they are to be treated much as one used to treat Kaimakams and Pashas in the old days. If a Pasha—in Albania at least—behaved badly, the proper thing to do was to go in a body and cut off his ears. That taught him a lesson, and was a warning, as the "Arabian Nights" would say, "to such as would be admonished." In that spirit he proposes, under ghostly and royal guidance, to control his Parliament.

On this primitive level it is easy enough to guess at the sort of mental process which has been going on of late under the preaching of some astute clerical reactionaries of the "Mohammedan Union." While the Young Turks have been going about with their heads in the air, applying the principles of Auguste Comte to what they took to be the needs of the moment, these holy men have been preaching in the mosques and teaching in the barracks. They would probably point out that the Young Turks were a set of persons who feasted during Ramazan, and publicly drank wine. They would add that Achmet Riza, the best and noblest of them all, was a man born of Moslem parents who openly joined an infidel sect in Paris. Could any good be expected of Parliament while such a man presided over it? There were, moreover, Christian Ministers and Christian Deputies, and, worst of all, it was even proposed to admit Christians to the Army. One might as well be ruled by foreigners as by these godless young men from Paris. Reform, the sermon would doubtless go on to say, was certainly necessary, but every good Moslem knows that there is only one true sort of reform—to return to the pure word of God, the sacred law of the Sheri, which impious persons have set aside for man-made laws, and Napoleonic codes. Above all, there must be no more nonsense about the equality of Moslems and Christians. Every native Moslem movement of reform, from the Puritanism of the Wahabis to that of the Soudanese Mahdi, has based itself on a demand for a return to the sacred law and a discarding of modern innovations. "Allah once for all wrote a Book," as the present writer has heard Osman Digna explain, and in that book are the keys of conquest and the scales of justice. Under the influence of such teaching as this one can understand why the men of the Constantinople garrison began once more to say the daily prayer for their Caliph and Padishah, and marched on the Parliament to depose Achmet Riza and his friends. In spite of promises, they will not get their Sacred Law—that had become obsolete in Turkey long before Constitutions were even talked of. But they may get their Sultan, and their loyal prayers, and all the rascality of corruption and oppression.

We know as yet too little of this unfortunate situation to predict the end. The Young Turks have for the moment been overthrown in the capital. But the capital was never their stronghold. The anxious question is now to know whether the clergy of the Mohammedan Union have also been at work in the garrisons of Macedonia and Adrianople, where the Committee first organised the revolution. If the Committee is still supreme there, it is possible that disruption or civil war may follow—that Salonica may become in Turkey what Tabriz is in Persia. On the event of such a struggle it would be difficult to look at all hopefully. Neither the Albanians nor the Bulgarians are to-day at all well disposed to the Committee, and if a civil war gave them their chance, they would probably make a bid for independence or autonomy. The gravest mistake, in our opinion, which the Committee has committed was its refusal to make any concession to the individualism of the Non-Turkish races. It may have to pay to-day for that omission. On the Turkish masses it cannot count—they are too inert, too uneducated, too easily led by any voice which speaks to them with authority. But if they can reckon neither on the rank and file of the army, nor the masses, nor the relatively well-educated and intelligent Christian races, the Young Turks are destined, one fears, to the isolation and impotence of a group of intellectuals hopelessly in advance of their time. They have to meet this crisis scattered and diminished. Enver Bey, their best soldier, is in Berlin, and their leaders in Constantinople are probably in grave personal danger, and have been forced to hide or to flee. It lies with Salonica to act. If Salonica acts, the Bulgarians and Albanians may also move, but with very different intentions. To acquiesce means the end of the bright dream of reform as the Young Turks had conceived it. To act is to risk civil war, complicated, perhaps, by a renewal of the old Macedonian chaos, with the risk of intervention from Bulgaria. In the background stands Europe, sharply divided into two camps, of which the Germanic group has everything to gain from the restoration of the Sultan's power.

Were Turkey a homogeneous nation, with nothing to fear either from alien races within or hostile States abroad, there would be no reason to indulge in undue pessimism. Even if the counter-revolution ran its course for a time, with some at least of the evils of the old régime rampant once more, it would still be possible to reckon on a future revulsion of opinion, which would bring to power either the Committee or their rivals of the Liberal Union. But the misfortune of Turkey is that it is not homogeneous, and the Christian races may refuse to be patient. "The choice," they may say, "lies between the Young Turks, on the one hand, who are certainly civilised and tolerant, but whose attitude towards other races begins to remind us unpleasantly of that of the Magyars towards the minorities in Hungary, and on the other, the Mohammedan Union, which is medieval and possibly actively fanatical. If the Young Turks could have achieved a permanent triumph, our case would have been tolerable though not brilliant. But this alternation of revolution and counter-revolution, in neither of which we have any share, is too much for human endurance. We should prefer conquest or partition." Unless the army outside the capital reveals unsuspected strength, promptitude, and unanimity, on the Constitutional side, the outlook seems to us gloomy. The near future will probably be a period of half-concealed reaction, the Rump Parliament growing constantly weaker, the Ministry relapsing into the old puppet habits, and the Sultan steadily recovering ground. That may go on until Bulgarians or Albanians make a local chaos, and in the anarchy which must follow, the Powers or the Balkan States return to their old habits of intervention.

The Young Turks have made a gallant effort to prove that their country is capable of reforming herself. If they have failed, it will be because the old régime had left the masses so incurably ignorant. English opinion can only watch events, ready, if the occasion arises, to extend once more a helping hand to reformers, whose occasional mistakes cannot tarnish a splendid achievement and a noble record. They have of late been sharply criticised in England and generally on the wrong grounds. They were blamed for trying to keep their special regiments in the capital—one wishes they had kept more of them, and retained control of them. They are blamed as extremists, when, in fact, it is their moderation which has ruined them—above all, the moderation which allowed Abdul Hamid to remain on the throne. Equally mistaken has been the tendency to applaud Kiamil Pasha's partisans of the Liberal Union, who seem in this affair to have played the part of utilising the fanaticism of the masses and the machinations of the Mohammedan Union to carry out a Pride's Purge at the expense of a rival Constitutional party. But dark though the outlook is, we must not despair prematurely. It is a feature of hope that the new Ministry declares an identity of policy with the old, and that the members of the Committee are for the moment free from arrest and violence. Nothing is known as yet of the attitude of the provinces. Even in the capital the officers of the revolted garrison have apparently remained true to the Committee. It is not conceivable that Abdul Hamid can continue to govern by means of a mob of private soldiers. Not even in Turkey can a Government dispense with the support of the educated class, and there is nothing to suggest that the educated class, despite party divisions, is disloyal to the Constitution. It has as much to fear from reaction and repression as the Christians themselves. Much may depend on British action. If in any form the routed Constitutional forces come together, if the provinces disavow the capital, or if, after a lapse of time, a new conspiracy should attempt to repeat the exploits of the defeated Committee, Sir Edward Grey will, we are sure, range our diplomacy strongly against mere despotism. Above all, during the interval, be it long or short, we can allow no consideration, financial or diplomatic, to induce us to give our countenance to a Sultan who has learned nothing from history, and is as capable to-day of murdering Achmet Riza as he was of assassinating Midhat Pasha, and of repeating in this century the massacres of Bulgarians and Armenians which disgraced the last. Let us be pro-Turkish so long as there is a Turkish party of reform still capable of a brave effort to save its country. But there can be no return to the interested Turcophil policy which condoned oppression to serve an Imperialist calculation. We are convinced that the Government have no such ideas, and they will do a service to European freedom and progress if they give an early and decided hint of where their sympathies lie, and where their action may be found.

---

THE LIBERAL POLICY ON ARMAMENTS.

> "If a serious antagonism is gradually created between the two peoples, it will not be because of the workings of any natural or impersonal forces, but through the vicious activity of a comparatively small number of individuals in both countries and the culpable credulity of larger classes. It becomes the first duty of men of light and leading to resist these nightmare moods, to repel numbing and deluded acceptances and to deny all countenance to that spirit of distrust which without any physical embodiment has already sensibly darkened the outlook of mankind."—Mr. Churchill's letter to Mr. Ritchie.

Lord Rosebery and Mr. Churchill have between them administered a singularly effective check to the progress of the naval scare. We cannot always claim Lord Rosebery as a Liberal critic of affairs. But on the point of our anti-German preoccupation he has shown more foresight than any of his contemporaries, and his warning that the clamor for "instant Armadas" fixes shipbuilding to imperfect types, and risks the sterilisation of the most advanced and promising ideas in naval construction, shows the detachment of mind which is his most useful gift as a public man. Mr. Churchill's attack on the scare-mongers goes further. It is the true answer on the question of fact, it is a terse and powerful statement of the case for a moderate policy in naval armaments, and it sets out the moral issue on the only lines acceptable to the conscience and traditions of the Liberal Party, and suited to its special responsibility for the cause of peace. The first point would always have been clear if throughout this controversy the material problem had been stated with reference to the total effective strength of the Navy now and in 1912 or after. If we desired a panic, the way to raise it was to speak as if no British Navy existed before the autumn of 1905, when the first "Dreadnought" was laid down, and as if, by some non-natural stroke of fortune, our historic capacity for building, sailing, and fighting ships of war had suddenly been eclipsed. Mr. Churchill cuts away all this irrational ground. He shows that the British fleet, actual and potential, contains at least half-a-dozen elements of complete and overwhelming material superiority to the strongest of its rivals. The first is in the number and training of its men—more than double the personnel of the German fleet, with a period of training four times as long. The second is in the number of its ships and guns. The third is the crushing, the "brutal" predominance, of our pre-"Dreadnought" fleet, which contains one class—the "Nelsons"—practically as powerful as its famed successor, and another great class—the "King Edwards"—almost as powerful and as new. The fourth is the actual and largely unchanged power of Great Britain to outbuild Germany in ships of the "Dreadnought" class. The fifth is our greater capacity of speed and of output in shipbuilding, which some small modifications of plan, adopted by the Cabinet during the last few weeks, have probably restored to its full integrity. The sixth is our immensely sounder financial position. If these material elements of naval supremacy cannot content the British people, they do not deserve to have a fleet. To reject so ample a margin of security is merely to disparage the character of its officers and men, and to suggest that the genius of a sea-faring folk has departed.

A reasonable interpretation of our position in the world, and the possible foes we may meet there, is also necessary to a Liberal view of the naval problem. Mr. Churchill, in common, we think, with the entire Cabinet, rules out America. And he puts an equally firm veto on the notion of our "inevitable" antagonism with Germany, which he rightly describes as a "repudiation not only of the whole message of Liberalism, but of the very structure of civilisation." The truth of this saying is evident if we remember that of all the great Powers, not excluding the United States, Germany and Great Britain are the freest from any material or natural or customary grounds of war. We want not an inch of German soil; she could not take an inch of ours, to her profit. The two countries could only ineffectively hammer at each other, senselessly injure their own and each others' trade, and cruelly embroil France and through her Russia, and ultimately Europe. When, therefore, British journals of character, like the "Spectator," speak of the "coming struggle" with Germany, call upon the whole British nation to "Prepare, Prepare, and again Prepare," and invite it, as a fitting exordium, to discard its moral ideas, and to turn its people into conscripts and instruments of a senseless State purpose against another nation, we shall be wise to conclude that we have to deal, not with a perverted public opinion, but in the main with what Mr. Churchill calls the "vicious activity" of a few men. We do not like to be personal, but when we see a paper once governed by Richard Holt Hutton allying itself with the type of journalism whose various forms the "Spectator" must know to be random and superficial at their best, and bad and corrupting at their worst, we can only condole with the Unionist and Tory parties on the little measure to which their critical intelligence has shrunk. To call such a task, as the "Spectator" calls it, "moral" or "intellectual," is an abuse of words. There is not a fact of consequence in the anti-German crusade which has not been blown into the air. It is not true that Germany will have seventeen or twenty-one "Dreadnoughts" in the spring of 1912. It is not true that she can outbuild us in this type of ship. It is not true that she speeded up her entire programme of "Dreadnoughts" for 1909 in order to steal a march upon us. And if, as the "Spectator" alleges in excuse of its plea for more "hardness" in the British character, it be a fact that the growth of wealth and leisure in this country, as in Germany, has produced a certain slackening of fibre in all classes, and an excessive appetite for amusement, we shall touch these evils, not by calling on a naturally commercial nation to turn from industry to war, but by intensifying those processes of refinement in living and thinking in which we of all the great peoples have the slenderest share. Even if war with Germany were coming at some future period, a nation drilled on the senseless lines proposed by the "Spectator" would be no match for the more scientific and thoughtful organisation of the German nation, whose best and most characteristic fruits are not military but industrial. It is the building of men, not of "Dreadnoughts," of which this country stands most in need.

But, happily for the world, war is not coming. Light-minded as some of our people may be, their ruling men are not so mad as to rush from a war which cost us 250 millions and much of the present depression of trade into a war which may double the National Debt and divide up our sea-trade among our rivals. The real "preparation" of all civilised countries, conscious or half-conscious, is not for war, but for a truer conception of their relations to each other, and a more harmonious interior life. Therefore, in spite of German and British Jingoes—who quote each others' articles, feed each others' panics, and debit the cost to their respective Treasuries—there will be no such "struggle" as the "Spectator" imagines. On our side the Liberal and Labor parties, on the German side Social Democracy—with its twenty per cent. of soldiers in the German Army—will stop both it and the growth of European armaments. Moral force is not dead in Europe, and in the confusion overtaking all these calculations of material strength we have a sign that it is the only thing which is alive.

IMPOSSIBILISTS IN LABOUR POLITICS.

Those who would weigh the significance of the differences in the Independent Labor Party which the Edinburgh Conference revealed would do well to ask themselves what its enemies think of them. For ourselves, we are quite sure that all those who fear the action of organised labor in politics, while they greatly dislike Mr. Keir Hardie's and Mr. Macdonald's management of it, would be only too delighted to hear of their supersession by Mr. Grayson or Mr. Hyndman. For they would know that any such party would, in a very few months or years, become as negligible a factor as the Social Democratic Federation, as sincere and ardent, as passionately perverse, and as absurdly ineffective. For that reason we cannot take the retirement of the four chief leaders of the movement, in face of an unlucky resolution, to be other than a tactical and very temporary emergency. No other hands can control a movement which depends on its double connection between a large body of practical politicians in Parliament and the advanced forces in trade unionism. Mr. Grayson and his friends are impossibilists, in face both of the British and of the European labor and Socialist movements. The basis of their revolt is a very simple and very old phenomenon in Socialist societies. It is the contempt for Parliamentarism, the idea, as the "Manchester Guardian" well says, that the main business of a revolutionary party is to "show up" existing forms of Parliamentary Government as "mere carnivals of insincere and otiose talk," its procedure "a mass of fetichistic mummeries elaborated to keep the people in play."

This theory of the consciously malign action and intention of "bourgeois" Parliaments served very well until democracy began to work, and Socialism to claim some of the most brilliant figures in modern Parliamentarism. The policy of "scenes" and "demonstrations" belongs to the mere infancy of Socialism. It is repugnant to a class of intellect which Socialistic theory attracts, and it can hardly survive the proof of what men like Bebel and Jaurès and Viviani and Briand can do without it. The stronger the advanced parties become, the greater their hopes of making Parliaments reflect their ideas of State organisation, the more they are inclined to accept and make the best of the machinery which earlier generations of reformers have moulded and used. The lesson is one which all progressive bodies have to learn and relearn at each stage of their progress. The older men know it by heart; the newer, fresh from their first intoxicating draught of idealism, have always to be taught it. If Mr. Grayson and his party had much knowledge of their countrymen, they would realise that no people tire sooner of pure theory. For years British Socialists of the Grayson type oscillated between violent anti-Liberalism and equally violent protest against Tory Governments. They never perceptibly affected the policy of the one party, or stemmed the force of reaction by the other, even if they did not now and then form part of it. Rooted in dogma, they became incapable of action, and fixed in their theological notion of the irreclaimable wickedness of capitalism, they awaited the day of doom without a rational effort to bring it about.

In our opinion, it is not backward to the scenic and anti-democratic policy of Mr. Grayson, but forward to a more enlarged and human basis of thought and action, that the Socialist parties here and elsewhere are tending. If anti-Parliamentarism exists hardly anywhere but in England, where it is most absurd, the conception of a truly powerful people's party, able and willing not only to enter and traffic with Parliaments, but to govern them, is still to seek. It is a common idea that Socialism has gained by the weakening or the destruction of Continental Liberalism and Radicalism. But it would be equally true to say that the inflexible, dogmatic basis which Marx imparted to it has helped to produce and to harden the connection between the later Imperialist Liberalism and avowedly reactionary and anti-democratic forces. In Germany the fear of Socialism keeps the Bülow bloc from dissolution, while it shuts out enlightened, but not dogmatic, politicians like Dr. Barth from the following which in a Liberal country like Great Britain they would naturally attract. Even here it is only necessary for Socialism to become a little more aggressive in talk to become a mere electioneering asset of Toryism. How many London elections, we wonder, have been fought on an unlucky saying of Mr. Sidney Webb as to the taxation of the landlords, and for how many years has the threat of a 20 per cent. land duty stopped the application of one per cent.?

As things stand, the general irresponsibility of Socialistic leaders not only qualifies their effective force in politics, but checks their own education, and makes their general contribution to the life of the State less rich and powerful than it ought to be. We can quite imagine a state of things in which this relationship to practical government might be dramatically changed. If, for example, Liberalism were to falsify its historic position on the question of armaments, and to let its policy shrinks into mere nuances of Toryism, we should inevitably see a combination between Socialism and the Radical parties. "Opposition to armaments," says Mr. Bernstein, "is the agreed policy of all the Labor parties" in Europe, and if the maintenance of the armed peace developes into a continual menace both to industry and to social reform, and Liberalism is unable to find a policy on it, we shall witness the rise of a party combining the ideal and religious elements of the old Liberalism with the social aspirations of labor. Such a party could not be either pure working-class or dogmatically and exclusively Socialist, for it would have to contemplate governing as well as criticising, and it must take congenial allies just as a wise man selects the friends that suit him. Its models in foreign policy would inevitably be sought in statesmen of the type of Cavour and Cobden and Gladstone in a past age, as well as of M. Jaurès in this. In view of such developments interludes in Labor policy like those provided by Mr. Grayson and his friends seem peculiarly futile. To many students of politics Mr. Hardie and Mr. Macdonald have seemed to err on the side of intransigeance rather than of opportunism. But they have certainly kept to the clear path of progress in holding firm to democracy, and insisting that the rational conquest of opinion in Parliament, which they began in 1906, and the moulding of national policy outside of it, shall be carried to its legitimate end.

A STUDY OF THE BYE-ELECTIONS.

The study of bye-elections has become a special branch of political statistics. Newspapers of either party deprecate or applaud, find local or special reasons for each particular defeat or victory. The political prophet, detached and impartial, endeavors to forecast, over a series of results, the trend of contemporary opinion. Sometimes he fails lamentably, as Mr. Gladstone, before the Election of 1892 (in a situation somewhat similar to the present, but with Home Rule substituted for Protection), in his article in one of the magazines demonstrating a Liberal majority of over a hundred, failed rightly to estimate the number who voted "against the Government" at bye-elections, but remained unconverted on the clear issue. Sometimes he succeeds beyond expectation, as Mr. Stead, before the great débâcle of 1906, who prophesied, amid the ridicule of the unbelieving, a bigger Liberal majority than any since the great Reform Bill. The tide of the bye-elections to-day is running strongly against the Government. Since the beginning of last year—with the arrival, it is asserted by some, of the Licensing Bill; with the presence, say others, of increasing trade depression—the great wave of progressive advance which was sweeping Liberal and Labor candidates into Parliament came to a sudden halt. Since then a series of Conservative victories, some of them sensational in their majorities, have offered to the Tariff Reformers high hopes of a return to power, in a General Election, with a substantial majority. An analysis of these results may not be uninteresting.

Since the beginning of last year 26 bye-elections have been held in Great Britain (for Ireland stands outside this analysis). Of these, 16 have been held in England, two in Wales, eight in Scotland. Before the bye-elections the seats were held by 20 Liberals and 6 Conservatives; to-day they are held by 12 Liberals and 14 Conservatives.

This is a considerable overturn. It will be interesting to consider the results in connection with the various parts of the country to which they belong. We may begin with Scotland, which has been blest with an altogether disproportionate number of bye-election contests.

Here are the 8 Scottish contests, with the majorities, of the general and the bye-elections respectively:—

| | 1906. | | 1908-9. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Kincardine ... ... | L 2,353 | ... ... ... | L 1,698 | |
| Dundee ... ... | L 3,700 | Lab. 6,833 ... | L 2,709 | Lab. 4,014 |
| Montrose ... ... | L 2,494 | ... ... ... | L 1,146 | Lab. 1,937 |
| Stirling ... ... | L (1,127) | ... ... ... | L 1,361 | |
| Forfar ... ... | L 3,519 | ... ... ... | L 2,452 | |
| Glasgow (Central) ... | L 431 | ... ... ... | C 2,113 | |
| Edinburgh (South)... | L 3,860 | ... ... ... | L 1,221 | |
| Hawick ... ... | L 681 | ... ... ... | L 520 | |

Here at least there would seem to be nothing to excite alarm. Except the Central Division of Glasgow (a very special constituency of business men, fought by a popular Glasgow man against a "foreigner," and under exceptional conditions), Scotland appears to stand substantially as in 1906.

And here are the even more cheering results (for the Liberal) from little Wales:—

| | 1906. | | 1908-9. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Pembroke ... ... | L 3,280 | ... ... ... | L 2,174 |
| Denbigh E. ... ... | L 2,791 | ... ... ... | L 2,721 |

It is in England that the wave has come; England analysable into the industrial North, the rural districts, the smaller boroughs, and London:—

First as to the North:—

| | 1906. | | 1908-9. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Leeds S. ... ... | L 4,074 | Lab. 4,030 ... | L 359 | Lab. 2,451 |
| Dewsbury ... ... | L 3,805 | Lab. 2,629 ... | L 1,516 | Lab. 2,446 |
| Manchester N. W. ... | L 1,241 | ... ... ... | C 429 | Soc. 276 |
| Yorkshire (Pudsey)... | L 3,502 | ... ... ... | C 113 | Lab. 1,291 |
| Newcastle on Tyne ... | L & Lab. 6,481 | ... ... ... | C 2,143 | Lab. 2,971 |

Three Conservative gains are here recorded. But in every case the contest is a three-cornered one, and in two of these the Conservative represents a minority of the electorate, and the seat has been given to the Protectionists by the splitting of the progressive vote. In both Newcastle and Pudsey the Free Trade vote was united in 1906. Of the third Tory victory it is enough to say that here also is a special constituency, much resembling Central Glasgow, which had never been Liberal before Protection re-appeared on the horizon, and in which the Tory majority at the bye-election was still smaller than it had ever been before.

Now to the industrial Midlands—one election only:—

| | 1906. | | 1908-9. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Wolverhampton E. ... | L 2,865 | ... ... ... | L 8 |

Local circumstances, no doubt, affected this contest, and it is impossible to generalise from one bye-election. But undoubtedly this, more than any of the others, signifies the advance of the Birmingham propaganda.

The small towns are perhaps less important:—

| | 1906. | | 1908-9. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Worcester ... ... | C 129 | ... ... ... | C 1,292 |
| Hastings ... ... | C 413 | ... ... ... | C 1,018 |
| Taunton ... ... | C 339 | ... ... ... | C. No Lib. Candidate. |

Four contests have been held in the rural districts; and the result cannot be regarded as encouraging:—

| | 1906. | | 1908-9. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Devon (Mid) ... | L 1,289 | ... ... ... | C 559 |
| Hereford (Ross) ... | L 312 | ... ... ... | C 1,019 |
| Shropshire (Morton) | C 176 | ... ... ... | C 951 |
| Essex (Mid) ... ... | C 454 | ... ... ... | C 2,565 |

Lastly, we come to London; and here, it must be confessed, the result is bad:—

| | 1906. | | 1908-9. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Peckham ... ... | L 2,339 | ... ... ... | C 2,494 | |
| Haggerston ... ... | L 401 | ... ... ... | C 1,143 | Soc. 986 |
| Croydon ... ... | C 638 | Lab 4,007 ... | C 3,948 | Lab. 886 |

In general analyses according to district, therefore, we may draw the following conclusions. The reactionary wave has scarcely touched Scotland and Wales. It has influenced the North, but in no very menacing fashion if only the Free Trade vote could be united in some common agreement between Liberal and Labor. It more seriously affects the small towns and the country districts. Its centre and crown is in London.

It may be interesting to compare the figures and results of these elections with those of former Liberal and Conservative majorities. In 1885 the Liberals had a majority (with the Irish) of 172; in 1892 of 40; in 1906 of 354. The Tory high-water mark may be taken as 1900, with a majority of 134. We have added the majorities of these 26 seats for each constituency—in the case of unopposed returns taking the highest for that party in preceding contests:—

| | L. | C. |
|---|---|---|
| 1885 ... ... ... ... | 20 | 6 |
| 1892 ... ... ... ... | 15 | 11 |
| 1900 ... ... ... ... | 15 | 11 |
| 1906 ... ... ... ... | 20 | 6 |
| Bye-Elections ... ... ... | 12 | 14 |

Two facts are manifest from these results. The first is the difficulty of generalising from such incomplete data, glaringly made manifest by the fact that in these 26 seats the proportion of Liberals and Tories was exactly the same in two pairs of contests—in one case when the Liberals had majorities (over the whole country) of 172 and 354, in the other, when they had a majority of 40 and a minority of 134. The other is that the proportion held by the Tories to-day is greater than ever before, since the constituencies were created. If the minority votes be excepted, however, (at Pudsey and Newcastle), the proportion would read L.14, C.12, or one worse than 1892 and 1900.

Lastly we may give the actual majorities for these four years:—

| | L Majorities. | C Majorities. | Surplusage. | Lab. (ineffective). |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1885 ... ... | 25,549 | 4,038 | L 21,511 | —— |
| 1892 ... ... | 16,149 | 11,495 | L 4,654 | —— |
| 1900 ... ... | 14,030 | 17,530 | C 3,500 | —— |
| 1906 ... ... | 47,460 | 2,149 | L 45,311 | 17,479 |
| Bye-Elections | 17,685 | 19,787 | C 2,102 | 17,258 |

These last two results certainly represent a large overturn, quite without parallel in so short a space of time. If, however, the Labor vote be added to the Liberal (as an effective Free Trade vote) the result (even in this year of depression) shows a Liberal and Labor surplusage of 15,156, which is nearly four times as much as that of 1892, and approximates towards the result of 1885, presaging a Conservative minority of something like 150.

These, of course, are but indications, not calculations. Great tracts of the country exhibit no voice at all in the matter. There have been no bye-elections in Lancashire (outside the specialised district of N.W. Manchester). There have been no bye-elections in the Eastern Counties—the stronghold of rural Nonconformity. And there have been no bye-elections at all in the country districts since the Old Age Pension Act came into operation. It will be interesting to see if this Act exercises any influence in checking the reassertion of the feudal domination.

It may be possible, however, to suggest a few general conclusions, always premising that 1906, being an annus mirabilis in electioneering, yields a somewhat abnormal standard of results:—

First: Liberal and Labor stand or fall together. This approximation of Labor figures in the table given above—17,400 and 17,200—is a coincidence merely, as in many contests (Montrose, Pudsey, Haggerston, &c.) they had no candidate in 1906. When they had a candidate in both contests the result showed a very great reduction. In times of progress both Liberal and Labor votes increase. In the advance of Reaction both wither up. The Conservatives detach, on these occasions, the middle and upper classes from Liberalism, and the very poorest—the public-house loafer, the unemployed—from Labor.

It is important that some arrangement, especially in the North—the second ballot, transferable vote, or mutual agreement as to seats—should prevent the whimsical but disastrous result of a Protectionist majority in the House representing a Protectionist minority in the country.

Second: The new methods of electioneering in part vitiate these results. Before this year constituencies were pretty much left to themselves, and hence a bye-election furnished something like a "sample" of opinion in all similar districts. But in the past fifteen months new methods have been invented for the "stampeding" of a crowd. Thousands of pounds are spent over each contest, imported "leagues" and "organisations" swoop down upon the district with oratory and persuasion and pictorial display. This stampeding process probably over-estimates the Tory gain if the figures be applied to the country as a whole.

Third: London shows itself most susceptible to these methods. After London come the big towns, which most exhibit conditions similar to London—Glasgow, Newcastle, Manchester. Scotland and Wales reveal themselves as chillingly indifferent. This "fickleness" and excitement of the new city-bred race may be regarded as a disquieting symptom, whichever party it may for a moment swing towards or away from.

Fourth: A year of trade depression, a year of unemployment, a year of attack upon the drink trade, have coincided with a year of Protectionist propagandism. Each element takes credit for victory, and it is difficult to disentangle the various threads of impulse which have swelled the reactionary wave. Perhaps in the next few months the progress of affairs will itself provide a disentanglement: i.e., a trade "boom" may follow the depression, and counter the dismal forebodings of the Tariff missionary.

Fifth: Scotland remains solid to its two great social measures which the Lords have destroyed, dealing drastically with the land question in town and country. Wales is solid for disestablishment, and, as at East Denbigh, for advanced social—especially land—reform. In England alone social enthusiasm has weakened. It may be that here also the people are waiting for a lead, and disappointed because no lead is given, in a land policy for the villages, in an unemployed policy for the towns. To both of these the Tories are offering something constructive—however much decorated and falsified—work for all, higher prices for the products of the fields. In London, Parliament hears only of the anger of the wealthy at a "Socialistic" policy, of the return of the middle classes to their former Conservative allegiance. England lies outside London, with the wealthy and middle classes but a small proportion of the people. It is still to be won for progress if progress offers some definite, courageous effort towards an intelligible ideal.

Life and Letters.

THE POET OF PAIN.

It is a week this morning since Swinburne's death, and to the curious in such matters it might seem significant that he passed away, as it were, at the turning of the tide—in the interval between the tragedy of Good Friday and the triumph of Easter Day. For in his work he never could be sure whether the life of man was a tragedy or a triumph, and according to his mood his view shifted from one to the other, or boldly accepted both. But it is more fruitful to remember that sonnet which he wrote twenty-seven years ago, and called "A Death on Easter Day," beginning:—

"The strong spring sun rejoicingly may rise,
Rise and make revel, as of old men said,
Like dancing hearts of lovers newly wed;
A light more bright than ever bathed the skies
Departs for all time out of all men's eyes;
The crown that girt last night a living head
Shines only now, though deathless, on the dead:
Art that mocks death, and Song that never dies."

The sonnet was written on the death of his master and friend, Rossetti, one of the very few English-speaking poets who are not only Swinburne's equals but his kin. And now its brief elegy may stand as our lamentation over the last of our poets who had unquestioned claim to greatness; for it suits well both with the occasion of his death and the honor of his deathless crown.

Throughout the week that honor has been paid him in the three countries of England, France, and Italy, which alone he loved. There is no need to dwell again on the qualities for which he is universally praised—on the mastery of metre, the new music that he wrought with our language, or the passionate sweetness of his lyrical power. We may take all that for granted now; even his most intimate enemies never denied it him. We would not be counted with those who admire or criticise form as something distinct from thought or substance, whereas form and substance are necessarily and always the same. But still we cannot quite ignore that old, though barren, criticism which insists upon Swinburne's splendor of form, and says he sacrificed sense to the music and melody of the words. "Take care of the sounds," said Lewis Carroll, "and the sense will take care of itself." Or, if we are by this time a little bored with having the beauty of Swinburne's form and language dinned into us, let us cheerfully remember that parody he wrote on himself in the "Heptalogia, or Seven Against Sense." It is called "Nephelidia," and begins: "From the depth of the dreamy decline of the dawn through a notable nimbus of nebulous noonshine." That is a terrible blow for critics who harp upon the beauty of his sound apart from sense; for the sound is quite all there, but no one, however lately let out from Bedlam or Parnassus, would call its nonsense beautiful. Listen again to a stanza:—

"Mild is the mirk and monotonous music of memory, melodiously mute as it may be,
While the hope in the heart of the hero is bruised by the breach of men's rapiers, resigned to the rod;
Made meek as a mother whose bosom-beats bound with the bliss-bringing bulk of a balm-breathing baby,
As they grope through the graveyard of creeds, under skies growing green at a groan for the grimness of God."

And while we are in the way with the "Heptalogia" and the bulk of that balm-breathing baby, we might remember his parody, called "The Person of the House," upon another poet. Against the maudlin wash that Swinburne sometimes poured over babies, there is no more bracing antidote than its last four lines:—

"Then Mrs. Prig addressed me thus,
'Sir, if you'll be advised by me,
You'll leave the blessed babe to us,
It's my belief he wants his tea.'"

That is a good antidote to sentimental wash in a nursery—a good antidote also to the reverse sentimentalism that talked about "lips intertwisted and bitten," "kisses of death," and similar phenomena distantly connected with the subject.

In days when critics were as indiscriminating in startled horror as some are now in ecstasy of praise, Swinburne turned on them with the question:—

"Why grudge him lotus-leaf and laurel,
O toothless mouth, and swinish maw,
Who never grudged you bells and coral,
Who never grudged you trough and straw?"

If there had been nothing in the poet's work but a succession of beautiful sounds, and a conscious straining after the unrealities or perversions of passion, they would not have deserved his savagery. They would have been right, and by this time Swinburne might be almost forgotten, instead of winning his high place among our poets more securely as the years passed. But the critics and the British public of the early 'sixties were startled from their self-satisfied equanimity of family life and established religion. They had a good deal to startle them just then, and, blinded with panic, they thought this outrageous young poet sounded the final doom of domestic virtue. We need not blame them, but they made many mistakes, as people in blind panic will, and one of their most obvious mistakes was the commonest. They regarded Swinburne as the poet of pleasure, especially of sensual pleasure. They were very anxious about their sons and daughters. They were a little anxious about themselves. It was an alluring land into which the poet led them—a land of Greek hills and Roman palaces and half-lit, medieval scenes, haunted by strange enchantresses and unholy joys, very different from the daily round of comfortable satisfaction, the common task of business, which they had been told should furnish all they needed to ask. It seemed as though the poet beckoned them far away to revel in perpetual and unknown delights, where they might lie for ever amid roses and raptures.

But they need not have been afraid. Nothing could be further from the inner purport of those first and passionate poems on which alone Swinburne's claim to greatness rests than incitement to sensual gratification. If the poet tells of beauty, joy, and pleasure, it is of those that Keats set in the train that follows melancholy:—

"Beauty that must die;
And Joy, whose hand is ever at his lips
Bidding adieu; and aching Pleasure nigh,
Turning to poison while the bee-mouth sips."

That aching pleasure is the burden of nearly all Swinburne's song when it tells of pleasure at all. "Alas! for sorrow is all the end of this," says the lover in "Laus Veneris," "Vain delight, and love self-slain in some sweet shameful way," is the end of every man's desire:—

"For love has no abiding,
But dies before the kiss," sighs the lover in "Before Dawn"; and even when passion is most genuine, been fully inspired of love, as "In the Orchard," the lament is still that it must end, and day should be so soon:—

"Nay, I will sleep then only; nay, but go.
Ah sweet, too sweet to me, my sweet, I know,
Love, sleep, and death go to the sweet same tune;
Hold my hair fast, and kiss me through it so.
Ah God, ah God, that day should be so soon."

The momentary pleasure of which philosophers used to tell us lasts hardly for the moment. Even at its height, it is haunted by its own ghost, which next moment will arise from the tomb of memory. It never comes but hand-in-hand with the poignant sorrow for what is already departing. Nor can it ever be recovered, repeated, and enjoyed again. It goes, never to return, and if we drag it back by force, it is not the same pleasure that comes. "Nor feel the latter kisses like the first," is the summary of all words "Before Parting," and it is best to leave it there, lest satiety drive the hunt for pleasure onward from point to point into that crazed unhappiness which can only cry:—

"Ah, where shall we go then for pastime,
If the worst that can be has been done?"

With all his beauty, with all his alluring sweetness and passion, it is not as the poet of pleasure that

Swinburne is distinguished. About the "Atalanta," in spite of its tragedy, there was the touch of blitheness and joy that is sometimes attributed to Greece. But the first chorus, when the hounds of spring are on winter's traces, is almost the only genuinely happy song the poet ever wrote, and all the other choruses tell of sorrow—of man's foreknowledge of death, of love's cruelty, and of God's evil gifts:—

"For the gods very subtly fashion
Madness with sadness upon earth;
Not knowing in any wise compassion,
Nor holding pity of any worth."

Even in the most human of the poet's ballads—even in "Les Noyades" and "The Leper"—there is no joy in pleasure. In "Les Noyades" the pleasure is fantastic, and only possible because it lies on the brink of death. In "The Leper," where love has the finer quality of devotion unmixed with self, there is hardly pleasure at all, but only the passionate sorrow for the beloved's shame and ruined beauty. It is as our greatest poet of pain, and not of pleasure—of yearning pain, of dying joy, of satiety, of desire regretfully fulfilled—that Swinburne is distinguished. That is the tragedy he sang.

In the midst of all this sorrow and delusive hope there is not much remains for mankind. "It is not much," he says in "The Triumph of Time":—

"It is not much that a man can save
On the sands of life, in the straits of time,
Who swims in sight of the third great wave,
That never a swimmer shall cross or climb."

It is not much, but courage remains, and the indomitable will in the never-ending contest for man's freedom. "We know not," the poet says in "Félise":—

"We know not whether death be good,
But life at least it will not be;
Men will stand saddening as we stood,
Watch the same fields and skies as we,
And the same sea."

The poppied sleep will come; the poet himself is with those for whom, as he said of Baudelaire, "All winds are quiet as the sun, All waters as the shore." But by its beauty, its courage, and the passion for human freedom, his vital work—the work of his glorious youth, before the malignity of time smote him down to a state of suspended animation—remains assured of what we call immortality, and the deathless crown shines upon him now that he is dead.

---

THE BATTLE OF THE FAITHS.

Analogies between the ancient and the modern world are often superficially advanced, and sometimes pressed too far. The decent citizen of the twentieth century, if transported to the Rome of the first, would find himself in a civilisation so different from his own as probably to convince him that he was living upon another planet. Yet there are broad and fundamental resemblances in certain epochs which dominate all the startling divergences; and in none more than the resemblance between the society of our own day and the society into which Christianity first came. We have, indeed, no slave labor at the base, no frantic insanity at the summit of the social order. Our communal pleasures do not include the spectacles of tortures, massacres, and crucifixions. Nor is the menace of the barbarian—with ruthless warfare on the boundaries of the world—always present as a spectre proclaiming the uncertainty of progress. But we have the same gathering into cities and divorce from the soil; the same wide-spread social discontent; the same pleasureless pursuit of pleasure; the same attempt to organise life on a rational and natural basis, with the same disgust and weariness of it all. The dialogues of Lucian, with a few verbal alterations, might have been written in a London season. The earlier Christian apologists read to-day extraordinarily vivid and contemporary—meeting the same arguments, advanced in the same unanswerable fashion as those which disprove the truth of Christianity in the popular press. Civilisation is passing then, as now, from a scepticism about the gods to a scepticism about itself. Positive Churches and Ethical Societies attempt a commendable if austere virtue. For one moment indeed—in a spiritual dynasty without father or children—Positivism in the person of Marcus Aurelius ascends the throne of the Cæsars. The splendor of material achievement is revealed, less as evidence of content than as manifestation of restlessness and disquietude; an attempt, always unsuccessful, to satisfy the hunger of the soul by piling stone on stone and tower on tower. And Marienbads for the curing of the flesh damaged by self-indulgence, and "Christian Sciences" and "Retreats" and "Asceticisms" for the curing of the malady of the soul, then, as now, jostled superstitions and devil worship and attempts to communicate with the dead and to establish religions of "Imperialism," and all the follies of those who find in them no easier and no quicker passing of the impracticable hours.

Mr. Glover, in "The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire" (Methuen & Co.), has provided a suggestive and masterly sketch of this strange, declining world. If he is unable to explain, any more than Gibbon could explain, the progress and subsequent triumph of Christianity, he can reveal what this Christianity was which thus triumphed, and how hollow and weak, with all its seeming invincibility, was that society and creed which declared war upon it, and sought, by every effort of torment, to bring it to an end. The Roman Imperialism, with its frontiers still inviolate and over the greater part of the known world the magnificence and security of the Roman Peace, was perishing at the heart. At first it withdrew from mankind any hope of immortal life, of permanent triumph over Time and Change. And when it had thus concentrated attention upon the present—in a repudiation of "other worldliness"—it found that "present" a thing of dust and vanity. Its wisest men are proclaiming, to a kind of mournful music, the desirability of virtue and restraint in Life which is a gigantic cheat and mockery. As far back as the days of Cæsar the intellectuals had already ceased to believe. Cicero writes to his wife as any unsuccessful lawyer might write to his wife to-day. "If these miseries are to be permanent, I only wish, my dearest, to see you as soon as possible, and to die in your arms, since neither gods whom you have worshipped, nor man whom I have always served, have made us any return." Later Lucian can picture the gods listening with consternation to the philosophers at Athens who are disproving their existence. "Poseidon recommends the prompt use of a thunderbolt 'to let them see,' but Zeus reminds him that it is Destiny that really controls the thunderbolts—and, besides, 'it would look as if we were frightened.'" The arguments are so cogent that the gods begin themselves to doubt their own existence as they listen, and are only consoled by Hermes, who reminds them that "we still have the majority—most of the Greeks and all the Barbarians."

Such was the method of common sense: not of scepticism, for, as Mr. Glover reminds us, Lucian was as sceptical of the sceptics as of the believers. To others the vision was less one for laughter than for tears. Endure hunger, says Epictetus, as all things good or ill—the sun or the rain, as it comes. There is one end—and that quick coming—for all. "But my wife and child also suffer hunger. What then? Does their hunger lead to any other place? Is there not for them the same descent, wherever it may lead? Below, is it not the same for them as for you?" "If you are kissing your child, remind yourself that you love a mortal thing. What harm does it do to whisper, as you kiss the child, 'To-morrow you will die'?" Such was the testimony from the gutter: it is re-echoed in the voice from the throne. The sentences of Marcus Aurelius sound like the wailing of wind over a deserted city, proclaiming the vanishing of the hope of humanity. "A moment and earth will cover us all: then it too in its turn will change: and what it changes to will change and change again for ever." Immortality in the race? The roll-call of the ages? It is all brushed aside, as dust and illusion. "Think of the life lived by others of old, of the life that shall be lived by others after thee, of the life now lived among the barbarian nations: and of how many have never heard thy name, and how many will at once forget it, and how many may praise thee now perhaps but will very soon blame thee: and how neither memory is of any account, nor glory, nor anything else at all."

Yet men still desperately and inexplicably clung to life; and to the longing for a life beyond life in which a "Son of Man" should prove at the last triumphant over the brute forces of Necessity, and the grave Lucian in one of his dialogues shows Charon making a pilgrimage to the upper world to see what it really is that the dead regret so much. "He sees a varied scene, life full of confusion, cities like swarms of bees, where each has a sting and stings his neighbor, and some like wasps, harass and plunder the rest: over them like a cloud hang hopes and fears and follies, pleasures and passions and hatreds. He would like to shout to them, 'to live with Death ever before their eyes'—why be so earnest about what they can never take away? but Hermes tells him it would be useless." "Pursue one end alone," is the only conclusion of the sane man, "how you may well arrange the present, and go on your way with a laugh for most things, and no enthusiasm." Against such a vision of chance and disorder came these queer Christians —mostly stupid, unlearned men— with this irrational belief of theirs in a Special Providence watching over the fall of a sparrow; "the very hairs of your head are all numbered"; "your heavenly Father knoweth that you have need of all these things." Marcus Aurelius was bored at their stupidity and their obstinacy and ordered or acquiesced in their torture and death. The human body was to him "rottenness—water, dust, bones, stench." "I believe in the Resurrection of the Flesh," replied these strange people—from the cross and the gibbet; with a kind of exultation. Lucian had no other contempt for them than a kindly one, "You see these poor creatures have persuaded themselves that they are immortal for all time and will live for ever," he writes, "which explains why they despise death and voluntarily give themselves up, as a general rule. And then their original law-giver persuaded them that they are all brothers, from the moment that they cross over and deny the gods of Greece, and worship their sophist who was gibbeted and live after his laws." "He shall come in clouds," they were declaring of their "sophist," and every eye shall see him, as once gibbeted in the flesh. "They shall see him (Jesus) then on that day," wrote the so-called Barnabas, "wearing the long scarlet robe upon his flesh, and they will say, 'Is this not He whom we crucified, whom we spat upon and rejected?'" To others besides Celsus this hope of resurrection was "a hope of worms." Philosophy would have made alliance with the new religion if it would have acknowledged that Jesus clothed himself with phantom flesh only, that he never actually suffered, was spat upon, crucified, rose again in the body. Where in such restatement, asks Tertullian—writing "with his nerves in a kind of blaze"—was that which "could tempt a man to face the lions?" "Jesus become a phantom, or an aeon: his body, sidereal substance, which offered, Clement himself said, no material resistance to the touch of St. John's hand; God divided, Heaven gone, no hope or faith left possible in a non-real Christ even in this life—Christians would be, indeed, of all men most miserable, and morality would have no longer any basis or any motive." "Away," says the philosophic creed offended at the indelicacy of such detail, "away with the census roll, the cramped inns, the soiled rags, the hard stall." Away with the impossible thought that men actually nailed upon a gibbet the very flesh of the Son of God. "He hungered under the devil," thunders Tertullian in reply, "thirsted under the Samaritan woman, shed tears over Lazarus, was troubled at death; last of all, he shed his blood." The Son of God died. "It is credible because it is foolish. He was buried and rose again. It is certain because it is impossible." "Thou, who wouldst do away with the disgrace of faith," he cries, "spare the one hope of all the world."

It was this sense of certainty—and the strength which came from certainty—which, more than any positive assertions, offended the governing classes of the time. It can all be seen in the attack of Celsus—a wise, tolerant, kindly ethical teacher. It was bad enough that the belief should come from the lowest of the people, "the simpletons, the ignoble, the senseless, slaves, and womenfolk and children." It was worse that it should welcome the sinner and condemn the righteous; openly proclaim that its God had filled the hungry with good things and the rich sent empty away. It was monstrous that it should seek converts to a cock-and-bull story of a God who had come down to earth, of uncertain parentage, a carpenter, in one of the meanest of the Roman provinces; a story bearing on the face of it the marks of manufacture; which at once provoked the laughter, incensed the patriotism, and offended the taste of educated people. "Suppose that God, like Zeus in the comedy, waking out of long sleep, determined to rescue mankind from evil, why on earth did he send this spirit (as you call it) into one particular corner?" The ignominy of the life of Jesus is evidence of the falsity of his claim to be God's son. At the Passion he was "unhelped by his father and unable to help himself." He could not escape from the Cross nor avenge his death. Even to-day "a man may stand and blaspheme your daemon," says Celsus to the Christians, "and not that only, he may forbid him land and sea, and then lay hands on you who are consecrated to him like a statue, bind you, march you off and impale you; and the daemon—or, as you say, the son of God—does not help you." But what was beyond measure intolerable was that this squalid crowd of artisans and slave-girls, in face of these uncontrovertible arguments and the silence of their God, should still refuse to abjure him; should defy all the might of Empire to do its worst upon them, sooner than deny him.

No society has ever more fiercely persecuted than a society entirely rational. It was not in the name of a rival religion but in the name of reason and common sense that the Empire essayed the extermination of the Christians. Its efforts met with defiant resistance. The more it multiplied its tortures the more the despised irrational sect increased. Tertullian knows that time is on his side, and hurls taunts and invectives upon the power which has declared war against his God. "We are but of yesterday," he cries, "and we have filled everything: cities, islands, camps, palaces, forums. All we have left you is the temples." It is the martyrdoms, not the tradition, not the scriptures—"nobody comes to them unless he is already a Christian"—which are the great propagators of the Church. In the "very dog-days of persecution" "faith glows," he can cry, "and the Church is burning like the bush." The demons redouble their efforts: but "they recognise that they are no match for us." Exultation and rejoicing confront all these furies with invincible fortitude. "Nothing whatever is achieved," he asserts, "by each more exquisite cruelty you invent. We are made more as often as you mow us down." His fiery spirit sees the devils stoking the fires and multiplying the savage cruelty of the authorities and the whole Universe as spectators of the unequal contest. The man who had seen the deaths in the amphitheatre, who remembered the expression on the faces of the spectators, who knew the cruelty that went with Roman lust, could hardly help, says Mr. Glover, believing in hell. He had seen Perpetua and Felicitas, young mothers, brought out naked to be tossed by a wild cow. He had seen the test of the fire, the sword, the wild beast—cross, hook, lash, the rack, the circus, the prison: with the renegade Jew there also, with his placard of "the God of the Christians"—a caricature with "the ears and one hoof of an ass, clad in a toga, book in hand." Small wonder that he anticipated the day when he should gaze over the battlements of heaven and watch all those who delighted in such infamies receiving their due reward—magistrates who condemned, philosophers who mocked, proud monarchs who disdained, all burning for ever in hell. "'This,' I shall say, 'is he, the son of the carpenter or the harlot, Sabbath breaker, demoniac. This is he whom you bought from Judas: this is he whom you beat with the reed and the palms of your hands, whom you disfigured with your spittle, to whom you gave gall and vinegar. This is he whom his disciples stole away, that it might be said he had risen—or the gardener took him away, that his lettuces might not be trodden by the crowds that came.'" In this fury and irony which emerges from the blood and smoke we are far away from the vision of one who, when he was reviled, reviled not again. But we can understand something of the reason why the pessimism and rationalism of the most splendid of all Imperialisms found itself baffled and at last broken by this new spirit which had come into the world.

---

AMERICA THROUGH EUROPEAN EYES.

The art of international appreciation is just beginning to be cultivated. The holding of international congresses, the growth of foreign investigation by Governments, the special missions of enquiry into education, the conditions of labor, hygiene, crime, drink, and other matters, and —last, but not least—the organised exchanges of teachers, now beginning to be practised by universities and learned societies, rank among the most conspicuous evidences of this art. Thus the moral isolation of nations, the greatest single barrier to a world civilisation, is gradually giving way, and peoples are beginning to indulge a patriotic pride in their ability to learn from one another. But, valuable as it is for foreigners to study moral instruction in French schools, the Gothenburg system, the Elberfeld treatment of poverty, Raiffeisian banks, or the Swiss referendum, this piecemeal receptivity is not all that is needed. How far is it yet possible for one people to get a true understanding of another people? and how far possible for a people to learn by foreign criticism? are far more important and more difficult questions.

A singularly interesting concrete treatment of the question is afforded by a volume ("As Others See Us": The Macmillan Co.) in which an able American, Mr. John Graham Brooks, presents in a series of dissolving views the impressions made by the United States upon a variety of European visitors during the last hundred years. The testimony of the early chapters goes far towards explaining that curious blend of sensitiveness and ostentatious indifference with which, until recently, the best Americans regarded British opinion. For most of the visitors of eminence in the earlier formative days of the great Republic were British, and their perversity, often malignity, of judgment appears almost incredible. It was, perhaps, natural enough that ordinary English conservatives visiting the country within a few years of war should adopt the tone of the author of "Tom Cringle's Log":—

> "I don't like Americans. I never did, and never shall, like them. I have seldom met an American gentleman, in the large and complete sense of the term. I have no wish to eat with them, drink with them, deal with them, or consort with them in any way."

Most English visitors brought with them the profound conviction that the American experiment was doomed to ignominious failure. Here is a typical pronouncement: "With all the lights of experience blazing before our eyes, it is impossible not to discuss the futility of this form of government. It was weak and wicked in Athens. It was bad in Sparta, and worse in Rome. It has been tried in France, and has terminated in despotism. It was tried in England, and rejected with the utmost loathing and abhorrence. It is on trial here, and the issue will be civil war, desolation, and anarchy." But it was singularly unfortunate that, in an age when Americans lived intellectually upon English books, none of the well-known authors who visited the country—not even those who, like Dickens and Harriet Martineau, came with no initial prejudice—should have shown any capacity to read, underneath the rude exterior of the life and manner which they caricatured, the great formative forces of national character. But in recording such a judgment we must not forget that Harriet Martineau, for instance, entered Boston on the very day when Garrison was being dragged through the streets by a mob "entirely composed of gentlemen." All the brutality, the brag, aggressive self-assertion, vulgarity of an improvised materialistic civilisation were there, visible, obtrusive. Yet, all the same, it was not creditable to the temper and intelligence of these literary lions that they should have seen so little else, and that the magnificent energy then, as now, displayed in so many avenues of activity should have received so little recognition. Such unfair treatment naturally threw America on the defensive, and for generations almost inhibited that power of self-criticism so essential to a new nation seeking its own soul and finding its place in the society of nations. Nor was the balance adjusted by the flood of equally indiscriminate eulogy which enthusiastic French democrats poured out. Detraction and adulation alike fed a really monumental self-complacency, which found its culminating expression in that Fourth of July oratory which in the middle of the nineteenth century was really representative of the feelings and convictions of all classes of the American people. Even in his most enthusiastic mood Mr. Roosevelt could never have claimed with Mr. Everett—"Our government is in its theory perfect, and in its operation it is perfect too. Thus we have solved the great problem in human affairs." Every educated American is now well aware that he has not yet solved "the great problem in human affairs," nor does he any longer claim a complete self-sufficiency to do it. And this changed attitude is largely attributable to the more intelligent and helpful criticism of foreigners, and a corresponding growth of power to profit by it.

So far as England is concerned Mr. Brooks traces a change of attitude to the Civil War: "England really began to respect us because of the national strength displayed in the Civil War. The enduring valor, the sacrifice for an idea, both of North and South; the tenacity of the whole people, and the ready acceptance of the result were, one and all, arguments that are finalities to practical men of Anglo-Saxon origin." Probably the extraordinary development of material prosperity has had as much to do with the more respectful attitude of foreign nations as any recognition of war prowess. Nor may we ignore the fact that the United States have been the largest field of foreign investment for surplus European capital. This has surely wrought a silent change of sentiment, for where the treasure is there is the heart also.

Upon America herself the change has worked wonders: the uneasy blend of susceptibility and arrogance characteristic of the nouveau riche has passed into a more sober dignity which cancels the meaning of much of the older caricatures. The old extravagances of speech and manner which Dickens and Mrs. Trollope ridiculed, and which were commonly charged against democracy, have given place to a general level of personal demeanor higher than that to be found in any European country. As Mr. Bryce well says: "Americans have gained more than they have lost by equality. I do not think that the upper class loses in grace, I am sure that the humbler class gains in independence. The manners of the 'best people' are exactly those of England, with a thought more of consideration towards inferiors and of frankness towards equals. Among the masses there is, generally speaking, as much real courtesy and good nature as anywhere else in the world."

Some of these truths now strike in upon the casual tourist after he has passed through two stages in his career—first, the stage of particularist criticism in which the insolence of the hotel clerk and the car conductor stand out conspicuous; secondly, the stage of wholesale swift generalisation, equally fallacious and more irrelevant. Fortunately, the last two decades have furnished many competent and a few profound appreciations of America from men of various nationalities, to supplement, sometimes to correct or modify, the fully informed but too indeterminate judgments of Mr. Bryce. In the masterly studies of such men as Münsterberg, de Rousier, Ostrogorski, and the forcible, quick penetration of M. Blouet and Mr. Wells, real work is done towards the interpretation of America not only to others, but to herself. Older critics chiefly discovered the defects of her democracy, and though some of the older crudities have vanished, enough still remains to make it easy for malice to draw up an indictment against a people on the score of government. "The Americans sit lightly by their arrangements" is the illuminating phrase of Matthew Arnold, and Americans are always ready to pour into the voracious visitor facts and figures of "graft," "lynching," undetected homicide, enormities of trusts, railroads, new religions, and quack remedies enough to damn the sanity of any civilised society.

But the more sober judgment of serious students of America has veered round to the view that what seems to casual visitors the crazy optimism of Americans is not so crazy as it seems. It is not a mere matter of luck that "America is always going to the devil, but never gets there." The strength of the nation is seen to lie in the abounding general vitality of her citizens, and this vitality is rooted, as de Tocqueville had the genius to recognise, in the personal dignity of manhood and womanhood which democratic institutions alone can afford. From this vitality proceed the self-reliance and the hopefulness which distinguish the "common people" of America from those of any European country, and the facile, all-pervasive humor which is at once philosophy and entertainment. The intrusive curiosity, which called forth the derisive indignation of the early literary discoverers, is shaping towards an ordered intelligence destined to furnish the largest volume of co-operative intellectual power ever devoted to the furtherance of knowledge. Last, and greatest, democracy in America yields a freer diffusion of personal goodwill, an easier comradeship, a more genuine spirit of sociality, than any other nation has possessed. These are mighty moral assets for civilisation, and the great issue which occupies the mind of watchers from Europe is whether they will enable America to maintain her great experiment against the new gathering of plutocratic forces threatening the Union by a lateral and not, as fifty years ago, by a horizontal cleavage.

---

THE ONE SUNRISE.

The one sunrise of the year is that of the true Easter morning—that is, the day, which cannot always be a Sunday, when the spring moon is at the full. But nineteen years out of twenty that sunrise does not, as it were, take place, our spring climate being safely expected to produce such clouds as to flout the moon and make a dull smudge of the red eye of dawn. So this year's Easter gave the one sunrise of many years; such a one as we cannot expect to see for at least another decade. Many a midsummer levée has been more chilly and more disappointing—in fact, none that we remember has been so cheerful or splendid as this that ushered in one of the earliest days of spring.

At three, the full moon is riding unchallenged in the sky. This astonishing April produces not a single cloud to blur her reign, no cold shower to make us regret an early rising, scarcely any dew or mist in the deepest hollows. The moon is over our left shoulder, and we walk towards the dawn. The shadow flung on the white road seems as bright as that of day, but the grass at the roadside, the walls, the rolling banks and hills, even the trees against the sky yield no details in the light that comes only at second-hand from the sun. It is just a landscape most faintly adumbrated in ochreous smudges or tawny negative lines on a general grey of nothingness. Presently, as we march steadily eastward, one hill looms up darker than the others. It is behind that hill that the sun must be. On another morning we should take it for the black cloud that so often enviously accompanies an English dawn, but there are to be no clouds to-day. Presently the trees on its summit appear, with tiny rounded tops, and the morning sky showing between their outflanking trunks.

The sky at the zenith is of that indefinite, evasive blue with which sometimes very artistic jewellers display their diamonds. They copied it, of course, as best they could, from the midnight sky in which the stars shine. But the morning sky is altogether an elusive color. It is all the colors of an opal, without the opal's liveliness of change, but yet seeming to change invisibly as we look at any part of it. At first sight, it is of a pink flush—no, it is cerulescent; nay, pea-green shrouded in French grey. Or it is the blue of blue eyes veined with fire, provided always that you cannot see the veins, or that they come and go like a perfectly visionary network. The old painters of stained-glass windows did the best they could by doing their skies in a design of flowers, and no painter since has got nearer the mystery than that.

On the opal eastern sky is drawn with exquisite softness but complete fidelity to detail the complicated tracery of the trees. The rambling, upright twigs, with catkins on them that seem at almost any distance as woolly as they are; the weeping besoms of the wych elm; the sturdy, strenuous oak, softened, like all the others, by the buds at the end of every twig. Then here is a stronger picture in evergreen. Two or three Scotch pines, one with thick ivy on its stem. The smooth sky is behind them, shimmering from palest blue to greyest pink, getting through occasional glimpses in the foliage and making it all a fathomless black, in which we imagine we can see a tinge of green—because our daylight experience has told us that it is green.

Up to now the sepia pictures of the elms on "the Bowl of Night" have been strictly silhouettes. We have been moving in a two-dimensional world. Suddenly an ash comes overhead at the turn of the road. The young light gleams round its limbs from back to front, and makes a revelation as astonishing as though the fourth dimension, which no philosopher really believes in, had been brought to common notice. The tawny flush behind the black hill has a rosier centre, so that we can tell, as it were, within a yard where the sun will break out. Now the cocks crow up a new day, and the melancholy owls proclaim a dying night. Then would the cuckoo join in, but the day of his arrival is not yet. As we climb the hill to a quaint old steepled town, the bells send down the chimes of five o'clock. Their thin, wiry music could not have been better contrived for this Easter morning fight between Sut and Horus. Everyone knows, of course, that victory is a foregone conclusion. "Old Khayyam" is all in the air, so let us have a verse of him:—

> "Indeed, indeed, Repentance oft before
> I swore—but was I sober when I swore?
> And then and then came Spring, and Rose-in-hand
> My thread-bare Penitence a-pieces tore."

It is dusky blackbirds that sing this on every hand—dozens of them each singing a song of bitter rivalry, but blending into a chorus of great sweetness. There is one blacker than black in the black hedge, within reach of a stick, if we cared to swing it, pouring out the music for which in daytime the thrush often gets undeserved credit. There is another, duskier than dusk, on the dusky road, running across head down to fly after one whose song for some reason has surpassed the bounds of endurance. There are two tumbling one over the other in most unchoristerlike fight. In the little town blackbirds are taking advantage of its desertion by crossing and recrossing the little street at their own sweet will. The moon, still shining behind us, makes the windows gleam, but it cannot throw a shadow on the road. The robin on the west side of the town (the moon's side) winds his rattle as he does at dusk; but on the eastern side, where more is to be seen of the sun than of the moon, the thrush adds his cheerier music to the sad fluting of the blackbirds.

Now the moon seems no longer a heavenly luminary. It is part of the earth, a disk raised on high (but not so very high) to heliograph news of the sun's coming. The hill to the town has raised us above the sun. He is down there, still behind the same hill, but held in a gulf beneath our feet. And here is a phenomenon we had certainly not expected. Though the sun is still well out of sight, we can feel his warmth on the face as surely as if it were a fire within a few yards. It is like a hot wind coming from the east—the quarter that usually blows us chilly ones. It wafts up from the valley in puffs, but that is because we are walking eastwards, and the wind is of our own creation. Standing still, the warmth of that quarter can still be felt, but not so distinctly as when we walk. Then, in the bright red patch behind the hill there rises an edge of glowing tinsel, and slowly the sun comes out from the night like a globe of molten iron. When he is clear we swing so as to get him well within the corner of the left eye, and we have the moon still faintly luminous within sight of the right. Not a cloud visible in the whole firmament—a clear course for the Easter sun to run from one horizon to the other.

And later, from one pleasure resort after another comes the news of thirteen hours' sunshine. Good, warming sunshine it is, too, as we can testify. When we had walked some two miles further we came out from a wood to the corner of a hill that the sun was just gilding. It was half-past six in the morning, but the invitation of the moss just there was so very inviting that we stretched our limbs upon it and slept as safely and as happily as on a midsummer afternoon.

Present-Day Problems.

ORGANISED LABOR AND PRACTICAL POLITICS.—I.

We all know that the Socialist movement has been growing in bulk during recent years. It has also been growing in organisation and in a certain capacity for political action. In these circumstances, the question every day becomes more urgent and important, does the movement show a corresponding growth in wisdom?

We may, I believe, cherish the hope that it is outgrowing its Utopian and too revolutionary youth, and that it is now settling down to the serious business of life. There are many promising signs that it is actually doing so. But our chief ground of hope lies in the fact that the prevalent conditions are generally such as to encourage or compel a more practical policy than has hitherto been pursued.

Socialism may now, on the whole, be regarded as the creed of organised labor. But in becoming the creed of organised labor it is bound to undergo a vital change both in nature and policy. Labor is at every point in touch with reality. In its anxious quest of daily bread for wife and children, labor cannot well afford to pursue wild, crude, and fantastic policies. If it venture on them for a time, the penalties are swift and terrible. Socialism can continue to be the creed of organised labor only by steadily adapting itself to the realities of life.

For labor we must all have the fullest measure of respect and sympathy. We know, or should know, the low estate from which it began to rise on the Continent about sixty years ago. Before that time it was without voice, organisation, or leaders. It could hardly be said to have a conscious mind of its own. There was but little of light or hope or guidance in the worker's life, which was an unceasing round of privation and drudgery from the cradle to the grave.

Little wonder that labor in the early stages of its progress made so many blunders, and was so often led astray by doubtful and incompetent guides. We should remember that for all men and institutions wisdom is the tardy fruit of time and of hard experience. Even the British Parliament, after six centuries of a very chequered experience, is not perfect, and has been known to make mistakes!

The history of labor for sixty years has been what any reasonable man would expect—a record of trial and error, of experiment and failure. But it is also a record of ever-increasing success. After many a stumble, the young giant is able to walk and to find his way about in a perplexing world. Every country in the civilised world now has its Labor or Socialist party. These parties are not seldom disturbed by controversy, and even by fierce quarrel and division; but they are also marked by a rare spirit of comradeship, of voluntary discipline and self-sacrifice. And these national parties have within the last few years combined to revive the International in what appears to be a solid and durable form. The Stuttgart Congress of 1907, where 886 delegates gathered from twenty-six nationalities, may be regarded as the successful completion of this world-wide organisation of labor. It has a permanent Bureau at Brussels, and now represents about ten million workers. Four countries alone—Germany, Austria, France, and Great Britain—have nearly seven million voters affiliated to the new International.

It is a new thing in the world's history, the result of a long and strenuous process of organisation, by which the backward, ill-informed, and turbulent democracy of labor has been shaped into a real unity. We may be assured that no little exercise of tact, patience, and practical insight has been required to achieve such a result.

But the Labor and Socialist parties have not been content with organising. They have formulated a system of principles and policy for their great army of adherents. In the programmes of the various national parties and in the resolutions passed at the International Congresses we have an exposition of their convictions, in which the ultra-revolutionary element finds very little room. They contain nothing adverse to marriage and the family, to religion, or to a reasonable and legitimate patriotism. They make no appeal to violence, but insist much on the need to train and organise the workers with a view to the peaceful conquest of political power by Parliamentary action. While collectivism continues to be the goal of the whole movement, it is by their policy and course of action postponed to a remote and doubtful future. Alike in organisation and in the formulating of its creed, Socialism shows increasing fitness for real tasks.

As we have already said, organised labor has a history of six decades and the British Parliament a history of six centuries. Labor need not fear a comparison with the older institution. It has attained to a real organisation of the workers of the world. It has leaders of capacity, of proved integrity, to speak for it in the councils of Europe. It has principles and policies, which, though still in many respects narrow and short-sighted, have become more practical and reasonable. We may confidently expect that this progress will continue.

The Socialist parties recognise that their great task at present is to educate, to train and organise the labor of the world. They see particularly that the thing most needful is to counteract and overcome the militarism which is a constant menace to civilisation and to progress. With their numbers, organisation, and their unequalled means of propaganda in Europe, they should be able to do something effectual to stay the plague. And if in the execution of this supreme and imperative task they find it necessary to reconsider some points of their policy, it will be well. Nothing can be clearer than the fact that for many years the reaction has been strong in Europe, not through its own strength, but through the mistakes of the democracy. There has been a fatal want both of union and of insight among the forces of progress. By refusing to co-operate with other democratic forces Socialism only perpetuates division and weakness.

If anything can do it, this question of militarism should make the situation clear. Every day that passes shows that militarism is the chief obstacle to social progress. The most hidebound Socialist should see that in this matter at least, multitudes of men of good will belonging to other parties are thoroughly in earnest. Yet under the present circumstances of dissension little or nothing can be accomplished. Without Labor no progressive party can do much. Organised Labor without the help of the other democratic forces can do still less.

The Labor Party of Great Britain constitutes only about one-twentieth of the House of Commons. In the French Chamber the Unified Socialist Party is about one-eleventh of the whole. The Socialist Party in Italy, even with its recently augmented numbers, is only one-twelfth. The Social Democratic Party of Germany forms one-ninth of the Reichstag, that of Austria makes one-sixth of the Reichsrath. Nor is there any reasonable prospect of much real alteration in the balance of parties. It is probable that the period of rapid expansion which has gone forward among the town workers has come to an end. None of the parties has been able to draw up an agrarian programme acceptable to the rural workers. At every point the progress of organised Labor is hindered by the narrowness and abstractness of the creed which it has adopted. May we not reasonably expect that when the parties find that, in the supreme question of militarism, as in other questions, their power to do any real good is so fatally weakened by an abstract creed and a narrow policy, they will be compelled to revise them both?

Of all the national parties the Belgian may now be regarded as foremost in the effort to carry out a practical and constructive policy worthy of organised Labor. In Belgium there has been a great awakening from the state of ignorance, privation, and degradation by which the workers had been oppressed for so many generations. Under the leadership of Vandervelde the party has pursued a thoroughly enlightened political course. The Vooruit Society at Ghent has, under the guidance of Anseele, been a pioneer in a progressive and highly promising form of civic co-operation, which has been a model for similar enterprises, not only in Belgium, but in the neighboring regions of France, Germany, and Holland. It is the crowning merit of the Vooruit to show in a practical way what the city of the future may become under wise and beneficent leading. In Belgium trade unions and co-operative societies work in harmony with the Socialist Party, and under their auspices organised Labor has become a practical and progressive movement, which is capable of indefinite expansion.

T. Kirkup.

(To be continued.)

Communications.

THE DECLARATION OF LONDON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—On March 23rd I sent to the "Times" the first of the two accompanying letters. On March 24th the editor forwarded to me a notification that he hoped to publish it "at an early date." From that day to this it has not appeared. On April 4th I sent the second letter, and that, too, has not appeared. It is curious that, while my communications are boycotted, others on the same subject have been admitted. Can the explanation be that I have defended the Declaration and praised highly the tact and skill of those who are responsible for it, while the tone of the other letters has been on the whole critical?—Yours, &c.,

T. J. Lawrence.

Upton Lovel Rectory, Wilts,
April 10th, 1909.

[We need not say that Mr. Lawrence is a leading English authority on international law.—Ed., Nation.]

To the Editor of the "Times."

Sir,—The Declaration of London is the most important document ever given to the world on the subject of capture at sea in time of war. It marks an epoch in the history of International Law. Not only statesmen and jurists, but all who are interested in the safety of neutral commerce, and the application of just and humane principles to the terrible business of warfare, owe a deep debt of gratitude to those who have taken part in the production of such a magnificent monument of mental and moral virility.

A large share of the credit of this great achievement is due to our own Foreign Office and our delegation at the Naval Conference. Nor must those who represented this country at the Hague Conference of 1907 be forgotten; for a good part of the work so successfully accomplished during the last few months is based on labor of theirs which at the time led to no favorable results. In the chequered history of our country's conduct with regard to naval warfare and the rules which govern it, the page just completed will stand out as the brightest. Great Britain proposed the Conference, the British Plenipotentiary presided over it with great tact and distinguished ability. It is no secret that the Foreign Office and the British representatives prepared for it through long months of strenuous toil, by careful study, by numerous private discussions, by obtaining from the Powers who were to be represented preliminary statements of their views, and by carefully comparing these memoranda and basing upon them draft articles. No more thorough piece of work has been done in the whole course of diplomatic negotiation. It forms a most welcome contrast to the haphazard preliminary arrangements of the two Hague Conferences; and its success furnishes a convincing argument in favor of those preparatory measures, in anticipation of a third, which were recommended in the Acte Final of the second.

But while we may justly take pride in the initiative of our own country, we must not forget that without the hearty co-operation of the other Powers concerned the great results achieved would have been impossible. Many difficulties arose. If report speaks truly, the Conference was on the point of breaking up more than once. Tact, patience, and an ever-present willingness to make mutual concessions, were forthcoming in abundance, and by their means disaster was averted. Where all co-operated in a spirit of amity, it is invidious to mention names; but the general observation may be permitted that the excellence of the final result is largely due to the happy combination of legal learning and practical experience which was so conspicuous in the various delegations. When world-wide jurists and distinguished admirals sat side by side in earnest conclave, we cannot suppose that either legal principles or warlike exigencies were overlooked. The result shows that they can be harmonised, if only the right people are set to do the work, and the Governments who send them are sincerely desirous of having it done.

We need not fear that the particular interests of this country were forgotten in the desire to secure a general settlement. We gave, it is true; but we also received. The net result is that we came out of the Conference in a better legal position than we went into it. To prove this proposition in detail would require a treatise rather than a letter. To give such support to it as is possible after a first perusal of the documents, would require a far longer communication than I can venture to intrude on the generous hospitality of your columns. I will therefore confine myself to a request for as much space as is necessary for the few following remarks.

As to blockade, we have secured the abandonment of the doctrine hitherto held by a large group of powerful States that a vessel approaching the blockaded area for the first time is entitled to a warning from a ship of the blockading force, whether or no she had previous knowledge of the existence of the blockade, and cannot be captured till she makes a further attempt to enter. In return for this we have abandoned our own doctrine that a neutral ship is liable to capture from the moment she leaves neutral waters with intent to run a known blockade, and remains liable till the termination of her return voyage. For this is substituted a liability within the rayon d'action of the blockading force, an area which will vary with the number, size, and speed of the vessels detailed for the service in question, but which it is well understood may in certain cases extend to a distance of several hundred miles from the port or ports under closure. An examination of recorded cases reveals the fact that in the past we have very rarely made seizures for breach of blockade outside such a region. The restriction to which we have now assented corresponds to our previous practice, if not to our previous theory.

As to contraband, the great point gained is that supplies of food brought in neutral vessels to the commercial ports of a belligerent country are rendered as safe from capture as International Law can make them. Hitherto a Power at war with England might have found plausible reasons for seizing, let us say, neutral American vessels on their way to Liverpool with cargoes of wheat or tinned meat. In future this cannot be done without a gross and palpable breach of undoubted law. I do not say law will never be broken; but it is certain that any maritime nation with an assured position in the Society of Nations—and we need not trouble about any others—will think long and much before dishonoring its own signature, being branded as a defiant law-breaker before all the world by the International Prize Court, and risking the almost certain hostility of neutrals, whose lucrative trade is cut off by its action. Similar considerations apply to raw material. Almost all that we need for our manufactures has been placed on the list of articles that can never under any circumstances be declared contraband.

The one complete failure of the Conference was its inability to agree as to the conversion of merchantmen into warships, or warships into merchantmen on the high seas in time of war. We hold very strongly that such a change in the character of a vessel is illegal, unless it takes place in a port of its own country, and we should probably be willing to add, as does Japan, a port of its ally, or of a district under its military occupation. A strong group of Powers insist on freedom of conversion anywhere except in neutral waters, and argue that it is already given by International Law. Some of them go further, and claim a right to reconvert the converted warship into a merchantman. Accepted principles can be quoted on either side; but there is no uniform practice of States from which a rule can be drawn. I believe we may go further and say there are no precedents. The British view is certainly the more favorable to neutrals; and as such we may hope it will be adopted by the International Prize Court, to which the question will in all probability be left.

We need, I venture to suggest, have no hesitation in ratifying the Hague Convention for the establishment of such a Court, now that an excellent, if in some respects incomplete, set of rules has been agreed to for its guidance. It is quite true that it will not at first possess coercive authority, though the evolution of international justice has been so rapid of late that possibly it may find an adequate force at its disposal in the not distant future. But experience shows that States do respect rules to which they have given express consent, and the awards of tribunals which they have created for the purpose of deciding international controversies. —I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

T. J. LAWRENCE.

Upton Lovel Rectory, Wilts.
March 23rd, 1909.

---

II.

To the Editor of the "Times."

SIR,—The question raised in your Political Notes as to the proper interpretation of Articles 33 and 34 of the Declaration of London is most important. The first business of Great Britain in such a connection is to safeguard her food supplies as far as legal rules can do so. Our representatives at the recent Naval Conference believed that they had accomplished this object. Allow me to set forth briefly some of the reasons why I venture to think they were successful.

For a long time past we have maintained that provisions were conditionally and not absolutely contraband. This view has now triumphed. "Foodstuffs" stand at the head of the list of conditional contraband in Article 24 of the Declaration.

By conditional contraband is meant articles which are "susceptible of use in war as well as for purposes of peace"; and Article 33 defines the circumstances in which they are contraband. These are destined for the use of

(1) The armed forces of the enemy.

(2) A Government Department of the enemy.

Then arises the question how these destinations are to be proved. To help in answering it Article 34 lays down certain rules. The forbidden destinations are to be presumed if the goods are consigned to (a) Enemy authorities.

(b) A contractor (commerçant) established in the enemy country who, as a matter of common knowledge, supplies articles of the kind to the enemy (à l'ennemi).

(c) A fortified place belonging to the enemy.

(d) A place which serves as a base for the armed forces of the enemy.

I submit that the word enemy in clause (b) means the enemy State or Government, l'Etat ennemi of Article 33, as it does clearly in Article 31, where we read of import de l'ennemi. To understand by it the ordinary civilian population of the enemy country would do violence to the structure of the Article, and introduce a sharp contrast into what is obviously intended for a symmetrical and balanced statement.

Presumption and proof are very different things. What has to be proved is destination "for the use of the armed forces or of a Government Department of the enemy State." The consignment to a contractor who is notoriously engaged in supplying the enemy raises a presumption of such destination. But it is a presumption which may be challenged and disproved, as is shown by the last sentence of Article 34, which runs: "The presumptions set up by this Article may be rebutted."

Assuming that we were at war, and the United States was neutral, the consignment in an American ship of a cargo of provisions to a merchant who lived in England and was known to have constant transactions with the British Government would afford a strong presumption that the foodstuffs in question were on their way to the mess tables of our fighting forces. But if they were consigned to the keeper of a big provision store in Liverpool or Birmingham, the presumption of warlike use would be miserably weak. Why then mention it at all in a great maritime code? I cannot believe that it was mentioned. It is clear that the Conference had no intention of doing anything of the kind. The Report of the Drafting Committee, drawn up by M. Renault, and accepted by all his colleagues, is decisive on this point. It speaks of le fournisseur notoire du gouvernment ennemi pour les articles dont il s'agit, thus using a phrase which covers the first set of circumstances supposed above and excludes the second. Is it possible to imagine that, when two such skilled jurists and experienced draftsmen as MM. Renault and Fromageot drew up the Articles, not only did they fail to express themselves clearly in their mother tongue, but all their experienced colleagues failed to notice the failure?—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

T J. LAWRENCE.

Upton Lovel Rectory, Wilts.
April 4th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

THE BUDGET AND THE SINKING FUND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of May 16th, 1908, you kindly allowed me to make some comments upon the broad hint which had been given by Mr. Asquith in his Budget speech, then just delivered, that the next Budget, i.e., that which is now approaching, would witness a raid upon the Sinking Fund.

I then pointed out that Mr. Asquith's estimates of revenue were too large, and that "we must expect bad revenue figures."

I added:—

> "One thing may save us—the income tax, that incomparable instrument, which is still used so clumsily, and which the Government blindly refuse to use wisely."

As I need hardly say, the prophecy which I ventured to make has been entirely realised. Apart from the Income Tax, there is a revenue deficit of £2,500,000, but £1,000,000 of this has been made up by an under-estimation of the yield of income tax as curious and significant in its way as the over-estimation of the yield of other taxes. Even so, we are left with a revenue deficit of £1,500,000.

But my main purpose is to refer to the proposed raid on the Sinking Fund in time of peace. In hinting at it, Mr. Asquith said that the Government would not be justified in continuing to call upon taxpayers for "£14,000,000 or £15,000,000 a year" to pay off debt. These figures must have been named without sufficient thought. It is perfectly true that in the first three years of the Government's existence some £14,000,000 a year was paid off debt, but the payment was not wholly premeditated. The intended payment off debt was simply what Mr. Austen Chamberlain left it at, i.e., £9,000,000 to £10,000,000 a year. The additional millions arose chiefly from under-estimation of revenue. In the year just closed, there is no "£14,000,000 or £15,000,000." On the contrary, revenue was over-estimated, and for 1908-9 a balance of revenue over expenditure (the Old Sinking Fund) does not exist. There is only Mr. Austen Chamberlain's new Sinking Fund provision, i.e., the £9,785,000 left after providing £18,215,000 for interest out of Mr. Austen Chamberlain's fixed appropriation of £28,000,000 a year for National Debt Services.

The serious question for Mr. Lloyd George and the nation is this: Is £9,000,000 to £10,000,000 a year too much for Britain to provide as a Sinking Fund? The answer is to be found in the following figures:—

British National Debt.

| | |
|---|---|
| 1889 ... ... ... ... | £698,000,000 |
| 1899 ... ... ... ... | £628,000,000 |
| 1909 ... ... ... ... | £696,000,000 |

At the present time, in spite of recent debt repayments, intended and unintended, the National Debt is nearly £70,000,000 higher than it was at the time of the outbreak of the Boer War. In such circumstances, for a Government, while building either four or eight "Dreadnoughts," to reduce Mr. Austen Chamberlain's fixed appropriation would amount to a grave dereliction of duty. When, in 1899, a Unionist Tory Chancellor of the Exchequer raided the Sinking Fund in time of peace, Liberal writers, amongst whom I was counted, gravely criticised him. I remember writing: "We know not how soon our financial strength may be sorely tried." That was written when the National Debt was only £628,000,000. Now that the debt is nearly £700,000,000 I again write, "We know not how soon our financial strength may be sorely tried." And since, through the childish traditions which surround British Budget making, we are not allowed to say these things in advance in the House of Commons, I beg leave to say in your columns that the Government has no right to do in 1909 what Mr. Asquith hinted at in 1908. It is no answer to refer to our financial purity in the matter of not borrowing for works. Our claims on that head will look a trifle ridiculous if it is contended that an annual Sinking Fund of only £10,000,000 is too much in respect of a National Debt of £700,000,000—a debt which, I may pertinently add, is sheer debt, inasmuch as we have practically no State assets such as those of the German States.—Yours, &c.,

L. G. Chiozza Money.

Chaldon, Surrey,
April 13th, 1909.

THE FIGHTING VALUE OF "DREADNOUGHTS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Despite your Yorkshire correspondent's statement to the contrary, there is nothing in Captain Seminoff's book to prove that the "Oslyabya" was sunk in consequence of penetration of her armor. Even if it were the case, I might safely give way in this particular instance, as there are so many other proofs in the book, and other circumstances outside it which, for the present, I need not go into, to support my contention that the penetration of armor is not necessary for the disablement or destruction of existing war vessels; and that, if it is not necessary, monster guns and their heavy, complicated, and easily disabled machinery can advantageously be replaced by medium-sized, man-handled, quick-firing guns firing the "kind of aerial torpedo" so successfully used by the Japanese.

But let your readers form their own conclusions from Captain Seminoff's account to be found at page 158 of his book (published by Murray) as follows:—

> "Alongside of me I recognised an officer of the 'Oslyabya,' and asked him what had actually caused his ship to sink? Waving his arm in a helpless sort of way, and in a voice full of disgust, he jerked out: 'How? It's not very pleasant to remember. Absolutely no luck, that's what sunk her. Nothing but bad luck! They shot straight enough—but it wasn't shooting. It wasn't skill either. It was luck—infernal luck! Three shells, one after the other, almost in the same identical spot. Imagine it! All of them in the same place! All on the water line under the forward turret! Not a hole—but a regular gateway! Three of them penetrated her together. She almost heeled over at once—then settled under the water. A tremendous rush of water, and the partitions were naturally useless. The devil himself could not have done anything!' he hysterically exclaimed, and, covering his face with his hands, went on deck."

Now, under the circumstances of such a battle inexactitude of observation and expression is excusable and not improbable, and I submit that in his hysterical condition the officer's "All on the water line under the forward turret" may not have quite correctly stated the facts.

As much confusion exists in the minds of the public concerning the extent and disposition of armor, it may be useful to quote one of the greatest living authorities on the subject, viz., Sir W. H. White, who, when Chief Constructor of the Navy, on April 10th, 1889, in a paper read at the Institute of Naval Architects, said:—

> "As a matter of fact, armor protection goes to a moderate depth below water in all cases. Consequently, it is quite possible, and in fact quite common, for the lower edge of the armor to be emerged either by a very moderate inclination of the ship, or by her motion through still water, or by the movement of waves along her sides, or by her rolling in a sea way; as well as by many possible combinations of these circumstances. This emergency of the armor involves the exposure of the unprotected bottom, and chance shots entering below the armor may destroy the ship, and inevitably will cause damage that must be practically irremediable under the circumstances of action, and must result in the entry of large quantities of water into the vessel, even though she may be kept afloat by her watertight compartments."

The significance of this lies in the fact that in January, February, and March of the same year the War Office, the Treasury, and the Admiralty had been respectively informed that such a "kind of aerial torpedo," as was afterwards used by the Japanese, had been invented and was at the disposal of the Government under conditions of secrecy. The characteristics of (a) Non-penetration on striking above-water armor;

(b) Falling into the water close to the side of the ship;

(c) Explosion at a pre-determined depth against the under-water protected side;

(d) Automatic action of the fuse at any range, for ship-sinking and man-killing purposes, without adjustment for distance, as is necessary in all fuses timed from the discharge of the gun, were explained.

For these past twenty years it has been neglected by successive Governments—thanks, primarily, to our Admiralty unbusinesslike (to put it mildly) methods of dealing with inventions submitted by British unofficial, uninfluential inventors

Subjected to the same gunnery fire as that which destroyed the Russian Fleet in the Battle of Tsushima, the "Dreadnought" and her "improved" sisters would be similarly destroyed or disabled. Their above-water armored sides would, as above explained, be accessory to their speedy destruction, seeing that their under-water unprotected sides below the narrow armor belt cannot resist the explosive effect of a 6-in. common powder shell, much less a high explosive one fired from a man-handled, quick-hitting gun capable of "pouring" a stream of shells against the huge targets presented by "Dreadnought" monstrous frauds.

The statement that high explosive shells could not be used in the Japanese 6-in. guns is not in accordance with independent and trustworthy information I have received. They can be used in 6-in., and smaller, guns of other nations, and the eye-opening we have had in the Russo-Japanese war gives us good ground to conclude that in this vital matter the far-seeing, acquisitive, and assimilative Oriental is not going to be beaten by the Occidental.

Whether the big guns are to be immediately removed from our ships or not is not of such pressing importance as is the necessity for all armor-piercing projectiles to be relegated to the scrap heap and replaced by the "kind of aerial torpedo" which destroyed the Russian Fleet.

As you, sir, very truthfully said in your issue of March 27th, what is wanted is "the statesman" to grasp the true position and to act with promptitude, courage, and determination. The evidence and material are, or should be, ready to hand in the Admiralty and War Office pigeonholes. No amour propre of individuals or "vested interests" should be considered or allowed to obstruct his action, which can be taken without recourse to a packed Parliamentary Committee under Admiralty influence and auspices, as was the case in that of the Radio-Telegraphic Committee.—Yours, &c.,

C. E. Kelway.

110, Lancaster Street, S.E.
April 14th, 1909.

THE WAR CRAZE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—While thankful to you for your sane protests against the delirium of panic and falsehood prevailing on the subject of the Navy and our national security, I have often desired to hear more positive statements of possible alternatives to the policy, we, as Liberals, resist. Many are convinced that a great national peril is to be apprehended, say, from Germany; and whether they be right or wrong, they will not be satisfied by assertions that their fears are groundless, or with indefinite appeals to the patriotism or the pacific instincts of the democracy. The mere possibility of such a disaster as invasion demands adequate protective measures. Is there any alternative to the ruinous competition in armaments, which must, as Sir E. Grey admits, lead to the national bankruptcy of the Powers engaging in it?

I know of only one, and I am surprised it is not more firmly advocated. It is the Peace and Arbitration Conference at The Hague. Cordial and vigorous support of its principles and action by the leading Powers will, in time, make it the invincible arbiter of dispute; while half-hearted co-operation or distrust will render its efforts nugatory, as has happened of late, or, at least, disappointing.

The Hague need not be powerless against rulers' ambitions or caprice. Supposing one or two Powers stand aloof, surely an alliance of the peace-loving Powers would be strong enough to render their opposition futile; and granting that the final appeal must be to force, why should not the allied Powers maintain an international police force strong and highly equipped enough to enforce submission to the views of the civilised world in conference? However divided society is on many subjects, it everywhere agrees in maintaining the peace of the State, and the strong arm of the law is found sufficient to curb the unruly elements which exist in every community. May we not be confident that with the growth of civilisation and democracy the same, or analogous, measures may be generally approved to crush or restrain international bullies?

Public opinion must be developed; for, of course, it is on its strength and unanimity will depend the weight of any nation at The Hague. Why then not inaugurate a crusade of peace at once to exhibit the force of public opinion and to enlighten the masses as to the gravity of the present crisis? Let peace demonstrations be organised wherever the Imperial League holds its, now admittedly, party campaign, until the democracy of the empire is roused to declare its will that national animosities and ridiculous expenditure on a mad rivalry of arms, fostered for party purposes and personal aggrandisement must cease. —Yours, &c.,

FACTA NON VERBA.

April 13th, 1909.

[We quite agree with our correspondent; and we believe that the steps which he suggests are in contemplation.—ED., NATION.]

NON-RESISTANCE IN PRACTICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Last Tuesday I came upon a pony in a coster's cart jibbing. A man was at the pony's head lugging. The more he lugged, the more the pony resisted. It was Brute Force against Brute Force, and the pony, sitting comfortably back in its breeching, had the better of it. There was great expenditure of energy by both parties, and no result, except the generation of waste heat. I went up and said, "Let me try." The man stopped lugging; and at once the pony stopped resisting. I made much of him, talked to him, used him like the Christian he was. In half a minute he was rubbing his nose against my waistcoat. Then I said, "Come along, old man!" And he came.

Half an hour later, outside a newspaper shop, I saw a placard:—

Robert Blatchford on War with Germany.

I bought a copy of the "Clarion" to find its editor affirming loudly that Germany meant war, and that we must mean the same—Brute Force against Brute Force.

I walked home, pondering.—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED OLLIVANT.

Savile Club,
April 9th, 1909.

AN INDISCREET PLEA FOR INDISCRETIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I hope you will not deem me ungrateful for your kind review of "The M.P. for Russia" if I venture to say a word in defence of what you describe as "my abundant gift of indiscretion." Indiscretions in such a book are like raisins in a plum-pudding. So long as they do not give pain to any survivors the more indiscretions the better. I feel that "The M.P. for Russia" is chiefly open to criticism because the indiscretions are so few. But when the editor is subjected to the drastic sub-editing of the subject of his sketch, the most interesting and illuminating indiscretions have small chance of surviving the revision of the proofs.

You think, for instance, that it was indiscreet of me to quote the passage from my letter to "O. K." of March, 1878, written when there seemed every probability of an immediate outbreak of the war which Madame Novikoff and I regarded as the most useful of all calamities.

"How awful to think England—that is, myself—should meet with its death-blow from Russia—that is you, or vice versâ." According to you, this is hysteria, which, considering my "many gifts and services," I ought to "bury in the deepest oblivion." But why? I did not edit "The M.P. for Russia" to glorify myself, but to tell the truth. Granting that to most of my readers it appears hysteria, of which I ought to be ashamed, then it seems to me this is exactly one of those indiscretions which ought to be encouraged for the illumination they shed upon the motives of even the humblest actors in the historical dramas. As a matter of fact, I do not think it hysteria. Nor am I in the least ashamed of a remark which revealed so vividly the whole-souled fashion in which I identified myself with my country and Madame Novikoff with Russia. Those armies are surest of victory when every private in the ranks feels the fortune of the fight depends upon his own energy. But that is beside the question. I only wish to enter a plea in favor of indiscretions, and to support it by using as an illustration the very passage which you select as the supreme example of what ought not to have been printed.—Yours, &c.,

W. T. STEAD.

April 15th, 1909.

ADULT SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The belief seems to be spreading among women that we shall get nothing from the Liberals, and that our only hope is to wait till the Conservatives come in. They, it is supposed, may overrule any objection to women voters for the sake of the party advantage the limited suffrage would give to wealth. But is the prospect really so bad as this? Some of us do not think so. Mr. Howard's Bill and its support by Liberals like yourself ought to be the very occasion for a rally of adult Suffragists, both men and women, that our chances under a Liberal Government may not be lost for want of a little courage of a very mild kind. There are a great many adult Suffragists in the women's suffrage societies, and this is the moment for them to declare themselves. If they feel bound to the Limited Bill, let them support that, too. This would be a strictly non-party attitude, for the limited Bill is not in any way essential to the women's claim, and any Bill with women in it would remove the sex disability. Party neutrality ought to mean supporting all Bills.

Adult suffrage has not had a chance as yet, and anyone who has been at suffrage meetings in the country can easily see how the women's leaders have persuaded themselves that the limited suffrage is more popular. What happens is this: an able woman makes a very eloquent speech. She does not often now contrast the political rights of the rich lady and of her coachman and gardener—that would be out of date. She generally talks of working women, mothers without legal control over their children, sweated wives and daughters working at home, and factory girls living on six or seven shillings a week. At the end, when the audience is thoroughly interested and sympathetic, she mentions that she only wants a small number of women enfranchised, and that they are to have the vote on the terms now given to men. The audience, quite won over, gives a hearty vote of confidence to the terms proposed, just as it would to any other plausible qualifications. The vote, in fact, is for women's suffrage, and not for any particular form of it. I do not mean to suggest that there is any intention of deceit, but, in my experience, it is never explained that these classes of working women would not get the vote. The speakers do not go into details of qualification, and they are quite right. Such things are only to be spoken of in some dreary office behind a ground glass window. But if they decide not to explain the bearing of "the same terms as men" under the present law, it is impossible to put the resolutions of their meetings to the credit of a Bill largely inconsistent with their arguments and open to serious objections which require technical explanation.

The societies are doing splendid work. What we want in addition is a push towards the best opening that offers at present. Adult suffrage has never been put to the electors on its merits. They have not been shown the honesty of "one man, one vote; one woman, one vote." Nobody has had the liberality to tell them that anything else is the work of the old spirit of discrimination, which finds it quite easy to say who is deserving and who is undeserving, money being in this case the almost inevitable test of desert. They have not heard of the obvious reasons of political purity and simplicity. If they are told of adult suffrage at all, it is in such colored phrases as "revolution" or "upsetting the whole basis of the electoral law," as if the new electors, including women, would be a race of degenerates and criminals, not merely the same ordinary mixed British people we know already. Adult suffrage is not a revolution in other countries, and we are not a revolutionary people. But it would certainly put a new feeling into politics. To bring in the poorest and most dependent would give some confidence to people who have hitherto been able to think of the State only vaguely as a far-away and, naturally, hostile power. To ladies a policeman is a polite and competent friend at crossings; but if one is a poor woman with dirty old clothes, one feels quite differently towards him. One is not at all inclined to ask him anything; one would rather not be seen by him nor hear his loud and decided voice. He is not there to help, but to compel. That is how poor and rough people are apt to think of all authority, and with reason. The vote and the greater consideration that goes with it must do much to take away this reproach of governments. Government ought not to be for the good of nice people, but for everybody; and if any man or woman who is not quite deserving is going to be liable to be sent to a penal settlement, the rights of citizenship for all will be more necessary than ever.—Yours, &c.,

R. Nash.

42, Well Walk, Hampstead,
April 14th, 1909.

LONDON UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Professor Lake's letter asks me two questions which I cannot answer, but as they are both irrelevant to the point at issue, that does not matter very much.

With regard to his first question, I do not know enough about Holland to give a decided opinion, but I should certainly imagine the young Dutchmen are much better educated than the youth of England. But to suppose that this difference is due to their not being examined by independent examiners is an instance of a well-known fallacy.

With regard to the second question, I am not aware what the Dutch people think on the subject, and accordingly do not know why they think it. But I am very far from supposing that the desire of the professors and teachers to avoid independent examinations is due to "childish simplicity." Their motive, it seems to me, is to prevent the deficiencies of their own teaching becoming evident.

The London University has, as an independent examining board, had a very beneficial effect on education in this country, and its work need not be disparaged, and must not be interfered with. Professors and teachers who want to pat their pupils on the back can find opportunities of indulging in that agreeable exercise without laying violent hands on an institution which has done such an immense amount of good.—Yours, &c.,

R. Shindler.

National Liberal Club,
Whitehall Place, S.W.
April 13th, 1909.

"THE WORKER-STUDENT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have read with interest your article on "The Worker-Student." But I should like to protest against one expression on which I think a good deal turns. You speak of my father's conception of the Working Men's College as a dream which is only now being practically realised by Ruskin College. The ideal which my father and his friends set before themselves has (some of us think) received very practical realisation in the lives of those who have passed through the College founded in 1854; and in the spirit of social friendliness and intellectual interest which still exists in that College.

But I must add that his ideal was, on very important points, different from the ideal aimed at, as I understand them, by the leaders of Ruskin College, and rather wider even than the aim which you attribute to him. It was not merely to call attention to the affinity of "those who care for things of the mind," but to show how the "more humane" culture (he delighted to translate the Latin into the more suggestive English equivalent) may fit Englishmen for all their duties as citizens.

Most assuredly he would have sympathised with any protest which the Ruskinians may make against the desire to treat education as a means of drawing them away from their class, or of leading them to despise any honest occupation. But he saw what they seem to overlook, that the artisan may become just as narrow (aye, and just as arrogant) if he shuts himself up in his class and treats that as something higher than English citizenship, as the middle-class professional has ever been. Surely we want to merge classes one into another, to produce the complete citizen, not to set them further apart, and in greater antagonism to each other.

I quite admit that the dangers against which the Ruskinians wish to protect themselves are more pressing in the special conditions of Oxford than in the more varied and, in some senses, more democratic life of London. But, on the other hand, there are traditions and influences in Oxford which, if rightly guided, ought to be more humanising than any that London can supply. The work which T. H. Green and others tried to accomplish, in bringing municipal Oxford nearer to academic Oxford, has, I trust, not proved quite a failure; and a small town, with a clean history of its own, ought to be able to contribute something towards that idea of common citizenship into which men of all classes need to be educated.—Yours, &c.,

C. E. Maurice.

Eirene Cottage, Gainsborough Gardens,
Hampstead,
April 13th, 1909.

ROBERTSON OF BRIGHTON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I was astonished in reading the very remarkable review in this week's Nation, entitled "Religious Thought in the Nineteenth Century," to find that it did not mention F. W. Robertson of Brighton among the Liberal teachers who have influenced the nineteenth century. If F. W. Robertson did not enter officially into any party in the Church he was, nevertheless, one of the most noble pioneers of the Liberal movement. His theology was pervaded with the new spirit, and, in particular, his ideas on the Atonement were quite unorthodox for his time. It was he who called the judicial orthodox theory of the Atonement "this Shylock-like affair with the scales and weights."

May I extract also a few very significant words from another of his letters (See Stopford Brooke's "Life of Robertson, p. 427, Library edition):—

"Spirit is eternal, Form is transient; and when men stereotype the form and call it perpetual or deny that under other and very different forms the self-same truths may lie, then I feel repelled at once, whether the form be a form of words or a form of observance." Further in the same very fine letter he adds: "It is really time, after eighteen centuries, that we should get some better conception than we have of what Christianity is . . . . to understand the Life and Spirit of Christ appears to me to be the only remedy; but we have doctrines about Christ, instead of Christ, and we call the bad metaphysics of evangelicalism 'the Gospel,' and the temporary transient forms of tractarianism 'the Church.'"

Robertson was a thoroughly independent man and the best proof that he was in advance of his times is that he was bitterly attacked on acount of his views. This did not prevent him, of course, from having a great influence, and he quite deserves to be ranked among the pioneers of religious progress.—Yours, &c.,

A. de Bavier.

April 12th, 1909.

SIR GEORGE CLARKE'S DAUGHTER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—An Indian friend of mine—a highly educated official in a native state—has lately sent me in a private letter the following tribute to the memory of Miss Clarke, daughter of the Governor of Bombay. From what I saw and heard in India last year, I know that his words about her loss must be true, and I think they will be of interest to your readers on many grounds:—

> "You cannot imagine," he writes, "how deep and real is the sorrow of my countrymen for the death of Miss Clarke. Even the reform scheme is for the moment forgotten under the shadow of this calamity. Poor Sir George! He has done his best for us, and the gods are hurling their thunders at him,

No European lady was so beloved as Miss Clarke within the memory of the oldest of us. Certainly she was the greatest ambassador ever sent by England to India and did much as a peacemaker at a particularly bad crisis. She disproved Kiplingism, and brought East and West together.

"I don't expect her good work will be continued after her. So much depends on personality, and so little on principle in the chequered life of this country. Everyone, even here in this distant province, has a word of praise and gratitude for one who was truly a ministering angel to our community. She caused ideas of self-respect and dignity to be planted in us more deeply and widely than before. Though I did not know her, I feel as though I had lost a relative near and dear to me. It would be a calamity if Sir George resigns, as they say he will."

Does not this letter show that what is needed in our relation to India is not so much this reform or that reform, but what I have sometimes called "a change of heart"?—Yours, &c.,

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

4, Downside Crescent, Hampstead, N.W.
April 14th, 1909.

RESISTANCE TO PANIC.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is a chapter in Morley's "Life of Gladstone," entitled the "Battle for Economy," dealing with the affairs of 1860-1862, which would surely be very salutary reading at this moment, and there is one passage in it which I think has such an especial bearing upon the present controversy that you will, perhaps, allow me to recall it:—

"We have no adequate idea of the predisposing power which an immense series of measures of preparation for war on our own part, have in actually begetting war. They familiarise ideas which when familiar lose their horror, and they light an inward flame of excitement of which, when it is habitually fed, we lose the consciousness."

—Yours, &c.,

CHARLTON WILKINSON.

6, Grosvenor Place, Newcastle-on-Tyne,
April 7th, 1909.

THE SNOWDROP AND THE BEE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The snowdrop is still in full blossom in my garden here, and the crocuses and other spring flowers are blooming beside it. After many cold days, brightest sunshine has come and the bees are at work. I have been studying their operations, and find that, in Tennyson's reference to the snowdrop and the bees, as in all his other references to the poets of nature, he is perfectly accurate. The bees occasionally looked into the interior of the snowdrop as into an empty chalice, and then turned and buried themselves for a time in the delicious depths of the crocuses.

This may so far answer the query of your correspondent.—Yours, &c.,

D. K. AUCHTERLONIE

Craigdam Manse,
Old Meldrum, S. O., Aberdeenshire,
April 14th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In answer to your correspondent's question whether the bee ever woos the snowdrop, may I state that about a fortnight ago I watched for some time a bee visiting the snowdrops just outside my window. From the calm behavior of the snowdrops under his visitation, I gather that it was not a new experience to them.—Yours, &c.,

EMILY R. WICKSTEED.

Childrey, near Wantage,
April 6th, 1909.

THE ANGLICAN CHURCH AND NONCONFORMITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is surely puerile for anybody to imagine that the Catholic Church of this land, of which Canon Henson is an ordained priest, is of the same nature as a man-made dissenting sect; and to talk of charity and good will in the face of a fact which goes to the very root of things is sheer cant. Mr. Birrell once very truly said that Dissenters did not become such for the fun of the thing, and how any self respecting Dissenter with any kind of fidelity to his principles could think of having a priest to attend these functions is a position which surely can only be put down to something akin to worldly snobbery. Whether it was worth while for the Priest of the Parish concerned to have taken any notice of Canon Henson is quite another matter, but having done so the Bishop of Birmingham had no alternative; order is order, and law is law, and principles also count for something. Sir George Kekewich's Bill is merely a freak.—Yours, &c.,

EVERARD WILSON.

17, Bedford Gardens, Kensington, W.
April 14th, 1909.

"DEIRDRE WEDDED."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mrs. A. L. Milligan, omits, in her catalogue of "Deirdre" literature, perhaps the finest contribution of all.

She mentions R. D. Joyce's mediocre "Deirdre," and T. Rolleston's libretto on the same subject, and the rather weak plays by "A. E.," and W. B. Yeats. She does not allude to the "Deirdre Wedded," by Herbert Trench: one of the most exquisite narrative poems in existence. It is by the purely Irish author of "Apollo and the Seaman," who (if I remember aright) is also one of your own contributors.—Yours, &c.,

R. ANTHONY GIBBS.

Sompting, Sussex,
April 12th, 1909.

Poetry.

IN THE SOUTH.

(From Nietzsche.)

I SWING on a bough, and rest
My tired limbs in a nest,
In the rocking home of a bird,
Wherein I perch as his guest,
In the South.

I gaze on the ocean asleep,
On the purple sail of a boat;
On the harbour and tower steep,
On the rocks that stand out of the deep,
In the South!

For I could no longer stay,
To crawl in slow, German way;
So I called to the birds, bade the wind
Lift me up and bear me away
To the South!

No reasons for me, if you please;
Their end is too dull and too plain;
But a pair of wings and a breeze,
With courage and health and ease,
And games that chase disease
From the South!

Wise thoughts can move without sound,
But I've songs that I can't sing alone;
So birdies, pray gather around,
And listen to what I have found
In the South!

. . . . . .

"You are merry lovers and false and gay,
"In frolics and sport you pass the day;
"Whilst in the North, I shudder to say,
"I worshipped a woman, hideous and gray,
"Her name was Truth, so I heard them say,
"But I left her there and I flew away
"To the South!"

M. D. P.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

M. ANATOLE FRANCE intends paying a short visit to this country before his visit to Buenos Ayres, where he is to deliver a course of lectures on Rabelais. Both as humanist and as representative of the esprit gaulois, Rabelais should prove a theme upon which M. France is likely to be particularly happy, and we look forward to a delightful book when the lectures are published.

* * *

WE learn that Sir William Butler is writing a book on the military career of Napoleon. The mass of Napoleonic literature is already enough to daunt the boldest reader, but a study of Napoleon's campaigns from so distinguished a soldier as Sir William Butler cannot lack either value or interest. Of its literary quality, those who know what the fascination of style means and are acquainted with Sir William's earlier works may well feel assured.

* * *

As a result of a recent visit to the United States Signor Guglielmo Ferrero has written an account of what he regards as most significant in American life and thought. He is contributing to the "Figaro" a series of articles called "Impressions of North America," which will probably be republished in book form. Signor Ferrero complains that as a general rule European writers have given very exaggerated descriptions of America. He holds that idealism rather than materialism is a note of present-day American life, and says that the ostentatious luxury of which we hear so much is confined to a small and unimportant circle. "In order to express my convictions with full sincerity," says Signor Ferrero, "I ought to go farther and to say that, perhaps, in the old American society there is too much idealism. In the land that Europe regards as the home of the practical and utilitarian spirit I was continually meeting people who seemed to spend fabulous sums and an enormous activity on behalf of chimerical ideals. I have often asked myself while there if America may not be, after all, one of the most mystic countries of our epoch."

* * *

THE Cuala Press, Dundrum, County Dublin, has had a volume of poems by the late J. M. Synge in preparation for some time. The book will be issued in about six weeks, and will contain an appreciation by Mr. W. B. Yeats, and a portrait by Mr. Jack B. Yeats. Among the poems are several translations from Petrarch.

* * *

Two anthologies which are off the beaten track are announced by the Clarendon Press for publication before Midsummer. "The Forerunners of Dante," edited by Mr. A. J. Butler, is a selection of Italian poetry before 1300. Mr. G. H. Wollaston's "The Englishman in Italy" will contain much of the best that Englishmen have said about a country that has been one of the main sources of poetic inspiration from Shakespeare to Swinburne. The same publishers have in preparation an edition of Gray's "Poems," by Professor W. Bang, the inaugurator and general editor of the excellent "Materialen zur Kunde des älteren englischen Dramas," and Thomas Love Peacock's "Memoir of Shelley," including Shelley's letters to the novelist.

* * *

THE first edition that has any claim to fullness of the greatest of all memoir writers is at last approaching completion. M. Boislisle's edition of Saint-Simon's "Mémoires" in Messrs. Hachette's series of "Grands Ecrivains de la France" has just reached its twenty-first volume. The first was issued as long ago as 1871, but the remainder may be expected for early issue. As far as it has progressed the work is a triumph of scholarship and industry.

* * *

IT is odd that there seems no sign of the publication of two other memoirs which are certain to be of unusual historical value. The "Diary" of Louis Phillipe is understood to be in the possession of the Duc d'Orléans, but it probably contains statements which its possessor thinks ought not to be made public property at present. The other book is the memoirs upon which the Empress Eugénie is known to have spent much time and pains. We believe that the late Sir Howard Vincent acted as literary executor to the Empress. Whether the book will see the light during the present generation is, to say the least, very doubtful.

* * *

"CUT LEAVES" is the title of a volume of reminiscences by Dr. Heinrich Felbermann, the proprietor and editor of the Frankfort "English Mail," which is announced for early publication. Dr. Felbermann has had a varied career. He collaborated with George Sand and Judith Gautier, has been tutor to the present Emperor of Japan, and was long a close friend of the Emperor Dom Pedro of the Brazils. He owned and conducted several English journals, among them the "Examiner," and "Life," and while in London he built large blocks of artisans' dwellings in Shoreditch and Hackney. His coming book is divided into three parts. The first describes his life in Paris, where he founded the Tower of Babel, which has since become the largest linguistic institution in France; the second relates his London experiences, and the third deals with his early years in Hungary.

* * *

MR. W. A. CADBURY has written a book describing his visit to the Portuguese Colony of Angola and the islands of S. Thomé and Principe on behalf of his own and other firms interested in the labor question there. The conditions of life and work on the cocoa estates, and the method of contracting on the coast and transhipment to the islands are fully treated. The title of the book is "Labor in Portuguese West Africa," and Messrs. Routledge will be the publishers.

* * *

UNDER the title "Leaves of the Lower Branch" Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. are publishing a series of sketches by Mr. E. B. V. Christian, showing the attorney as he appears in literature, and the literary work that has been done by solicitors. The subject is a promising one, for there is scarcely one of our great novelists who has not given us portraits of solicitors. The tradition seems to be that a lawyer must be either a thorough villain or a paragon of intellect and goodness.

* * *

"THE INFAMOUS JOHN FRIEND," a romance of Napoleon's projected invasion of England, by Mrs. R. S. Garnett, is announced for publication by Messrs. Duckworth on April 30th. The author, who is a daughter-in-law of the late Dr. Richard Garnett, is a member of a literary family, being a descendant of William Roscoe, the historian of the Medici, and a niece of Mr. R. H. Hutton, late editor of "The Spectator." The hero of the novel, John Friend, a paid spy in the French service, is said to be a psychological study of a masculine type new to fiction.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Iron Cardinal: The Romance of Richelieu." By Joseph McCabe. (Nash. 15s. net.)

"Two Admirals, Sir Fairfax Moresby and His Son, John Moresby." By Admiral John Moresby. (Murray. 14s. net.)

"Richard Savage: A Mystery in Biography." By Stanley V. Makower. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)

"Problems of the Middle East." By Angus Hamilton. (Nash. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Dante's Divine Comedy." Translated by Edward Wilberforce. (Macmillan. 3 vols. 10s. 6d. net.)

"New Poor Law or No Poor Law; Being a Description of the Majority and Minority Reports of the Poor Law Commission." With an Introductory Note by Canon Barnett. (Dent. 1s. net.)

"Industrial Efficiency: A Comparative Study of Industrial Life in England, Germany, and America." By Arthur Shadwell. Revised Edition. (Longmans. 6s. net.)

"Chapters of My Life." By Samuel Waddington. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Memory Harbor: Essays Chiefly in Description." By Filson Young. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

"When a Woman Woos." By Charles Marriott. (Nash. 6s.)

"The Story of Thyrza." By Alice Brown. (Constable. 6s.)

"La Politique Religieuse de la République Française." Par André Mater. (Paris: Nourry. 4fr.)

"Socialisme à l'Etranger." Par J. Bardoux et G. Gidel. (Paris: Alcan. 3fr. 50.)

"La Lanterne Magique." Par Paul Margueritte. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3fr. 50.)

"Le Mystérieux Inconnu." Par Guy de Téramond. (Paris: Edition du Monde Illustré. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE UNFORTUNATE ARGYLL.*

The half century between 1638 and 1688 is, perhaps, the most unhappy period in the far from blissful history of Scotland. The Restoration was the violent reaction of human nature against the triumph of the preachers between 1638 and 1650. At last, in 1638, they had established the Theocracy of Knox and Melville, with such miserable results as the selling of their king; the tardy remorse which animated the army broken by Cromwell at Preston; the defeats of "dark Worcester and bloody Dunbar"; the English occupation, and the expulsion of the General Assembly from their place of meeting. The men of the Restoration were determined that the Kirk should never again "rule the roast." They were ruffians. They burned the Covenants; they established a bastard kind of prelacy; they turned some two or three hundred ministers out of their manses, and they suppressed the consequent risings by imprisonments, hangings, tortures, fines, and exile. They did their work, and, before the Revolution of 1688, the active adherents of the Covenants and of Theocracy had dwindled to the negligible "Remnant."

There was no politician or statesman whose biography can be made the centre of a history of the Restoration. Lauderdale died too early, Claverhouse came too late, Mackenzie was only a subordinate, and Mr. Willcock's hero, the Earl of Argyll, at no time held important office (except as the fountain of justice for the West Highlands), and is usually off the scene. The account of this Argyll in "The Dictionary of National Biography" (by Mr. Osmund Airy) is excellent. Mr. Airy has seen points that have escaped most historians. Mr. Willcock promises "a number of details which are wholly new," but they are of comparatively slight historical importance, and details of some importance are omitted. The Register of the Privy Council of Scotland contains much information—not specially concerning Argyll—which has been overlooked; but in time the publication of the Register, admirably edited by Mr. Hume Brown, will throw light on the anarchy of the Highlands under Charles II., and the unrest of the Border.

Mr. Willcock's hero, Archibald, eldest son of Lorne (later the famous Marquis of Argyll), was born in 1629; Mr. Willcock has ascertained the date, and tells the story of an unsolved mystery, the murder of the Earl of Lothian in his own house, Newbattle Abbey, where Archibald was born. On the old Celtic plan, which prevailed in Gaul during Julius Cæsar's time, the boy was fostered by Campbell of Glenurquhay. The origin of the custom of fosterage is unknown, but we are not surprised to learn that Archibald preferred the house of Glenurquhay to that of his gloomy sire. He was nominal Captain (1643) of a contingent of 2,000 men raised for French service by Argyll's half-brother, the Earl of Irvine. In this affair the author of a curious prophecy in rhyme, with Inveraray on the title page as the place of publication, accuses the Marquis of defrauding Irvine, in what way is not obvious. In 1647-1649, Archibald, now Lord Lorne, made the grand tour, and it is interesting to learn that he wrote a letter of condolence to Henrietta Maria, professing loyalty, after the death of Charles I. He displayed his loyalty, it seems, by watching, from the windows of his father-in-law's house, the progress of the great Montrose through Edinburgh to prison and to the gibbet. If this be true—and Mr. Willcock tries to explain the statements away—Lorne cannot be congratulated on his good taste. Clarendon is probably misinformed when he says that in Scotland Lorne treated Charles II. with "rudeness and barbarity." Certainly Charles bore him no grudge, and, in fact, his appearance in arms for the exiled king, in 1652-54, seems to have been honest, not the usual trick by which the father took one side while the son took the other. The father, "a distracted man in distracted times," was now hated by all parties, and fatally committed himself by his dealings with Monk, while the son turned out for "The Young Pretender," as it pleases Mr. Willcock to style Charles II. In 1657 Lorne was imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle, on suspicion of loyalty, and in the Castle a heavy weight, which the soldiers were putting, fell on his head. This accident may account for some peculiarities of temper, such as thrusting a lady downstairs when she came to ask for the interest on a sum owed to her. At the Restoration Lorne went to London and was well received by the king. Mr. Willcock, on the authority of a vague statement by Burnet, accuses Charles of "detestable treachery" in using Lorne as a decoy to bring Argyll to town, where he was arrested. Really, we can found nothing on an answer of Charles to Lorne of which Burnet "has forgot the words." Argyll had warnings enough, and he knew to what extent Charles owed him favor; Monk also repaid an old debt of distrust and dislike. After incurring great danger from the Cavalier party under Middleton in Scotland, Lorne received the rank of Earl, and his father's forfeiture. His estates were heavily burdened by debt. If I understand the matter he was responsible for debts on the Huntly estate bought up by his father, while Huntly recovered his own lands without responsibility for the debts on them. This affair of the creditors, with the Earl's own claims for debts due by the Macleans, and an intricate set of feuds with the Mackenzies, to some of whom he himself was in debt, proved to be the real causes of the Earl's ruin, in 1681.

I cannot but think that Mr. Willcock should have done his best to clear up this affair of the debts and clan-feuds which led to the fall of Argyll. But his statements (pp. 118, 132, 197-199) are both brief and vague. Yet in the histories of Clan Maclean, in Fountainhall's various works, in the records of a lawsuit of a century later, and, I believe, in the charter chest of Sir Fitzroy Maclean, there is abundance of curious material. Fountainhall, a moderate Liberal, is very severe on the Earl for his "oppression of his creditors," at a time when he was urging claims against the Macleans which, being backed by the all-powerful Lauderdale, gave him most of their territory—Mull, and much of Morvern—and broke a loyal and valiant clan. Fountainhall describes Argyll as flying to Inveraray from a debt due to Roderick Mackenzie, at the very moment when he was pleading before the Privy Council for the recovery of the debts due to himself from the Macleans. The Privy Council, in which Lauderdale was supreme, decided in his favor, after years of clan warfare, but the Mackenzies were allies of the Macleans, and Mackenzie of Tarbet, with Gordon of Haddo, were the agents of his ruin. The Duke of York (later James II.), espoused the cause of the Macleans, and not unnaturally considered that by eating up Clan Gilzean, and with his enormous extent of judicatures in the west, Argyll was too powerful for a subject. I have explained these affairs as far as my materials permit in the "Life of Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh." The Duchess of Lauderdale clearly saw that Argyll's private enemies would be too hard for him, before he gave them an opportunity by taking the Test oaths with a tactless reservation. Mr. Willcock himself justly remarks that Argyll's enemies "displayed a strong desire to ruin him" before his conduct as to the Test gave them their opportunity (p. 252). But he might easily have explained why Argyll had enemies, and told us who these enemies were. His friend and preserver was Lauderdale. When that protector fell, Argyll was doomed.

In the war with the Covenant (1666), Argyll stood by the Government and even volunteered the opinion that the captured preachers, such as Mr. Mackail, should be tortured. I do not observe that Mr. Willcock chronicles this circumstance, which, perhaps, he might not have omitted had Claverhouse been in question. Argyll was by no means on the side of the fanatics, who accused him, much later, of causing by his vote the execution of Cargill. He did endeavor to bring the Presbyterians and Lauderdale to some modus vivendi, but no serviceable compromise could be arranged. He sent none of his men to join "the Highland Host," and the abstention is the most notable thing in his public history at that stormy date. Though a member of the Privy Council, Argyll, till the fatal date 1681, takes a most inconspicuous part in public affairs.

As to the Test, it would have been wise in Argyll simply to refuse an oath which was self-contradictory, but the terms in which he expressed his reservations were unluckily open to cavil. His enemies saw their chance; he was arrested and most unjustly condemned to death. The rest of his life was full of adventures, such as befell men who rode with the Rev. Mr. Veitch, the d'Artagnan of the Covenant. The whole story, which is known to all, is well narrated by Mr. Willcock. Argyll's invasion of Scotland never had a chance. The wild hill-folk of Galloway and Ayrshire would not rise for him: he had never been their friend. His own clan, says Burnet, he had not conciliated. The Lowlanders in his company were pedantic prigs, always in opposition. His eldest son offered to serve against him. Argyll was obliged to fly, was taken, was condemned on the old absurd charge. Under examination he "named none to their disadvantage," and he died with much courage and dignity. "Unfortunate Argyll!" A much more amiable man than his father, he never gave tokens of great ability; no one can call him a Presbyterian martyr: he did not even support Hamilton and "the Party." It is a trifle, but I do not know where Mr. Willcock finds evidence for his statement that Charles II. "acknowledged a debt of £70,000 to the Marquis of Argyll" (p. 132). He did promise to pay a certain sum, not £40,000, apparently the balance of what was due for the surrender of his own father to the English at Newcastle.

* "A Scots Earl in Covenanting Times." By John Willcock, B.D. Edinburgh: Elliot.

ANDREW LANG.

---

THE ACROPOLIS.*

IN the eyes of Hellenists, the Acropolis of Athens is the most interesting spot in the most interesting city in the most interesting country of the world; and by Hellenists we mean not Greek scholars, but those for whose life ancient Greece represents an influence of higher value than any other. Even if it were not still crowned by splendid ruins, and did not command an enchanting view, the summit of Athena's hill would yet possess an intense human interest as a place within whose narrow precincts we can be perfectly sure that all the Athenian poets, thinkers, and artists often stood: "the centre of the town, divine, trodden by many feet," as Pindar called it. As Mr. D'Ooge says, the Acropolis "has been the Fortress, the Sanctuary, the Treasury, and the Repository of the Art of the Athenian people, as well as the Residence of its rulers." Much of its history has been literally unearthed by the archæologist, and only the archæologist is competent to tell it. Mr. D'Ooge, who is an archæologist, has told it well, and his tale is suitably illustrated by plans and pictures.

The hill bristles with a dragon-brood of difficult and fascinating problems, all of which the reader will find lucidly explained in this book, and discreetly discussed. There is hardly a building, or a foundation, which has not its own controversy. There are, for instance, the question of the Erechtheum, the question of the Hecatompedon, the question of the Old Parthenon, the question of the Pelargikon. As every visitor to Athens knows, the genius of Dr. Dörpfeld has set its quickening mark upon all the Acropolis problems. He may not be right in all his theories, but he has made the dry bones live. The value of Mr. D'Ooge's book is increased by the fact that Dr. Dörpfeld read it in manuscript; but Mr. D'Ooge is an independent critic, and he does not agree with all the master's views.

It is satisfactory that the question of the Old Parthenon has at least been settled. Dörpfeld has found proofs that it was begun before the invasion of Xerxes. Marks of fire on the drums and steps show that the building was surrounded by a scaffolding which was destroyed by fire. This, with some other evidence, proves that the temple was not the project of Cimon, but was being built when the Persians occupied the Acropolis in A.D. 480. It was not due to the inspiration of the victory over the Asiatic invaders, but may be regarded as a testimony to the new energy and national spirit of the democracy established after the fall of the tyrants. But Mr. D'Ooge is going beyond his data when he says that "it was the Alcmaeonid Cleisthenes who undertook the building of a great temple to Athena at Athens." Cleisthenes played a conspicuous part in the establishment of the democratic constitution, but he passes from the scene of politics before A.D. 500, and as the Old Parthenon was "begun not long before the Persian wars," as the author himself says, there is no reason for associating it with Cleisthenes. If we care to guess at the author of the project, Themistocles is not excluded.

The much debated question of the Hecatompedon (of which Dörpfeld discovered the foundations), with its relations to the adjacent Erechtheum and the Parthenon, are fully discussed. Mr. D'Ooge does not write to propound or propagate new views, but, rejecting Dörpfeld's theories of the Hecatompedon, he states his own conclusions, which coincide, in the main, with those of Michaelis and Petersen. According to these conclusions, which seem to us to do least violence to the complicated evidence—though there are some difficulties which Mr. D'Ooge does not disguise—the history of the Athena temples on the Acropolis is, briefly, as follows: In Homeric times, a double temple of Athena and Erechtheus stood where the later Erechtheum stands, and it was known both as "the old temple" and "the temple of Athena Polias." A new temple, dedicated to Athena, was erected alongside of this in the sixth century; and from its length of a hundred feet was called the Hecatompedon. Then, early in the fifth century, another temple, the elder Parthenon, of which we have already spoken, was begun, and was destroyed by the Persians; it was intended to supersede the Hecatompedon. After the invasion, both the Old Temple and the Hecatompedon were provisionally restored, and served the needs of worship and of storing the sacred treasures until more splendid buildings arose. The new Parthenon was built on the site of the older Parthenon, which had never been completed, and the Hecatompedon, no longer needed, was then pulled down. The Erechtheum, finished about A.D. 408, replaced the Old Temple virtually on its own site.

Mr. D'Ooge has, rightly for his purpose, interpreted the Acropolis to include the buildings on its slopes; but while he describes the old sanctuaries of Dionysus close to the theatre, he legitimately declines to enter upon the controversy connected with the temple of Dionysus in Limnae and the famous archæological chapter in the Second Book of Thucydides. He does not touch on the German excavations south of the Areopagus. But the growth of the town in that direction must have had some relation to the history of the Acropolis. In primitive times the Acropolis within the Pelargic wall was the city; men dwelled inside the wall. This is emphasised by Thucydides. As the population grew, the town advanced in a south-westerly direction, but we should expect to find that the Acropolis was still inhabited. It is not usual when new quarters grow up to find the old quarter abandoned; the value of the houses may decrease, but they are still lived in. Athens was an exception, and the anomaly requires explanation. In the time of Peisistratus, the town and its market-place are south of the Areopagus, cut off from the citadel with its temples and the palace of the tyrants. It seems to us that this peculiarity in the growth of Athens can only be explained by a deliberate act of policy, for which, it is reasonable to conjecture, Peisistratus was responsible. To him we would attribute (with Dr. Noack) the erection of the elaborate system of fortifications known as the "Nine Gates," which defended the western approach to the Acropolis. Similarly, we suspect that the analogous "five-gate" system of defence at Syracuse was the work of one of the Syracusan tyrants. In order to construct the cross-walls with the nine gates, it was necessary to clear out all the houses within the Pelargic wall—an unpopular act; and, if our conjecture is right, we have at once an explanation of the famous and curious oracle, "the Pelargikon is better unused." Peisistratus procured the oracle from Delphi in order to support by a religious sanction his unpopular policy.

Mr. D'Ooge has brought his history of the hill down through the ages to the recent restoration of the Parthenon. While his work is fully furnished with the apparatus of scholarship, it will be read with pleasure by all who care for the subject, and we have no doubt that, along with Mahaffy's "Rambles and Studies" and Miss Harrison's "Mythology and Monuments," it will be recognised as a desirable part of their equipment by intelligent visitors to Greece.

* "The Acropolis of Athens." By Martin L. D'Ooge. Macmillan.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING FICTION.

SARAH TULDON'S LOVERS Orme Agnus

"Sarah Tuldon is a splendid central figure, round whom are grouped many others, mostly simple country folk, but each one distinct and interesting, and perfectly natural. Around them spreads the Dorset landscape, fresh and fragrant, a charming setting of a story full of grace and charm."—Westminster Gazette.

THE LONG ARM E. Phillips Oppenheim

"There is no story-teller living who can be more surely relied upon than Mr. Oppenheim for conceiving a daring plot and then working it out with such ingenuity. 'The Long Arm' is a clever story, which no one will lay down till every line is read."
—World.

A CRIME ON CANVAS Fred M. White

"There is sufficient of mystery in this story to stock half a dozen ordinary romances."—Sheffield Independent.

THE SIN OF ALISON DERING L. G. Moberly

"The plot of this story is cleverly conceived and well carried out. Miss Moberley writes with great charm and skill, and the reader is not likely to put down the book until the tangle is finally cleared up. As a character-study, the figure of Alison Dering is drawn with considerable insight."—Financial Times.

THE DUKE IN THE SUBURBS Edgar Wallace

"Mr. Wallace is at his best in the broad spirit of comedy, and his humour is always infectious."—Yorkshire Post.

PURPLE AND HOMESPUN Austin Fryers

"A most entertaining and readable story."—Aberdeen Free Press.

MONEY Marie Connor Leighton

"Marie Connor Leighton's 'Money' will provide all that can be expected—and more. The amazing fertility of invention is undeniable."—Daily Express.

A POACHED PEERAGE Sir William Magnay

"The book is written in a style delightfully fresh and natural, and does not contain a dull page. It is rich in striking situations, strong dramatic power, and a keen sense of humour, and is one the reader would fain finish at a single sitting."—Irish Independent.

THE SOCIALIST Guy Thorne

"Mr. Thorne does nothing by halves. He thrilled us by showing us the possibilities of the extinction of the Christian religion. He now shows us what a force Christian Socialism might be if only it were inspired. Accordingly he packs 'The Socialist' with rousing incident."—Liverpool Post.

HIS FATHER'S HONOUR David Christie Murray

"As we know from 'Rainbow Gold' the late Mr. Christie Murray was capable of really fine work, and in 'His Father's Honour' we have the work of a skilled writer."—Morning Leader.

SIR MORECAMBE'S MARRIAGE Florence Warden

"Miss Warden has a task quite to her talent and to her liking, the book being without a dull page, and well up to the standard of 'The House on the Marsh.'"—Newcastle Journal.

A BID FOR LOYALTY James Blyth

"Mr. Blyth is to be congratulated on this powerful and original work. It is one of the best novels of the season."
—Manchester Courier.

PRINCE KARL A. C. Gunter

"Amusing—almost every line of it."—Sportsman.

SHILLING GUIDE-BOOKS.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, round corners.

WITH MAPS AND PLANS AND MANY ILLUSTRATIONS.

ENGLAND AND WALES.

Aldeburgh and the Suffolk Coast.
Bangor and North Wales.
Bath, Wells, Glastonbury.
Bexhill and District.
Bideford, Barnstaple, &c.
Bognor, Chichester, Selsey.
Bournemouth and District.
Bridlington and Filey.
Brighton and Hove.
Bristol and Environs.
Broadstairs and N.E. Kent.
Buxton and District.
Canterbury and N.E. Kent.
Channel Islands.
Clevedon.
Clifton, Bristol, and District.
Colwyn Bay and North Wales.
Cromer, Sheringham, &c,
Dartmoor.
Dawlish and S.E. Devon.
Deal, Walmer, &c.
Dover, St. Margaret's Bay, &c.
Dovercourt, Harwich, &c.
Eastbourne, Seaford, &c.
English Lake District.
Exeter and S.E. Devon.
Exmouth and District.
Falmouth and S. Cornwall.
Felixstowe and District.
Folkestone, Hythe, &c.
Harrogate, Ripon, &c.
Hastings, St. Leonards, &c.
Herne Bay, Whitstable, &c.
Ilfracombe and N. Devon.
Isle of Man.
Isle of Wight.
Leamington, Warwick, &c.
Littlehampton.
Liverpool, Birkenhead, &c.
Llandrindod Wells and District
Llandudno and N. Wales.
London and Environs.
Lowestoft and District.
Lyme Regis.
Lynton and Lynmouth.
Malvern and District.
Margate.
Matlock and District.
Minehead, Exmoor, &c.
Newquay and N. Cornwall.
Nottingham and District.
Penzance and W. Cornwall.
Plymouth and S.W. Devon.
Portsmouth and District.
Ramsgate, Sandwich, &c.
Rhyl and North Wales.
Scarborough and District.
Sherwood Forest, Nottingham, &c
Sidmouth, Seaton, &c.
Southsea and District.
Southwold.
Stratford-Upon-Avon.
Swanage.
Teignmouth.
Tenby and South Wales.
Thames, The, from Putney to Cricklade.
Torquay, Paignton, &c.
Wales, North (Northern Section).
Wales, North (Southern Section).
Wales, South.
Weston-super-Mare.
Weymouth and District
Whitby and District.
Worthing and S.W. Sussex.
Wye Valley.
Yarmouth and the Broads.

SCOTLAND.

Aberdeen and District.
Edinburgh and District.
Glasgow and the Clyde.
Highlands and Islands.
Inverness and District.
Oban and the Western Highlands.

IRELAND.

Antrim, Portrush, Giant's Causeway, &c.
Belfast and District.
Cork, Glengariff, Bantry Bay, &c.
Donegal Highlands.
Dublin and County Wicklow.
Killarney and South-West Ireland.

HALF-CROWN SERIES.

These Volumes are issued in superior Cloth Binding, with many Maps, and Street Plans of the principal Cities.

Belgium.
Holland.
London and Environs, with complete INDEX TO STREETS.
The London Guide is also issued in uniform 1s. edition.
Paris and Environs.
The Paris Guide is also issued in the uniform 1s. edition, with Plan of the City only.
Switzerland.

OTHERS IN PREPARATION.

WARD, LOCK & CO., LIMITED, Salisbury Court, London, E.C.

BREVIARY HYMNS.*

It is difficult to draw a line of demarcation between the early Christian, the medieval, and the modern hymn. For they shade off into one another; the distinctions are approximate, and hold only on the whole. In general, however, the first—of which the "Gloria in Excelsis," or the Easter Sequence, "Victimae Paschali," may be taken as representative—connects with the fragments of early Christian prophecy found in the Book of Revelation, and here and there in the Epistles of St. Paul. It is abrupt, tense, ecstatic; it indicates unuttered depths of fact and feeling behind the words. The second, precise and definite, recalls a Fra Angelico picture. It has no suggestion of the flaming walls of the world, or the wind-swept spaces of eternity; rather it depicts demure saints and little piping angels walking in formal garden paths and over prim parterres. A small world, reflected in a small mind. But the perfection of form is unmistakable. The Breviary Hymn for the feast of the Holy Innocents is an example:—

"Salvete flores martyrum
Quos lucis ipso in limine
Christi insecutor sustulit
Ceu turbo nascentes rosas.

"Vos prima Christi victima,
Grex immolatorum tener;
Aram sub ipsam simplices
Palma et coronis luditis."

Before the Middle Ages ended the type passed over into the passionate mysticism of St. Bernard and the early Franciscans. With the "Jesu dulcis memoria," the "Dies Irae," and the "Stabat Mater," a new note was struck in the chord. The third, beginning, in the age of the newly-opened Bible, with metrical psalms and paraphrases of Scripture—of which those still in use in the Church of Scotland are typical—developed, in the evangelical revival, into such representations of spiritual experience as Charles Wesley's "Come, O thou Traveller unknown," or Joachim Magdeburg's "Wer Gott vertraut hat wohl gebaut," finely translated by Dr. Kennedy. Where over-subjectivity, that pitfall of religious writers, has been avoided, such hymns are, perhaps, the highest expression that the religious consciousness has reached.

First the Romantic, then the Tractarian movement led to a revival of medieval hymnology in this country. It is strange to look back to the time when the use of hymns in public worship was a mark of Evangelicalism, and discouraged by old-fashioned High Churchmen. Men of this school confined themselves to the metrical version of the Psalms, by Tate and Brady, which was commonly bound up with the Prayer Book; the quaint, but decidedly superior, Scottish rendering, probably for political reasons—it had been approved in substance by the Westminster Assembly—never having come into use in England. The younger Anglicans, however, were quick to see the direction in which the interests both of religion and of their particular propaganda pointed. The publication of "Hymns Ancient and Modern" marked an epoch in the history of the Church. This book first made the treasures of medieval devotion available for the use of modern Christians: the forgotten Breviary Hymns, the majestic Sequences of the Roman Missal, the creations of Prudentius, of Venantius Fortunatus, and of the greatest of medieval poets, Adam of St. Victor, became familiar to English ears. The renderings, with few exceptions, were good, and have become traditional in our churches. But the undoubted fact that the originals suffered in translation has encouraged attempts to improve upon the accustomed versions; and few even moderately equipped scholars have omitted to try their prentice hand on the masterpieces of the ancient Church. Translation is not easy. It demands, over and above a knowledge of the language from and into which it is proposed to translate, an acquaintance with the subject matter, a gift of literary expression, and a certain power of analysis and reconstruction of thought. Translators are born, not made; and Mr. Donahoe is not of their number. He seldom rises above mediocrity; Fr. Caswall and Dr. Neale have been before him, and done the work better than he. Take, e.g., St. Bernard's

"Jesus dulcis memoria
Dans vera cordi gaudia."

Here is Fr. Caswall:—

"Jesus, the very thought of Thee
With sweetness fills the breast."

And here Mr. Donahoe:—

"Jesus, thy memory divine
To every heart is heavenly wine."

It is not association only that makes us prefer the former to the latter; or Dr. Neale's

"All glory, laud and honour
To Thee, Redeemer, King:
To whom the lips of children
Made sweet Hosannas ring."

as a rendering of the Palm Sunday

"Gloria, laus, et honor tibi sint Rex Christe Redemptor, Cui puerile decus prompsit hosanna pium."

to

"All glory, praise and honour
To Thee, O Christ, we bring;
And sing, like Sion's children,
Hozannas to our King."

In a poor hymn, assigned in the Breviary to the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul, we find:—

"Egregie Doctor Paule, mores instrue, Et nostra tecum pectora in coelum trahe."

The lines are not worth translating; but they are not improved upon by Mr. Donahoe:—

"O learned Paul, inspire us from above
With all the graces of the Heavenly Dove:"

and the frigid odes in classical metres inserted into the Office by Urban VIII., or assigned later to the Fridays between Septuagesima and Palm Sunday on which the instruments of the Passion are commemorated, remind us that conventionalism and bad taste are not confined to one tongue or one country. Nothing sorrier could have been sung in that Hawley Square Chapel, immortalised by Mr. Matthew Arnold, by Miss Emma Tatham or that "venerable class leader, Mr. Thomas Rowe." Mr. Donahoe's translations are certainly not worse, they are frequently better than, the texts.

Reverence for the central act of Christian worship has preserved the Missal from change; the Ordinary and Canon of the Mass are older than the Tridentine and Medieval doctrine of the Eucharist, and do not embody it; they remain what they were in primitive times. The Breviary, on the other hand, has undergone revision after revision; like an old house, it exhibits every diversity of style and construction; side by side with the most venerable relics of antiquity we find the flimsy pseudo-Classicism of a later and tasteless day. The present Pope, whose action in matters of ecclesiastical detail is less open to criticism than his general policy, has submitted it to a Commission whose reforms, should they be accepted, will be sweeping. It is proposed to eliminate the often apocryphal lections of the Second Nocturn at Matins, and to bring about a large substitution of ferial for festal offices; the result being a larger use of Scripture than at present, and the recitation of the Psalter as a whole. The Office Hymns would gain by these changes. Their number would be reduced, but the purging of the dross would leave the gold purified; and room, it is to be hoped, might be found for some of the masterpieces of medieval verse which have not, so far, gained admission to the service books. Rome, however, moves slowly; and it is possible that the revision now under consideration may meet with too strong an opposition from official conservatism to see the light.

* "Early Christian Hymns." Translations of the Verses of the most notable Latin writers of the Early and Middle Ages. By Daniel Joseph Donahoe. Werner Laurie. 6s. net.

THE CASTLE.*

Dublin Castle, as a piece of political symbolism, comes second only to the Bastille. As a piece of architecture it is a thing of no moment. King John built, or re-built, it in 1204, "strong enough to defend or control the city." But you can pass through the main streets of the city to-day

* "Dublin Castle and the Irish People." By R. Barry O'Brien. Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d. net.

From CHATTO & WINDUS'S SPRING LIST.

Professor Holmes's New Book.

NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE MAKING

By C. J. HOLMES, M.A.,

Slade Professor of Fine Arts in the University of Oxford. With a Photogravure Frontispiece, demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

"Professor Holmes has done a remarkable and original thing; he has applied common-sense to the art of design in an appropriate way. . . . Our author keeps constantly before him the painter's actual problem; almost all he says is of use in the studio, and we may fairly add that since Reynolds's discourses the student has never had put before him such a fruitful and suggestive guide to his endeavours."—Athenæum.

A SHORT HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES

From the Accession of Queen Victoria to that of King Edward VII.

By JUSTIN McCARTHY,

Author of the larger "History of Our Own Times." A New Edition, Enlarged. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. Also a School Edition, post 8vo, cloth 2s. 6d.

DEVON:

Its Moorlands, Streams, and Coasts.

By LADY ROSALIND NORTHCOTE.

Fully illustrated in Colours by FREDERICK J. WIDGERY. Large fcap. 4to, cloth gilt top, 20s. net.

"Both the letterpress and the illustrations of this book merit the very highest praise."—Morning Post.

"Authoress, artist, and publisher are alike to be congratulated on the result of their labours—a volume full of charm and delight in every respect."—Western Morning News.

THE ROAD OF NO RETURN

By A. C. INCHBOLD,

Author of "Under the Syrian Sun," "Lisbon and Cintra," &c. 6s.

A powerful story, with a plot never before touched in fiction, breaking entirely new ground.

A CASTLE OF DREAMS

By NETTA SYRETT,

Author of "The Child of Promise," "Anne Page," &c. 6s.

"Not only do the Irish scenes and the pleasant Irish characters depicted in Miss Syrett's new novel give it a peculiar charm, but there is a clever touch of Irish fancy in the invention which gives a new turn to an old device of the makers of plots for love stories. . . . Interesting in its character painting, and seriously sentimental without ever being heavy, the book cannot but enhance the author's reputation."—Scotsman.

THE JUNE PRINCESS

By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY,

Author of "An April Princess," 6s.

"The dominant note of the book is one of fantasy, and a very pleasing note it is. . . . 'The June Princess' is the delightful work of a poet turned novelist for the nonce. It is one of those rare books which exhale fragrance."—Sunday Times.

THE PAINTED MOUNTAIN

By PETER LAURISTOUN. 6s.

"It is a stirring tale of revolution in the Principality of the Lebanon . . . excitement sufficient to satisfy the most vivacious, tempered, however, by a solid determination on the part of the author to examine and expose the why and wherefore of the disastrous clashing of East and West."—Manchester Guardian.

THE MERRY HEART

By FRANK A. SWINNERTON. 6s.

"Many readers will be charmed with the gaiety and the frankness of Mr. Frank A. Swinnerton's book . . . It is a laughable story . . . leaves one with a better opinion of human nature."—Yorkshire Post.

IDOLATRY. By ALICE PERRIN. 6s. [3rd Impression.

"'Idolatry' is a real triumph."—Times.

JULIAN REVELSTONE

By JUSTIN McCARTHY. 6s. [2nd Impression.

"A charming tale, pleasantly told."—Daily Chronicle.

A QUESTION OF MEANS

By MARGARET B. CROSS. 6s. [2nd Impression.

"This is a quite admirable novel."—Daily Telegraph.

THE ROGUE OF RYE

By W. WILMOT DIXON. 6s.

"Here is an excellent tale."—Daily Telegraph.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, III, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

NEW MEDICI PRINTS

Will be Issued during April and May:

| | | | Gallery. | Colour Surface. | Price. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| ITALIAN SERIES. | | | | | |
| No. XV. | Titian. | Bacchus and Ariadne. | London | 25 × 23 in. | * 25s. 0d. net |
| ,, XVI. | Carpaccio. | Vision of St. Ursula. | Venice | 27 × 26¼ ,, | * 25s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, XIX. | Raphael. | Madonna della Colonna. | Berlin | 22 × 16¼ ,, | 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ,, XIV. | Mantegna. | Madonna, Child, and Cherubim. | Milan | 20¼ × 16¾ ,, | 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ENGLISH SERIES. | | | | | |
| Eng. III. | Hoppner. | Countess of Oxford. | London | 19¼ × 15½ ,, | † 12s. 6d. ,, |
| ,, IV. | Romney. | Lady Hamilton with a Goat. | | 25 × 20 ,, | † * 21s. 0d. ,, |
| NATIONAL PORTRAIT SERIES. | | | | | |
| N.P.S. II. | Unknown. | William Shakespeare. | Stratford | 18 × 13¼ ,, | † 12s. 6d. ,, |
| FLEMISH SERIES. | | | | | |
| Fl. VI. | Vermeer. | The Pearl Necklace. | Berlin | 21½ × 18 ,, | † * 15s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, VII. | Terborch. | The Concert. | ,, | 21¾ × 17¼ ,, | † * 15s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, VIII. | Q. Malays. | The Magdalen. | Antwerp | 17¾ × 11¾ ,, | † 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ,, III. | Franz Hals. | A Family Group. | London | 24¾ × 14¾ ,, | * 21s. 0d. ,, |

* Postage of Prints starred 9d., of all others, 6d. (three or less in parcel).
† Signifies that prices will be raised on publication.

List, post free. The completely Illustrated Catalogue with particulars of Annual Subscription, Frames, etc. 3d. Stamps.

THE MEDICI SOCIETY Ltd., 1B, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, London, W.

without so much as seeing the Castle. You can walk through the yards of the Castle without even noticing that it is a Castle. The visitor, particularly the American visitor, expects some moated and bastioned fabric of feudal magnificence. He puffs out a little gasp of surprise when, having pierced a mask of business houses on Cork Hill, he finds himself confronted with a mean building, entirely modern and undistinguished except for the Bermingham Tower, and looking, as Mr. O'Brien truly says, more like a barrack than like anything else in the world. Nor is the Castle, in a geographical sense, the sole centre of Irish administration. Many of the great Departments have their offices elsewhere. The Land Commission is in Merrion Street; the Local Government Board at the Custom House; the Congested Districts Board on Rutland Square. But the Castle is, of course, the central ganglion of the Executive Government. There it is that the best-hated official in Ireland, the Treasury Remembrancer, holds sway in the old office of the Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer. There it is that the Attorney and Solicitor-Generals on their way from the Four Courts drop in to meet the Chief and Under-Secretaries, and, it may be, the Lord Lieutenant at that "long mahogany table, with about a dozen dismal chairs, upholstered in black haircloth," so vividly described by a diarist of "Buckshot" Forster's entourage in 1882. And if, as a result of the deliberations of the Castle Cabinet, an agitator is to be arrested, or a meeting suppressed, the Under-Secretary has only to cross a passage to find himself in the department of the military officer who commands the Royal Irish Constabulary.

Dublin Castle is a living witness to the incompleteness of the Union, and to the impossibility of making it complete. It is a symbol of Separatism. For there has never, of course, been an administrative Union. "The Government (of Ireland)," says the grave Whitaker, in language that must make Ulster Unionists shudder, "is semi-independent." It has been found possible to make laws, usually bad laws, for Ireland at St. Stephen's. But it has not been found possible to appoint Land Commissioners for Ireland, good or bad, from Downing Street. Irish administration, then, is under the control of some ten or fifteen great permanent officials, encamped in Dublin. Able and humane men personally, they are politically the close prisoners of an evil tradition. They are trained to a sort of automatic distrust of Irish opinion. Hostility to popular demands is with them in the nature of a reflex movement of the muscles. In theory they are, of course, responsible to the Chief Secretary. But the Chief Secretary himself is responsible to the ballot-boxes not of Ireland but of England; and even if he chances to be in sympathy with Irish opinion he cannot easily make his views effective. The burden laid on his shoulders is too heavy. He is not so much a single Minister as a whole Government. He is at once Prime Minister, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Home Secretary, Minister of Education, Commissioner of Works, and President of the Local Government Board in Ireland. In Parliament he is, in addition, a sort of Secretary for that area of Foreign Affairs called Irish. It is a form of political pantheism, and Mr. Birrell, as the Absolute in the system, finds himself engaged in an eternal process of self-contradiction which must bring to his mind certain famous verses of Emerson and Swinburne. Legislation he can more or less control, and his courage and sincerity may pass a great measure like the Universities Act. But administration is beyond him; it is like a great mass of wet clay on which he can impress his personality in only a handful at a time. Sir Donald MacFarlane has left an excellent epigram on the subject. When a new Chief Secretary comes to the Castle, said he, "the case of the clock is changed, but the mechanism continues as before."

Good government, declared Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, in a phrase as memorable as any of Gladstone's, is no substitute for self-government. Dublin Castle government, vicious in principle in that it does not rest on the will or root in the affection of Ireland, has not even the minor merit of being clean and efficient in details. No impartial man can read the evidence marshalled by Mr. Barry O'Brien in this volume with his usual lucidity and vigor, and come to any other conclusion. Take merely the question of cost. Comparisons with the smaller nations of the European continent, such as Mr. O'Brien outlines, may be inconclusive although they are very suggestive. But let us take Scotland, and cite merely one figure. In 1908, according to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the number of Government officials assessed for income tax was, in Scotland, 938, in Ireland, 4,560. Their salaries were, in Scotland, £315,000, in Ireland, £1,435,000. The total local expenditure administered by them was, in Scotland, £6,300,500, in Ireland, £7,810,000, or if we omit the police, which are not included in the Scottish figures, £6,393,500. The effect of this system on the Imperial side can be conveyed in a sentence. The contribution of Ireland to the Army and Navy, in spite of increased taxation, is less than it was in 1894, the year of the Commission on Financial Relations. In 1910, as a result of the Old Age Pensions Act, the "Imperial contribution" from Ireland will have almost completely disappeared. That will be the gathered harvest of a century of Dublin Castle government under the Act of Union.

This is obviously a system which cannot stand. Indeed, it has no defenders. No one knows it so well from within as the Under-Secretary, and the last four occupants of that office—Sir R. Hamilton, Sir Redvers Buller, Sir West Ridgeway, and Lord MacDonnell—have agreed in condemnation of it. The only question that now possesses any actuality is this: When, and in what fashion, is the change to come? The small section of landlord opinion of which Lord Dunraven is the spokesman have pleaded for a beginning by way of administrative reform. Lord Dunraven himself has urged that view with keen ability, although he has rather missed the great human fact of the situation by directing his criticism more against the mechanism than against the spirit of the Castle system. In a situation full of difficulty the present Government endeavored to advance along this path. The experiment may now be definitively set down as a failure. Nationalist Ireland, in rejecting the Council Bill, declared in effect that the only body which could hope to control Irish administration would be an Irish Legislative Assembly. That verdict may be taken as final, all the more so since the resignation of Mr. William O'Brien. Since Dublin Castle is to be brought into harmony with Irish opinion it would be a negation of all statesmanship to inaugurate the process in a manner formally rejected by Irish opinion. That is the dominant factor of the situation. As for the grounds on which this policy rests we need only say that the conclusive argument for Home Rule is the complete failure of Dublin Castle.

To the formation of that strong opinion in England which in the end must carry Irish Home Rule, Mr. O'Brien's book will make a real contribution. It is a very quarry of information, actual and historical. He is to be congratulated in particular on his faculty of selecting from correspondence or State Papers the vivid sentence or phrase which conveys the whole atmosphere of a period. His last chapter, defining the Irish desire for a central government, at once national and strong, reinforced as it is by an interview with Mr. Redmond, constitutes in itself an invaluable Home Rule pamphlet. One or two words of criticism are, however, called for. We regret to have come upon many instances of careless proof-reading. The chapter on Finance, in particular, has a sense of haste about it, which should be removed; and Mr. O'Brien's figures, while on the whole accurate, do not seem always to rest on independent investigation. With that reserve slight made, the volume is well worthy of a place in the front rank of serious political literature.

---

FOUR NOVELS.*

In "The City of Beautiful Nonsense" Mr. Temple Thurston has created a variation on the theme of "The Romance of a Poor Young Man." The hero, John Grey, the writer, who lives in a garret in Fetter Lane over a greengrocer's shop, and stands aside to let the beautiful heroine take and light the last candle left in St. Joseph's box, and place it on the saint's altar in the Roman Catholic chapel in Sardinia Street, is an old friend. He hails, indeed, from the old-time fairy tale with its simple and satisfying formula,

* "The City of Beautiful Nonsense." By E. Temple Thurston. Chapman & Hall. 6s.
"The Heart of a Gypsy." By Rosamund Napier. Duckworth & Co. 6s.
"Chip." By T. Mills Young. John Lane. 6s.
"Sparrows." By Horace W. C. Newte. Alston Rivers. 6s.

BAEDEKER'S GUIDES

are now published by Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN. A complete list of the Volumes and prices will be sent post free on application. 1, Adelphi Terrace.

READ THE FOLLOWING IMPORTANT ARTICLES IN THE APRIL

INTERNATIONAL

RELIGIOUS TEACHING AND SECULAR MORAL INSTRUCTION. By THE EDITOR.
THE HOUSING PROBLEM. By HENRY VIVIAN, M.P.
THE INCOME TAX. By A. MACCALLUM SCOTT.
THE ECONOMIC CRISIS IN GERMANY. By Dr. EDUARD BERNSTEIN.

On sale everywhere. Price 1/- net.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

Turkey in Revolution.

By CHARLES RODEN BUXTON. With a Map and 33 Illustrations. 7/6 net.

The Westminster Gazette says: "Mr. Buxton has made telling use of the splendid opportunity which he enjoyed. He was a friend of the young Turks in the days before the triumph, and he was on the scene when the revolution came. It is a graphic story he tells of the change."

T. FISHER UNWIN.

The Panama Canal and its Makers.

By VAUGHAN CORNISH, F.R.G.S. With a Map and 63 Illustrations. 5/-.

The Academy says:—"We have nothing but praise for Dr. Cornish's remarkably interesting and impartial book."

T. FISHER UNWIN.

Industrial Insurance.

By CHARLES RICHMOND HENDERSON. 9/- net.

Write for a copy of the April issue of M.A.B. (Mainly About Books). It contains an account of the Ordnance Survey and its work, and the history of Baedeker's Guide Books. Sent free on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

Buy The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because
it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

STANLEY PAUL'S
New Six-Shilling Novels.

| | |
|---|---|
| THE TRICKSTER | G. B. BURGIN |
| THE CITY OF THE GOLDEN GATE | E. EVERETT-GREEN |
| DID SHE DO RIGHT? | A. J. MACDONNELL |
| AN ADVENTURE IN EXILE | RICHARD DUFFY |
| THE DREAM AND THE WOMAN | TOM GALLON |
| THE BROKEN SNARE | LUDWIG LEWISOHN |
| BANZAI! | "PARABELLUM" |
| THE LEVELLER | ALEXANDER McARTHUR |
| STOLEN HONEY | ADA AND DUDLEY JAMES |
| THE FLAME DANCER | F. A. MATHEWS |
| IN CALVERT'S VALLEY | M. PRESCOTT-MONTAGUE |
| THE GAY PARADINES | MRS. STEPHEN BATSON |
| THE BOTTOM OF THE WELL | FREDERIC UPHAM ADAMS |
| THE SECRET TERROR | "BRENDA" |
| THE GHOST PIRATES | WILLIAM HOPE HODGSON |
| CO-HEIRESSES | E. EVERETT-GREEN |
| SHOES OF GOLD | HAMILTON DRUMMOND |
| HEARTBREAK HILL | HERMAN K. VIELÉ |
| THE ADVENTURES OF A PRETTY WOMAN | FLORENCE WARDEN |

BALLADS OF BRAVE WOMEN

Records of the Heroic in Thought, Action, and Endurance.

Edited by ALFRED H. MILES (Editor of the "Famous Al Series" &c.)

Suitable for Recitation by Women at Women's Meetings.

Crown 8vo, Red Limp, 1/- net; Cloth gilt, 1/6 net, and in various Leather bindings.

Nothing more exhilarating for those suffering from the Blues . . . than:—

THE WIDOW TO SAY NOTHING OF THE MAN.

A New Humorous Novel by HELEN ROWLAND.

YOU MUST! Read this book . . . Wit sparkles on every page. . . . Other widows are not to be compared with THIS WIDOW.

In Cr. 8vo. 8 Illustrations. Cloth Gilt, 2/- net. Paper, 1/- net.

STANLEY PAUL & CO., Clifford's Inn, Temple Bar, E.C.

Recently issued. Demy 8vo, 736 pp., cloth, including Bibliography and copious Index. Price 12/6 net.

THE HIDDEN CHURCH OF THE HOLY GRAAL:

Its Legends and Symbolism. Considered in their Affinity with Certain Mysteries of Initiation and other Traces of a Secret Tradition in Christian Times. By ARTHUR EDWARD WAITE.

". . . this entrancing book . . . is one which no lover of romance, of our old literature, of the Celtic spirit, or, more particularly, of the Graal Legend can afford to leave unread. . . . His book is a conspectus, as it were, of the whole subject, and stands alone as a magazine of information concerning the Sangraal. The reader . . . will find all the materials significant to the problem laid before him in this encyclopædic treatise."—Nation.

To be published on April 21st. Crown 8vo. 6/-

THE ROMANCE OF A NUN

By ALIX KING. Author of "The Little Novice."

Those who have been privileged to read the proofs of this book say there has been nothing finer or more poignant since Olive Schreiner's "Story of an African Farm." A novel of high literary qualities, and one that will probably excite controversy.

IN PRESS. READY ABOUT THE END OF APRIL.

In two Demy 8vo. Vols. Over 1,000 pp. Price 21/- net.

PROGRESSIVE CREATION

A RECONCILIATION OF RELIGION WITH SCIENCE.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON, M.A.

This book is of the deepest interest to many classes of readers and thinkers. It appeals to so many sections of human society, being a serious contribution to published thought in current scientific research. It is a definite and positive advance of the Evolutionary theory which started from the publication of Darwin's memorable books "The Origin of Species" and "The Descent of Man"; and it guides the scientific mind through the portals of psychology (as, in effect, Darwin himself prophesied would be the case) into the wider regions of the so-called "Supernatural" and the Spiritual planes, breaking down the time-worn barriers which for so many ages have been reared up between the Spiritual and the Material, and between Science and Religion. It affords a theory of the Origin of Life, of Being, of Nature and Forms, of Evil, and of the Earth and Heavenly Bodies, which has never before in the history of modern literature been propounded; a theory of the deepest interest and importance to scientific students.

LONDON: REBMAN, Ltd., 129, Shaftesbury Avenue, W.C.

"Once upon a time there was a beautiful Princess." Mr. Thurston's heroine, Jill, is a West End Princess. And when John meets her by accident in Kensington Gardens he has to conceal from her the things that Princesses do not understand, viz., that he owes two quarters' rent, that most of his things are in pawn, and that he has only one penny in his pocket. However, with the money that is paid him for a short story he takes a box at the opera, and his Princess, greatly daring, consents to come to tea in Fetter Lane, where Mr. Chesterton, the bailiff, who has just come into possession, is clever enough to masquerade successfully as the Mr. Chesterton. So runs on the fairy story with pleasing romantic twists and turns to its destined happy ending. Book III. which describes the life of John Grey's parents in Venice, at the Palazzo Capello, and of their self-sacrificing love for their son, is also quite in keeping with the spirit of the story. Mr. Thurston has gaiety, an easy style, and enough intellectual salt to keep his sentimental passages from growing over-sweet or mawkish. His one fault, which he might, perhaps, note for future reference, is an over-confidential tone in displaying his knowledge of feminine subtleties. John's manner is a little too familiar with the Princess, at all the stages of their intercourse, for us to feel that he is passionately in love with her. In other respects the story is cleverly and freshly handled, and, indeed, has individuality and charm.

In "The Heart of a Gypsy," Miss Napier has written a novel which recalls the vigorous and breezy tone of that old public favorite, R. D. Blackmore. The dedication "To all those to whom Sun, Wind, and Rain mean much," is a true indication of the source of the writer's power—her passion for the life of the open air. The picture of the unconventional Exmoor Rectory, with the kindly wool-gathering old parson and his faded wife, and the two wild young girls, Bunny and Meridiana, is realistic in its truth, and the romance of Meridiana's origin—a gypsy baby left behind by a mongrel tribe of "Egyptians," with a dirty scrap of paper inscribed "Fur Passon Tomson"—is one of those romantic things that do happen, now and then, in the course of a life-time. Meridiana's fate comes to the shabby old Parsonage in the shape of the Harley Street surgeon, Cyprian Fielding, and the central motive is soon seen to be the irreconcilable claims that Fielding's love and his London environment make on the life of the fierce, untamed girl who is spiritually a thing of the moors and hills. Meridiana, betrothed to Fielding, stifles in the heated and enervating atmosphere of London society, while her careless and unconventional behavior have their natural effect in alienating Fielding's patients. The author, we think, overdoes the symbolism of the great Beech Tree at Hawkworthy Parsonage, which stands for the gypsy girl's passionate hold on life, but we cannot deny the imaginative force of the closing chapters in which Meridiana, stricken by fever, escapes from her country nurses, and imagining that the Beech Tree is calling to her, wanders out in her delirium to her death. Again, the critic may murmur that the whole episode is romantic, but it is the spirit of romantic youth in the novel that extorts our admiration, and the deep intensity of the feeling for nature.

"Chip," which contains clear and well-written descriptions of the life of English settlers on the borders of Swazieland, raises the old question why it is that the Englishman seems to degenerate morally the more he is brought into contact with the Kaffir. It is true that Mordaunt, the strong man of the tale, embittered by a woman's faithlessness, has retired from civilisation in order to nurse his wrongs and so takes a special gloomy pleasure in savagely handling his black boys, but nowhere but in South Africa is the Englishman in fiction represented as being so merciless and callous in his dealings with the natives. Judging from recent proceedings in Natal, the white man seems to suffer from spasmodic fits of brutality and cowardice. The situation portrayed in "Chip" is certainly striking, if not original. Mordaunt having engaged the attractively boyish and bright young overseer, Chip, lives with him for many months as his "mate," before he discovers that Chip is a woman! We cannot quite believe in Mordaunt's denseness, but the attendant circumstances are certainly ingeniously handled. Psychologically, the gradual softening of Mordaunt's character under Chip's daily influence seems truer to reality than his reaction of brutal resentment when, accidentally, he discovers the imposture. "The belief and the affection were alike slain by the dishonesty of the partner he had trusted as he might have trusted himself." The unimaginativeness of the purely masculine man could scarcely further go! But the author (whom we suspect of being a woman) is not satisfied that Mordaunt should lapse into the state of animality into which Chip's "deception" temporarily drives him. "You have taught me one thing—that I cannot live without you," is the sentence conspicuous on the penultimate page. "You've looked at yourself in a wrong light for so long," is Chip's graceful reply. A speech which condenses admirably the essence of feminine subtlety in her art of making him believe in her ideal for him.

The instinctive dislike which a reading of "Sparrows" may evoke in the minds of many excellent people is, unfortunately, only proof of the painful reality of the social evils depicted in Mr. Newte's pages. The subject, in a nutshell, is "the deep pitfalls and foul morasses which menace the feet of unprotected girls in London, who have to earn their daily bread—i.e., the anæmic shop-girls, seamstresses, girl typists, &c., who, after a long day's work of indoor drudgery, rush eagerly to snatch the cheap, gaslit pleasures offered them by "male friends." The picture of the maze of miry walks, in which Mavis, the brave and refined heroine, is entangled in and emerges from, time after time, is one long succession of those perilous situations and evil communications which in Hogarth's eighteenth century version led to the speedy ruin of the innocent country maid. Speaking artistically, Mr. Newte's novel is sadly overcharged. The description of London vice might, indeed, be blacker, but in the narrative of the heroine's experiences of satyr-like employers, rich seducers, faithless lovers, and female harpies, the author has amalgamated the evidence of a score of witnesses. The artistic coloring is crude and staring, and the form artless. Moreover, the persistent touch of over-emphasis is no less apparent in the scenes of romantic love than in the scenes of vice triumphant. None the less, "Sparrows" should be read, if only for the sake of bringing home to men and women that our social evils flourish in proportion as it is held unpardonable to discuss them openly. "Sparrows," though a sensational, is a healthy book, and serves the useful purpose of the evil-tasting black draught of the old-fashioned practitioner of our childhood.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

In spite of the attempts that have been made from time to time to encourage fresco-painting in this country, the art has never taken root, so far, at any rate, as its application to mural decoration is concerned. Owing to the rapid decay of certain notable frescoes executed by mid-Victorian artists in the Houses of Parliament and elsewhere, a superstition arose that the damp English climate was unsuited to fresco; and the theory of this unsuitability still obtains to a large degree. The partial refutation of the climatic argument is contained in Mr. James Ward's "Fresco Painting" (Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net). He points out that, apart from the fact that there is more than one method of fresco-painting, and that spirit-fresco, as distinct from buon fresco, has answered admirably in such well-known works as Lord Leighton's "Arts of Peace and War" in the Victoria and Albert Museum, the decay of the buon fresco decorations referred to may be attributed as much to careless preparation of the wall surface and use of fugitive colors as to any influence of climate. Mr. Ward prepared the walls for Lord Leighton's frescoes at South Kensington, and he writes with intimate knowledge of the various processes, old and new, describing the technique of each in terms that any student can understand. His concluding chapters are devoted to a number of famous Florentine frescoes, notably those of Giotto and Masaccio, and are the outcome of personal observation from the technical standpoint. The volume contains four color plates, including the frontispiece—Lord Leighton's "Arts of Peace"—and a number of half-tone pictures. We can cordially recommend it, as a sound and practical treatise, to every student of mural decoration in general, and of fresco in particular.

BOOKSELLERS.

10/6 FOR 5/6 Post Free. ABROAD 6/-

THE VARIORUM REFERENCE BIBLE

With Footnotes giving a Digest of the Various Readings and Renderings.

Edited by Cheyne, Clark, Driver, Goodwin and Sanday.

Handsome Morocco Yapp. Specimen Page post free.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

The Daily News

is now printed simultaneously in London and Manchester.

This means that Liberals all England over are able to get the representative Liberal organ every morning at the same time as their local daily.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

London Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.

Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

TOURS.

The R.M.S. DUNOTTAR CASTLE (of the Union-Castle Line) is chartered for a Series of Cruises. The next is:—

£14 14s. 0d. PALERMO, TUNIS, ALGIERS, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, LISBON, April 28th.

Full particulars from the Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Makers to H.M. the King

Rowntree's Cocoa

"Warms and Cheers"

Just the drink for breakfast and supper. Try it!

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning, April 2. | Price Friday morning, April 16. |
|---|---|---|
| Consols 2½ per cent. ... ... ... | 84⅞ ... | 85 7/16 |
| French 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 97 ... | 97 |
| German 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 85½ ... | 85½ |
| Russian Fives ... ... ... ... | 99⅜ ... | 100¼ |
| Peru Pref. ... ... ... ... ... | 32¾ ... | 33½ |
| Turkish Unified ... ... ... ... | 93½ ... | 92½ |

The great excitement of the week on the Stock Exchange has been, of course, the Turkish counter revolution, which has naturally had a depressing influence on European Government stocks and on markets generally. Cheap money, however, has compensated to some extent, and we may hope that the clouds in the Near East will disperse. Meanwhile trade prospects are injured by the sensational rise in wheat prices.

The Wheat Scarcity.

There is a general consensus of opinion among members of the trade that the present rise in the price of wheat has been only in a very slight degree caused by the manipulations of Mr. Patten of Chicago. The upward movement is, in fact, amply justified by the shortage of the world's harvest, and in particular by the disappointing supply from Argentina. The official crop estimates from that country have been reduced by two million quarters, and although her shipments during the past three months have been very much larger than in any corresponding quarter prior to 1907, the figures this year have fallen from 7,969,800 cwt. in 1908, to 6,757,800 cwt. In a time of winter scarcity much depends on the harvests in Australia and Argentina, the two wheat growing countries in the Southern hemisphere, and this year Australia has nearly made up the decline from Argentina. But in previous years the winter supply from the Southern hemisphere has always been supplemented by a continuous stream of wheat from store—from the United States, and other countries, and from farmers' stocks. The latter are, at the present moment, nearly depleted, for, although the harvest last year was exceptional, the sales of British wheat since the beginning of the cereal year have been heavier than for many years past, and the "Gazette" has already recorded sales amounting to 29,786,000 cwt., against 22,155,000 cwt. last year. Importers' and millers' stocks are equally scarce, as the trade during the last two years has been working on a very narrow margin. There remain the stocks held in producing countries, and the prospect of the new harvests, which should now be coming in. Of the latter, the Indian harvest is the only one of immediate interest, for it may save the situation. Though it usually begins to arrive in the first quarter of the year, we only received 1,000 cwt. this year up to March 31st, compared with 2,000,000 cwt. in 1907, and even larger quantities in the corresponding periods of previous years. But the harvest, though very late, is reported to be fairly good, and will come at a most opportune moment. Finally, as to the American position; we have received much smaller quantities in the three months than last year. For this, however, the trade should have been prepared, for the American demands have increased so rapidly that only in very good years can we hope to get much of the "tail" of the United States crop. Mr. Patten's operations come at the time when a squeeze is most effective. Even if his holdings are small, they are sufficient seriously to affect the statistical position. The important point for the British public, however, is that the rise in Chicago, though it may be carried much farther before the end of May, need not affect British prices. The corner, if the present movement can properly be called a corner, is only in standard American wheats. These grades on the London and Liverpool markets will follow American prices; but the price of bread at the moment is dependent on Argentine, Indian, and British supplies, none of which are tenderable under the American contract. The prices of these grades will, therefore, entirely depend on the actual shortage and not on the Chicago manipulations.

Russian Bonds.

Some interest was aroused last week by the fact that the big Russian loan of 1906 rose to par. The loan, it may be remembered, was offered at 89 when the fate of the Russian Empire seemed to be hanging in the balance, and it seemed doubtful whether anarchy or republicanism or a constitutional monarchy was most likely to supervene. Mutiny, robbery, lawlessness, and horrible outrages of every kind were reported from all parts of the country, and within a few weeks of the issue the bonds fell to 13 discount in London, though, curiously enough, the contemporary, and much larger, issue in Paris never, I believe, fell to a discount of more than four or five. Those who bought the 1906 bonds at 76 and have sold them at 100 within a little more than two years may be congratulated on their good luck. The future of Russia is not at present bright enough to offer anything better than risky and hazardous speculation to the investor. But the refusal of the Government to play a warlike part in the Balkans removes an imminent danger, and there is always the off chance that some statesman who can work with the Duma and reform the system of expenditure and taxation may arise and save the situation. Quite recently a weekly paper, called the Russian "Economist," has been founded by some enlightened patriots, and it is hoped that they may gradually win the ear of the Government. Enormous savings could be effected merely by reducing the Russian army to the size of the German. A reform of the Civil Service and the introduction of an accurate and honest system of accountancy are equally urgent and necessary to the financial regeneration of Russia.

India Government Stocks.

Lord Morley is to be congratulated upon the wonderful financial results which have followed what may truly be called his pacification of India. The general uneasiness last year, the outrages, the boycott, the growth of anarchy, and the severe depression in trade following upon bad harvests had given a serious fright to investors. The following table shows the rise which had taken place between April 1st and Thursday morning:—

India Stocks.

| | Prices on April 1. | April 15. |
|---|---|---|
| Indian Stock 3½ per cent. ... ... ... ... | 98¼ ... | 99⅜ |
| ,, ,, 3 per cent. ... ... ... ... | 87¼ ... | 89¾ |
| ,, ,, 2½ per cent. ... ... ... ... | 73 ... | 75½ |
| ,, ,, Rupee Paper 3½ per cent. ... ... | 61½ ... | 62½ |

The Indian Government, while effecting considerable retrenchments in view of the falling off in revenue, has wisely decided to push on with its railway policy, and I am glad to learn that an important scheme is now under consideration for connecting Burmah with India. There are two alternative routes. One is to join the Burmese with the Indian system by a line passing through the tea-growing parts of Assam. But another and shorter route has recently come into favor as the result of a survey made by Sir H. Barnes, the late Lieutenant-Governor of Assam. This line would run from Rangoon through the Arakan-Yoma range of mountains, and would then skirt the shores of the Bay of Bengal to Chittagong. According to a writer in the "Morning Post," this route is to be commended, not only as easier, cheaper, and shorter, but also because it would pass through a more fertile territory; i.e., "through the most promising portions of the Southern Shan States, one of the finest wheat-producing centres of Further India." This district is described as likely to become "the Manitoba of Asia" within a few years. Allowing, we are told, for the primitive methods of agriculture still practised in the Shan States, the yield of wheat per acre compares favorably with North-West India, Russia, and even the Canadian West. If the proposed railway is built, Chittagong would take some share of the exports, but Rangoon is the natural entrepot of Burma, and great elevators are being erected on the banks of the Irawaddy.

LUCELLUM.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.
Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

SUMMER TERM COMMENCES APRIL 28th, 1909.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

Playing Fields, Gymnasium, Metal and Carpentry Workshops, Swimming Bath, Fives' Court, etc.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.
(The Royal Naval School.)

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large Playing-fields, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath; Chemical and Physical Laboratories; Cadet Corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarships Hertford and Merton College; Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. NEXT TERM, April 28th. Apply Headmaster: Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauser, Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.

Six Scholarships (£60 and under) will be offered on June 16th. Examination at Giggleswick, in London, or at Preparatory Schools. Particulars from Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle Yorkshire.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

MALVERN COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATIONS, JUNE 1st 2nd, and 3rd, one of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Boys) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in Examination. Council Nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well but fail to obtain a Scholarship.—For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE FOR WOMEN
(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS.—Twelve Entrance Scholarships, from £50 to £60, and several Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years at the College, will be awarded on the results of an Examination to be held from June 28th to July 2nd, 1909. Names must be entered before May 29th.

The College prepares Students for London Degrees. Inclusive fee, £100 a year.

For forms of entry and further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

MISCELLANEOUS.

OLD-FASHIONED COTTAGE surrounded by good garden. Six rooms, good kitchen and range, and large outbuilding. Dry and convenient. Not overlooked. Tradesmen's entrance. Old-world, unspoilt part of Essex. Station about hour from City. Good service of tradesmen and postal facilities. £25 to good tenant.—P., c/o "Nation" Office.

ALLIANCE
ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

ESTABLISHED IN 1824.

Accumulated Funds exceed £16,500,000.

HEAD OFFICE: BARTHOLOMEW LANE, LONDON, E.C.

DIRECTORS:

THE RIGHT HON. LORD ROTHSCHILD, G.C.V.O., Chairman.

IAN HEATHCOAT AMORY, Esq.
CHARLES EDWARD BARNETT, Esq.
F. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, Esq.
A. V. DUNLOP BEST, Esq.
FRANCIS AUGUSTUS BEVAN, Esq.
PERCIVAL BOSANQUET, Esq.
Hon. KENELM P. BOUVERIE.
THOMAS HENRY BURROUGHES, Esq.
FRANCIS WILLIAM BUXTON, Esq.
JOHN CATOR, Esq.
His Grace the DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE.
Col. the Hon. EVERARD C. DIGBY.
Capt. GERALD M. A. ELLIS.
JOHN HAMPTON HALE, Esq.
C. SHIRREFF HILTON, Esq.
W. DOURO HOARE, Esq.
ALFRED H. HUTH, Esq.
FRANCIS ALFRED LUCAS, Esq.
Hon. HENRY BERKELEY PORTMAN.
Hon. N. CHARLES ROTHSCHILD.
Sir MARCUS SAMUEL, Bart.
H. MELVILL SIMONS, Esq.
HUGH COLIN SMITH, Esq.
Right Hon. LORD STALBRIDGE.
HENRY ALEXANDER TROTTER, Esq.
Right Hon. the EARL OF VERULAM.
Sir CHARLES RIVERS WILSON, G.C.M.G., C.B.

The operations of the Company extend to the following, among other branches of Insurance:—

FIRE. LIFE and ANNUITIES. MARINE.

Consequential Loss following Fire.
Workmen's Compensation.
Personal Accident and Disease.
Third Party and Drivers' Risks.
Plate Glass and Hail-storm.
Burglary and Theft.
Fidelity Guarantee.

The Company also grants
Capital Redemption Policies, and undertakes the duties of
Trustee and Executor.

The Directors invite proposals for Loans on, and for the purchase of, Reversions and Life Interests.

Prospectuses and Proposal Forms may be had on application to any of the Company's Offices or Agents.

ROBERT LEWIS, General Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel &Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.
Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.
Nice—Galignani's Library.
Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.
Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.
Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 „ ... ... 6d. „

Messrs. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

Messrs. Methuen have just published, or will publish immediately, the following books :—

A SUMMER IN TOURAINE. By FREDERIC LEES. With 12 illustrations in colour by M. Armfield and 87 from photographs. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. This magnificently illustrated book is a complete and absorbing description of France's most delightful province.

The Sixth and last volume of MY MEMOIRS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS, is now ready. Crown 8vo, 6s.

IN A GERMAN COLONY. By B. PULLEN-BURRY. With 8 illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net, is now ready and gives a full account of life and manners in New Britain, recently colonised by Germans.

WALKS IN PARIS. By GEORGES CAIN. Translated by A. R. Allinson and abundantly illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net, is a book indispensable to all visitors to Paris. It is a delightful medley of description, gossip and antiquarian lore.

DANTE IN ENGLISH LITERATURE is Dr. PAGET TOYNBEE'S new book; it is full of a most elaborate account of the connection of Dante with English literature, quoting all the references to the great poet from Chaucer to the death of Cary in 1844. It is a novel and most interesting chapter in literary history. It is in two volumes. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

CRIMINAL TYPES IN SHAKESPEARE. By AUGUST GOLL and translated by Mrs. Charles Weekes. Crown 8vo, 5s. net, is one aspect of Shakespeare's psychology. The book reviews the great criminals of the plays and shows how Shakespeare by his genius was fully up to the modern standard of criminal psychology.

The second and concluding volume of Mr. DAVID HANNAY'S HISTORY OF THE ROYAL NAVY, Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net, is nearly ready. It begins in 1689 and ends in 1815. The two volumes form the standard history of the Royal Navy.

GENERAL LITERATURE

NAPOLEON'S MARSHALS. By R. P. DUNNP-ATTISON. With twenty Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
"This well-illustrated book has been sympathetically, yet judiciously, compiled."—Daily Chronicle.

THE BLUE BIRD: a Fairy Play in Five Acts. By MAURICE MAETERLINCK. Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. F'cap. 8vo, deckle edges, 3s. 6d. net.
"A fascinating thing, of singular delicacy in its humour and fantasy."—Morning Post.
"There are scenes of amazing beauty of dialogue and setting and scenes full of whimsical and delicate humour."—Truth.
"Here is a fairy poem, in truth—so radiant, so gossamer in touch and conception, so full of charm and scent."—Observer.

GALICIA: The Switzerland of Spain. By ANNETTE M. B. MEAKIN. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
A complete description of a little-known but lovely province, full of historical, artistic, and antiquarian interest.
"Altogether the book is wonderfully comprehensive and valuable."
—Glasgow Herald.
"It is a fascinating country, and Miss Meakin's is a fascinating and extremely well-written book."—Observer.
"Miss Meakin shows a complete mastery of her subject."—Glasgow News.

THE COMPLETE HOCKEY PLAYER. By EUSTACE E. WHITE. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 5s. net.
"The Complete Hockey Player" comprises an historical sketch of hockey, its evolution, progress, and present popularity, and chapters dealing in an interesting and informative way with club, county, interdivisional, international, and University hockey.
"A most interesting and comprehensive book on the game."
—Daily Mail.
"As an up-to-date and readable work upon the game this book has no equal at the present time."—Scotsman.
"No 'complete' hockey player can afford to be without it."
—Globe.

THE TRIALS OF FIVE QUEENS. By R. STORRY DEANS. With 12 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
A book dealing with the Trials of Mary Queen of Scots, Anne Boleyn, Katherine of Aragon, Marie Antoinette, and Queen Caroline.

TRAGEDY QUEENS OF THE GEORGIAN ERA. By JOHN FYVIE. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
This book is a series of biographical sketches of all the most prominent English tragedy actresses of the eighteenth century, from the famous Madam Barry and the fascinating Oldfield down to the majestic Siddons.
"Mr. Fyvie's work is sound throughout, and is not marred by the vulgarity of extravagant enthusiasm."—Morning Post.

A HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW. By W. S. HOLDSWORTH, D.C.L. With a Plan. Vols. II. and III. In 4 vols. demy 8vo, each 10s. 6d. net.
The first volume of this general History of Law in England contained a history of the various Courts which have administered English Law, together with an account of their jurisdiction, and dealt with the beginnings of the various branches of English Law—of Equity, Admiralty, Commercial, and Ecclesiastical Law—which make up the Common Law of the present day. In these volumes the detailed history of these branches of law is traced.

THE CONFLICT OF RELIGIONS IN THE EARLY ROMAN EMPIRE. By T. R. GLOVER, M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
This work is an attempt to make the reader see the Founder of the Christian movement and some of His followers as they appeared among their contemporaries; to represent Christian and Pagan with equal goodwill and equal honesty, and in one perspective.

GEORGE SELWYN AND THE WITS. By S. PARNELL KERR. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
Mr. Kerr has been fortunate in obtaining access to a series of unpublished letters by Selwyn. They are addressed to a relative, and contain many intimate and personal touches. The book, which is illustrated, also deals largely with Selwyn's circle—a circle which included practically all the famous wits and men of fashion of the eighteenth century.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH PARALLELS. An Advanced Class-Book for the Study of Languages. By F. R. M. FURSDON. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
A selection of French and English idiomatical phrases and idioms, and over a thousand examples of French and English metaphors.

THE CREED IN THE EPISTLES. By WILFRID RICHMOND, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

FICTION

THE LOVE-STORY OF ST. BEL. By BERNARD CAPES. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Altogether a fine piece of craftsmanship, full of colour and thrilling withal."—Sketch.
"A romance of romances. Not for one moment does the interest flag; the story is told with the most fascinating skill."—Bystander.
"An original work, romantic and moving. Mystery, passion, romance, the book is full of them all."—Times.
"The book has a fine individuality, and Mr. Capes is at his best in this rich and powerful book."—Morning Leader.

KATHERINE THE ARROGANT. By B. M. CROKER Author of "Peggy of the Bartons." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Fourth Edition.
"The charm of the book is the tenderness of the human touch throughout."—Liverpool Post.
"Bright, and smart, and witty, and full of amusing situations."
Morning Post.
"Mrs. Croker is always amusing; her theme is made fresh and vivid, and Katherine herself is delightful."—Standard.

MY LADY OF SHADOWS. By JOHN OXENHAM. Author of "The Gate of the Desert." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.
"Wholesome and invigorating from first to last."—Scotsman.
"An intensely interesting story, whose characters are charmingly drawn."—Liverpool Post.
"Just a simple story, the work of a master story-teller, and full of charm."—Sheffield Independent.

THE GIFTED FAMILY. By BARRY PAIN, Author of "Lindley Kays." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.
"A delightful mixture of laughter and tears."—Onlooker.
"Mr. Barry Pain has a remarkable command of all the leading motives of fiction, and his book is full of good things."
—Pall Mall Gazette.
"A delightful novel, interesting from the first page to the last . . . kindly and humorous. I repeat that this is a delightful book."
—Punch.
"In Mr. Pain's best vein, and is full of shrewd observation."
—Liverpool Post.
"It is all immensely, superlatively happy, very charming, and very human."—Court Journal.
"It is all very true, all very amusing."—Standard.

THE STORY OF VIRGINIA PERFECT. By PEGGY WEBLING, Author of "Blue Jay." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.
"The book is gracefully written and is full of humour."
—Daily Mail.
"There is a charm and a freshness about Miss Webling's style that is infinitely refreshing after a course of machine-turned fiction."
—Onlooker.
"Miss Webling is a writer of whom we have heard before, and of whom we shall hear again. She tells her story charmingly, and it is very nearly perfect Miss Webling—please go on."—Daily Graphic.
"Here is a book that the New Year will find hard to beat, welcome as the aconite and snowdrop, full of tears and laughter and true human things."—Morning Post.

BROTHERS ALL: More Stories of Dutch Peasant Life. By MAARTEN MAARTENS, Author of "An Old Maid's Love." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.
"It is both carefully and sympathetically written, and bears throughout the impress of reality."—Outlook.
"Each story is a finished piece of work."—Daily Telegraph.
"Mr. Maartens' creative faculty is vigorous, clever, effective, and fertile."—Daily News.

THE FLOWER OF THE HEART. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.
"Alice Eversley is one of the sweetest, most delicately charming women of modern fiction."—Daily Mail.
"A fine and powerful novel. No one can question the sincerity and power."—Daily Telegraph.

A SON OF THE EMPEROR. By NEWTON V. STEWART. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Mr. Stewart works out with great skill the pattern of the story, and has written a book of unusual interest."—Daily Mail.
"Mr. Stewart has written his story with spirit, and he has an eye for colour and the picturesque."—Daily Chronicle.

TO BE PUBLISHED LATER

BARBARY SHEEP. By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Garden of Allah." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

SET IN SILVER. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON, Authors of "The Lightning Conductor." With a Frontispiece in Colour by ARTHUR H. BUCKLAND, and other illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.
In this new novel, which describes a motor tour through England, Mr. and Mrs. Williamson again are faithful to the motor car, into which they pack their characters, and from which are caught those glimpses of England which they give so alluringly.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 4.] SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Diary of the Week ... ... | 109 |
| Politics and Affairs:— | |
| Battle or Demonstration? ... | 112 |
| A Triumph of Character ... | 113 |
| The World's Shortage of Wheat ... ... ... ... | 114 |
| The Growth of International Law ... ... ... ... | 116 |
| Life and Letters:— | |
| The Maid ... ... ... ... | 117 |
| The Revolt of the Poet ... | 118 |
| The Laborer's Listlessness ... | 120 |
| Town and Country Mice ... | 121 |
| The Drama:— | |
| The Power of the Yellow Press. By H. W. M. ... ... | 122 |
| Art:— | |
| The New Art Gallery ... ... | 124 |
| Letters from Abroad:— | |
| The Press Law in Egypt. By Frederick Ryan ... ... | 125 |
| Letters to the Editor:— | |
| The Declaration of London. By Arnold Herbert, M.P. ... | 126 |
| The Anglican Church and Nonconformists. By Richard Mudie-Smith, D. Eastham Auty, and the Rev. A. Norman Rowland ... ... | 126 |
| "A Study of the Bye-Elections." By John H. Humphreys ... ... ... | 127 |
| Adult Suffrage. By Catherine Ryle and B. Blagg ... ... | 128 |
| Form in Poetry. By J. C. Graham ... ... ... ... | 128 |
| The Medical Value of Sunlight. By George Burford, M.B. ... | 129 |
| Poets and Children. By B. Brooksbank ... ... ... | 129 |
| Gogol's Centenary. By Constance Garnett ... ... | 130 |
| The Fighting Value of "Dreadnoughts." By C. G. Walker | 130 |
| Poetry:— | |
| A Song of Life. By David Wilson ... ... ... ... | 130 |
| The World of Books ... | 131 |
| Books to be Read ... ... | 131 |
| Reviews:— | |
| The Hero of the Six Acts ... | 132 |
| A Correspondent of Brahms ... | 133 |
| Among Australasian Cannibals | 134 |
| An Historical Romance ... | 136 |
| Books in Brief:— | |
| The Third Republic ... ... | 138 |
| Ladies Fair and Frail ... ... | 138 |
| Galicia ... ... ... ... | 138 |
| British Birds in their Haunts | 140 |
| The Week in the City. By Lucellum ... ... ... ... | 140 |

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The situation in Turkey has undergone a swift and most salutary change, which shows that neither the moral nor physical forces that created the revolution of last year have been either destroyed or seriously abated. It is now known that the émeute in the capital was an affair of bribes and demoralisation, the active parties in which were probably the 2,000 scattered spies of the Sultan and some reactionary members of the priesthood acting on the undisciplined garrison and using the Liberal Union as their tools. The abler and more responsible Ulema, we are informed, kept aloof from the mutiny, which was far bloodier than the first censored telegrams allowed us to believe. The conspiracy has now been virtually overthrown. The leaders of the Young Turks rallied at Salonika, found the troops both there and at Adrianople thoroughly steadfast, and swiftly organised them for a march on the capital. Accompanied by a few Bulgarian and other auxiliaries, and well supplied with artillery, they moved on the capital, halting at San Stefano and drawing a line of investment round the Mohammedan city, up to the Sweet Waters of Europe at the end of the Golden Horn. On the other side of the Sea of Marmora they hold one of the stations of the Anatolian Railway.

* * *

This brilliant action has unnerved and, we hope, destroyed the counter-revolution. The new Ministry has accepted the commands of the Macedonian troops, and is entering into relations with them. Nazim Pasha, the new commander of the First Army Corps, has practically joined forces with the investing body, which includes the Second, Third, and Fourth Corps, numbering about 25,000 well-equipped men. The mutineers are angry but inactive, and the Sultan is apparently only too willing to cringe before the conquerors, whom he would have decimated without a qualm. The terms of entry are being negotiated, and they appear to turn mainly on the question whether or not Abdul Hamid is to be dethroned, and Rechad Effendi, the reforming heir, an amiable and honest man, to be girded with the Sword of Othman.

* * *

A National Assembly of Senators and Deputies is said to be discussing this question at San Stefano, the Versailles of the Turkish situation. The commander of the investing army, who is variously stated to be Hussein Pasha and Shevket Pasha, has prepared terms which include the proclamation of martial law, the punishment of the culprits, the reduction of the garrison, and a system of policing by the Macedonian forces. The hodjas, who stirred up the revolt, are flying from Constantinople, but some of the mutinous soldiery are refusing to take the new oath of allegiance, though tendered them by two great Mohammedan authorities, the Sheikh-ul-Islam and the Fetwa-Emini. The Young Turks appear to be divided as to the policy of deposition, but we hope that Enver Bey's advice will be taken, and Abdul Hamid's bloody and inglorious reign brought to a close. It must be remembered that he and the reactionaries have been responsible not only for the military rising, but for the new wave of massacre and anti-Christian feeling which seems to be spreading from Adana to Erzeroum, and through which, it is said, that from 15,000 to 20,000 Armenians have been massacred.

* * *

The Bill for the disestablishment and disendowment of the four Anglican dioceses in Wales was introduced by the Prime Minister on Wednesday, and the first reading carried by a majority of 172—262 to 90. Mr. Asquith's speech was a brilliant work of statement and argument, rather less condensed than his effort on the earlier Bill of 1895. The later measure is the more moderate of the two. Thus the Church, through its Representative Body, is to be re-endowed, with the cathedrals, as well as with the churches (1,500 in number), bishops' palaces, parsonages, and all the benefactions dating from 1662. All existing incumbents are safeguarded during their lifetime, and retain their glebes. The remaining property, when finally available, including the tithe rent charge, will be devoted to higher and technical education, hospitals, dispensaries, convalescent homes, libraries, nursing institutes, the plan thus following the lines on which the Irish Church Fund was disposed of. The central dispensing body would be a Council of Wales. No Welsh Bishops would in future sit in the House of Lords, the number of spiritual Peers being reduced to twenty-two.

* * *

Mr. Asquith's main argument was the unanimous vote of the thirty-four Welsh members, Churchmen as well as Nonconformist, in favor of Disestablishment, the un-national and anti-national origin and history of the Church, as opposed to the thoroughly national character of the Nonconformist movement, its failure to attract more than a third or a fourth of the adherents of the Dissenting Churches, and the chance of regaining touch with the Welsh people through freedom. Mr. Balfour's line of criticism was perfunctory, but its tone showed a policy of no quarter. Its most indignant point was reached in the complaint of the hypocrisy of pretending that a spiritual body gained by losing its temporalities. This was emphasised by Lord Robert Cecil's statement that he approved of Disestablishment, if it were divorced from disendowment, which is practically the modern High Church attitude.

* * *

The Prime Minister made an interesting series of speeches at Glasgow on Saturday. He spoke excellently on Turkey, stating that, while the new Turkish Government had assured this country of its adherence to the Constitution, British sympathy would be "alienated" if it, or a successor, turned aside from the paths of reform, and "entirely withdrawn" if it deserted them. He treated the naval question reassuringly. He deprecated the description of himself as a "kind of pinchbeck Palmerston" (by whom?), said that the revelations as to German shipbuilding gave no ground for "alarm" or even disquietude, and stated that the Government were assured of an "overwhelming safeguard" of our naval supremacy in 1912. He declined to make the second four "Dreadnoughts" absolute on the ground that we might be on the eve of developments in construction which would vitally affect naval policy. He suggested a Conference with the Colonies on their proposed aids to our naval strength—a proposal which has been much appreciated. On future legislation, he promised measures for the restriction of boy labor and insurance against unemployment. In a postscript speech, he reiterated that the House of Lords remained the "dominating issue," but he had not mentioned it because it was assumed wherever two or three Liberals were met together.—On Thursday the Prime Minister announced that he would preside over an inquiry by a sub-Committee of the Committee of Defence into the home fleets' preparedness for war during the last two years, granted at the initiative of Lord Charles Beresford, and desired by the Admiralty. The inquiry will be restricted, not general. Thus the great Fisher-Beresford quarrel will at last be fought out, but in secret.

* * *

The English and Russian Governments received from their consular agents in Tabriz news that the plight of the civil population was so desperate that an attack on the foreign consulates was being planned in order to provoke intervention. The Russian Government thereupon insisted that the Shah must allow sufficient food to be admitted for the Europeans and the peaceful inhabitants, on pain of Russian troops being sent to open the road and guard the foreign institutions and subjects. The Shah yielded so far as to permit a six days' armistice, during which supplies will go into Tabriz. Satar Khan is not satisfied, and some desperate fighting took place on Tuesday, but Russia's action is practically equivalent to depriving the Shah of victory when it was within his hands, and doubtless he will demand compensation. Negotiations are now proceeding for a general settlement, and the concession the Shah has made in the matter of Tabriz will, one supposes, be counted to his credit in this final reckoning. If the settlement turn out to be not as favorable to the Constitutionalist cause as it might have been, the fault will largely rest with those Nationalists who did not lift a finger to assist Satar Khan, the bravest and staunchest of their leaders.

The country hardly realises that, day after day, week after week, the House of Commons is doing its work in private session, admitting no member of the general public, and shutting every one of its galleries save that reserved for the press. An attempt has been made to end this serious infringement of democracy by passing a Bill punishing disorderly conduct in either House of Parliament with a maximum of six months' imprisonment. The Bill was adopted by the Government from a Select Committee, but the House would not look at it. Two hostile lines of argument were used—the first that the Bill increased rather than diminished the chances of advertisement by suffragettes or other believers in "demonstration" tactics, and that Parliament could not afford to part with its own powers of jurisdiction and allow its high officers—including the Lord Chancellor and the Speaker—to be haled before inferior courts. The Prime Minister could not press the Bill against the House's universal dislike of it, but the difficulty remains, and the Commons will probably have to risk occasional disaster in order to keep publicity. Perhaps it will decide to close the Ladies' Gallery indefinitely.

* * *

On Tuesday the Prime Minister moved the second reading of a Bill raising the Board of Trade to an equality in point of status and emolument, though not, we are sorry to say, in point of title, with offices governed by Secretaries of State. Mr. Churchill appears to have entered a strong personal plea that he shall not be the first to receive the rise from £2,000 to £5,000 a year, which the passage of this Bill implies, but we hope that the House will not listen to this suggestion, and that Lord Balcarres' amendment will be carried. The question is really one of considerable political importance. The Bill before the House, as Sir Charles Dilke properly said, ought to embody a scheme for a general redistribution of duties between the Home Office, the Local Government Board, and the Board of Trade. The functions of these three offices are hopelessly mixed, and it is quite time to assign them on a scientific plan.

* * *

But, for the moment, it is an urgent task to raise the Board of Trade and the Local Government Board from the markedly inferior rank which they take as compared with the War Departments. So long as the former offices are regarded as functions of the second class, the most powerful figures, even in a Liberal Cabinet, will be drawn to the external rather than the internal sphere, and their choice will be looked upon as promotion. Now British trade and British labor are bigger interests than the British army, while the British Navy itself is practically a symbol and guarantee of their supremacy. It is high time, therefore, to make the status of all these offices square with the facts, and we hope that the Labor Party, which threatens opposition to the Bill, will see the very large importance of the change. If a Labor Ministry were in power to-morrow, it would be forced to father some such Bill as that proposed by the Prime Minister.

* * *

The result of the fight in East Edinburgh, declared on Friday week, secured the election of Mr. J. P. Gibson, the Liberal candidate, by a majority of 458. At the general election Sir George McCrae's majority was 4,174. The diminution is said to be partly due to the defection of the Irish voters, combined with a bitter press campaign against Mr. Gibson. Thus the series of Scottish bye-elections, though on the whole satisfactory, has not ended quite as well as it began.

On Wednesday the Labor Party, through Mr. Jowett, raised the question of capture of private property at sea, proposing to give immunity to "enemy merchant vessels, other than carriers of contraband." The strongest plea for this reform was made by two of the ablest young lawyers in the House, Mr. Simon and Mr. F. E. Smith, one a Liberal, the other a Tory. The Parliamentary correspondents suggest that it would have been carried against the views of the Admiralty had it not been talked out. Much of Mr. McKenna's speech, like earlier utterances, was a rehearsal of his Admirals' views, and might have been used equally against the abolition of privateering or any other plan for diminishing the loss or horrors of war. We are afraid that some of the sentences will be widely quoted in Germany by the party which always argues for a big navy on the ground of our designs on German sea-going commerce.

* * *

Thus Mr. McKenna thought he was "justified in saying" that we should "endeavor to destroy the enemy's commerce in time of war," and that, in the absence of such a power we should drag on merely a "sort of war," with no great damage to the belligerent Power. To this Mr. Smith retorted that the chance of losing twenty or thirty German "Dreadnoughts" might conceivably be a guarantee against aggressive war, and that the possibility of going to Germany and assuring her that we had no designs against her mercantile fleet might act as a preventive of any war. Unfortunately this is not the kind of argument in which Admiralties take any interest. It merely appeals to men who own ships or desire peace. Happily, the end of Mr. McKenna's speech indicated a considerable advance. He hinted that the Government would be willing to reconsider their view of the right of capture, if it were made a pivot of a scheme for the reduction of armaments.

* * *

We are very glad to see Mr. McKinnon Wood's answer to a question asked him on Tuesday by Sir Charles Dilke as to whether the evacuation of Crete by the international troops would be effected next July, as all the conditions laid down in the Note of three years ago had been fulfilled. Mr. Wood replied in the affirmative, merely adding the proviso that the satisfactory state of the island and the protection of the Mussulman people must be continued up to the date of the evacuation. This is only reasonable, but we do not imagine any difficulty will arise. The evacuation is going steadily on, the island is tranquil, the Mussulmans have their rights, and the Greek nation behaved last October with so much regard both to European difficulties and to the troubles of the Young Turks that the snapping of the purely nominal thread of suzerainty by the Porte should be merely a trifling affair. Germany, we imagine, is in a much more amiable mood than at the time of the descent of Colonel Vassos, and no other Power, we think, is likely to raise objections. Before the summer is over Crete should be free, and united to Greece.

* * *

On Monday Mr. Harcourt introduced a Bill making London a single borough for Parliamentary purposes. All its divisions are to vote on one day, and no voter, of course, will be able to poll more than once. There is to be continuous qualification for a voter moving from one district to another. Liverymen may vote for the City, but not for it and another constituency. The Bill is at once a blow at plural voting and a plan for making the workmen's franchise effective. For these reasons the House of Lords will reject it, even though it does no more for London than to put it on an equality with Birmingham.—On the same day Clause III. of the Indian Councils Bill, struck out by the Lords, was re-inserted in the Commons by 118 votes to 22. The Government also agreed, in substance, though not in form, to an amendment by Mr. Mackarness, properly directed against the exclusion from the Legislative Councils of persons deported or imprisoned without trial.

* * *

The wheat corner seems to be breaking up. On Tuesday there was a heavy fall on the Chicago market, which is said to have wiped out £120,000 of Mr. Patten's "profits," and there has been a slight drop in the price of wheat in the English markets, though, owing to the uncertainty, little actual business has been done. It looks as though Mr. Patten's calculations of the available supply were less near the truth than the official estimates. The "corner" has aroused public opinion in America and here. In the U.S.A. the suggestion has been made—it will go no further—to abolish the duty on wheat, while one legislator has brought in a Bill to prohibit dealings in futures. Mr. Field, an Irish M.P., has also been asking Mr. Lloyd George whether he cannot interfere, but Mr. Lloyd George betrays no anxiety to grapple with the very delicate and complicated problem of the grain markets. It is much easier to attack a legitimate dealing in futures which steadies prices than to hit at wholly legitimate gambling.

* * *

The trial of M. Lopukhin, the ex-Director of the Russian Police Department, will begin before a special bench of senators on May 11th. The charge against him is of "having rendered efficacious aid to a Social Revolutionary Association, whose aim was to produce a coup d'état by means of an armed insurrection, terroristic acts, and the assassination of the Tsar." The indictment is a voluminous document, and its point is that M. Lopukhin betrayed the police spy, Azeff, to the revolutionaries. According to it, Azeff's services had been "enormous." Ever since 1892 he had been betraying his associates. He betrayed Gershuni, he betrayed an army organisation, and he revealed plots against various governors, General Trepoff, Plehve, the Grand Duke Nicholas, and the Tsar. According to the police, M. Lopukhin revealed all this to the Social Revolutionaries. M. Lopukhin's defence is rather tangled: he says that he mentioned the truth only to Bartseff on the understanding that it would go no further, and he refused to appear before the revolutionary committee of inquiry into Azeff. There is more than a suspicion that the Terrorists put pressure upon M. Lopukhin, but the clearest impression left by the indictment is that the proceedings against M. Lopukhin are vengeance by the Secret Service.

* * *

An important stage has been reached in the construction of the Nigerian Railway by the linking of the section running north from Lagos, on the coast, and the section running south from Jebba, on the Niger. The Niger is thus at a point 500 miles from its mouth in railway communication with the sea. The line is to run as far as Kano, the great trading centre of Northern Nigeria, and the portion beyond the Niger is being attacked from opposite Jebba (the river has not yet been bridged) and from Baro. The line is being laid at the rate of a mile a day, and it is hoped to reach Kano in 1911. The railway will run through a region of big towns and advanced farming, but whether it will pay is another question. Its hope is cotton-growing for Lancashire.

Politics and Affairs.

BATTLE OR DEMONSTRATION?

THERE is always, we suppose, a theoretical case to be made out for the connection between Church and State. But, unless all the rights of nationalities are disavowed, could there be a weaker one than that which the friends of the Welsh Establishment set up against the Bill of Wednesday and its predecessor of fourteen years ago? Here is an institution which not one Welsh member of Parliament out of thirty-four now supports, which has failed, within the memory of this generation, to send half a dozen champions to the Imperial Parliament; which is permanently deserted by the great majority of the Welsh people; which is predominantly non-national or anti-national; which, though respectable for zeal and learning, is quite undistinguished; which, though it happens to possess so able a chieftain as the Bishop of St. Asaph, is disabled from leading anything in Wales—either her faith or her politics or her industrial life or her culture or her poetry or her music; which, as it can never hope to be anything more than a comfortably protected sect so long as its State association survives, ought to long with all its soul for the escape into freedom that saved its Irish sister. Practically all these larger considerations were abandoned by the weak opposition to Mr. Asquith's Bill. Instead of an argument on merits, the House of Commons was asked to consider the Government's haste in legislating in advance of the report of the Royal Commission, and their cruelty in despoiling a Church which they invest with its cathedrals, churches, parsonages, burial grounds, and every farthing's-worth of endowment left it since the national faith of the country was fixed on the lines to which in the main Wales adheres to-day. For our part, while we gladly concede the point as to endowment, and think that the Act of Uniformity of 1662 makes a proper limit for the retention of Church property, we greatly dislike the vesting of the cathedrals in the Church Representative body. Cathedrals are not mere enlarged parish churches. They are the greatest of all historical monuments, the most glorious and permanent symbols of the religious and civic life of a nation. No Government has a right to make them over to a body that is not national in fact, and will have ceased to be national in name. If the Anglican dioceses in Wales cannot peaceably share the Welsh Cathedrals with the Welsh nation, they should be vested in the people whose fathers raised their walls and worshipped within them. Otherwise the Bill creates no real grievance and no injustice. The Welsh Church is not asked to make any serious voluntary effort within the lifetime of the present incumbents. It will never want either buildings or endowments, and the dispossessed French clergy, from the Archbishop of Paris to the humblest desservant, would have jumped at such a provision as this Government has made. It will be a little poorer than it is to-day, but only on the sceptical theory of Mr. Balfour, that a church, like a City company, must live on its pious donors, will it therefore suffer a loss of vitality. Disestablishment re-unites the Welsh Church and the Welsh nation, so far as union is humanly possible, just as Establishment necessarily and eternally separates them.

"The Bill is all right," said Mr. Hutton, in answer to a reporter of the "Daily News," "if only the Government mean to go through with it to the bitter end." There, unfortunately, we touch the weakness and unreality of the situation. What the immediate prospects of the measure may be we do not know; the Government can hardly contemplate its passage this year, even through the House of Commons. The Budget comes next week, it has been expressly described by the Prime Minister as the main work of the Session, covering, as it does, the one function where Liberal power against the Lords is undiminished, and where the special meaning and purpose of Liberal policy are revealed. As soon as it appears, it will be an Aaron's rod, swallowing up all rivals. Then to what category of Bills is Welsh Disestablishment to be assigned, how far will it be pressed, and, above all, what possible calculation assigns it the barest chance of life in the House of Lords? We know the Tory attitude. Mr. Balfour is no Constitutionalist in this matter; he is fighting for existence and power, and his real weapon is the Lords. He has declared instant war on the Bill, not by argument, for he has none, but by his usual process of signalling to his friends across the corridor in Westminster Palace. Who does not know this; and who that knows it does not also realise that it explains the lack of enthusiasm for the Bill, and the feeling that in spite of all protests and assurances to the contrary, the Government has merely put its hand again to the sand-plough which its last Liberal predecessor foreswore fourteen years ago?

Thus we measure time in the history of Liberalism, until the "dominant issue" is not merely stated but faced. Within the last week two Bills of real consequence to Liberal members—the measure giving electoral unity to London and that disestablishing the Welsh Church—have been presented for academic debate. Is it possible that their special friends contemplate any farther fate for them? Is it not time, therefore, for the party to come to an understanding as to its future, so that self-respect can be restored to it. And what source of revival remains but in recourse to the electorate? It is idle to say that we refuse to let the Lords "dictate" the time and nature of the appeal to the country. They can do a worse thing than that. They can deprive Liberalism of power and credit; and if these go, the mere power of selecting the day of execution is of no value. Once the Lords have refused to reform our electoral system. They are now going to repeat their refusal. Twice they have refused a reform of the Scottish land system. Once they have refused an Education Bill; had the compromise of last year been left standing, in however attenuated a form, they would have done it again. Now these defeats have gone so far that, secure in the general progress of the reaction, only the constitutional ground captured by our forefathers saves the Government this year from the annulment of its larger programme, financial and non-financial. Therefore, what is Wales going to do? She has pressed the Government into a demonstration. Will she arm it for a battle?

A TRIUMPH OF CHARACTER.

The science of political dynamics, if such a science exists, has hardly penetrated as yet to the Near East. For if anything is more remarkable than the energy and competence of the Young Turks, it is the ignorance of their critics, both Turkish and Western. The first revolution of July took the whole world of diplomacy and journalism by surprise, and was, indeed, at first regarded by the persons who direct foreign policy merely as a fresh aggravation of the Macedonian chaos. The counter-revolution of April 13th was hailed with obvious pleasure by the "Times," and, indeed, by nearly all the English correspondents in Constantinople as the final overthrow of the Young Turkish movement. To-day one looks back in mere amazement at such folly. For the Committee of Union and Progress is clearly much stronger now than it was in July, and it displays the calm, the moderation, and the intelligence which come only from conscious strength and unruffled courage. On both occasions it was not only European observers who were in error. For all his army of spies, the Sultan knew little or nothing of the organisation that overthrew his despotism in July. Last week the idea that the Committee had grown nerveless and unpopular must have been shared not only by its European and Levantine critics, but by some of the clergy, by all the so-called "Liberals," and, perhaps, by the Sultan himself. The root of it all is, we believe, the reluctance of the average man of the world to admit what is at bottom a moral force into his daily calculations. For centuries the East has seemed to be changeless. For centuries the Turk has seemed to be the prey of a temperamental lethargy. Amid the inertia in which corruption and self-seeking found their opportunity, only one ideal factor seemed to be real—the appeal to the ignorant masses of a primitive religion which could, for all its many merits, be easily wielded by fanatics and intriguers. On that ill-omened Tuesday of last week the green flag had been waved, the hodjas had preached, and the soldiers, with someone's money in their pockets, had shouted for Islam, the Sheriat, and the Sultan. At once the men who think they know the East concluded that it is, if possible, more changeless than ever.

But for one circumstance they might have been right, and that circumstance is the moral integrity and the elevation of character of the young officers who have come under the influence of the Committee, of its Positivist teaching, and of the winning nobility of such a man as Achmet Riza. We do not suppose that the men of the Third Army Corps at Salonica differed originally in intelligence or opinion from the men of the First at Constantinople. They have responded differently to the same stimulus of religion and conventional loyalty, simply because they trust their officers. For three or four years past these officers have consciously set themselves to acquire a moral ascendency, to teach and inspire, instead of merely commanding. That was the real strategy of the Committee. It has been splendidly justified. The rank and file in Salonica doubtless know even better than the rank and file in Constantinople, that some of their officers may be lax Moslems and radical politicians. But they have had time to learn also that they are good leaders, sympathetic teachers, honest patriots, and men who will not sell their comrades or their companies for promotion or backsheesh. Military critics tell us that the march of the Third Army Corps on Constantinople has been a very competent performance from a professional standpoint. It is, to our thinking, much more than that. It is the victory of a band of men who have made character their first concern. The Young Turks have always despised Constantinople as a place hopelessly corrupted by Palace influences and Levantine finance. Constantinople, in its turn, had evidently despised them as "idealogues" and dreamers. It realises to-day that they are very "practical mystics."

Before these pages are in the reader's hands the terms of the Parliamentary army will doubtless be known—and executed as soon as they are known. The one concern of the Young Turks will be to render impossible, but by a minimum of change, the repetition of the reactionary plot. They will certainly do what Kiamil Pasha refused to let them do at an earlier stage—break up the Sultan's Pretorian Guard. They will, of course, punish the men who were not only mutineers, but murderers, for only when the present censorship is withdrawn shall we learn the whole truth about the cold-blooded slaughter of Young Turks which followed the mutiny. The fugitive deputies will be restored, and the fate of Tewfik Pasha's stop-gap Ministry is hardly worth considering, for even the Rump Parliament had studiously refrained from according it any vote of confidence. The actual authors of the plot to terrorise Parliament have been guilty of a sort of treason. We shall be surprised if they have the courage to await their fate, and still more surprised if the Young Turks mix vengeance with the punishment which some of these persons have richly deserved. A section of the clergy—but probably not the more enlightened section which is largely represented in the Chamber—was mainly instrumental in rousing the soldiery and the mob, and perhaps it had a share in fomenting the Armenian massacres which broke out in Adana, when for a moment it was thought that reaction had triumphed in the capital. These men did after their kind. More contemptible has been the part played by the self-styled Liberals, who, in their jealousy against the Committee, stooped to ally themselves with reaction. The conduct of these persons goes far to confirm the suspicions which our correspondent entertained of Kiamil Pasha and his clique two months ago—that he was even then meditating a coup d'état, and would have dissolved the Parliament, with the aid of the Palace troops, if the Young Turkish majority in the Chamber had not promptly driven him from office.

The critics of the Committee have blamed it for its "dictatorial" methods and for its anxiety to retain influence in the army. We shall hear less of that charge in future. It is only because the Committee controls the army that Turkey has escaped the fate of Russia and Persia after their civilian revolutions. At present and for some time to come the effective choice lies between the Committee and the officers on the one hand and the Mohammedan Union and the soldiers on the other. The central fact of the situation is, we are afraid, that only two sets of politicians are men—the Young Turks of the Salonica school and the extreme Clericals. The Chamber, save for its declared Young Turkish members, has shown itself opportunist and feeble. Some groups, notably the Greeks and the Armenians, abstain from voting on all critical occasions. Others veer under outside pressure. The withdrawal of the declared Young Turks left the Rump utterly inert, unable to make up its mind either for or against the Tewfik Cabinet. We do not know whether most European Parliaments would have behaved better, or whether any of them would have awaited the mutineers as the Roman Senate awaited the Gauls in the Forum. But clearly such a Chamber requires a strong and courageous controlling force. The Pashas of the old régime, from Kiamil to Hilmi and Tewfik, are only fit for the position which the Committee assigned them—executants of its will, officials who may usefully serve it with their administrative experience.

The only force which exists is the Committee itself. It has bayonets behind it. But it would be a gross mistake to suppose that for that reason it rests simply on brute strength. On the contrary, it is only because of its high character and its rare intelligence that it retains the bayonets. Only those who know something of the passions and suspicions which seethe in Macedonia can gauge the whole significance of the success of the Salonica Committee. It had to hold its soldiers, accessible to religious and personal loyalty. It had to hold the Bulgarians, who might have thought the possibility of a civil war among Turks the ripest occasion for self-assertion in all the history of their race. It had also to hold the Albanians, who combine hatred for Turks and Bulgarians with a curious personal loyalty to Abdul Hamid. To succeed in all three feats was to repeat the miracle of July. The soldiers marched; the Bulgarians and some Albanians actually volunteered to march beside them. That was more than a triumph either of force or diplomacy. It was the test of a long period of trial, and it meant that in a land where no race ever before trusted another, the Young Turks are making a nation out of chaos.

The task that confronts them to-day is still enormously difficult. They have to make something out of this timid and nerveless Parliament. They have to put manhood into feeble Ministers. They have without money to take up the immense business of constructive reforms. They must somehow work in the provinces with officials who may all be as untrustworthy or useless as those who allowed the old habit of massacre to return in Adana and Mersina. Hardest task of all, they have to impose themselves on the remoter Asiatic regions, where as yet their influence has scarcely begun to penetrate. Like everyone else in Turkey, they have probably learnt something from a crisis which so nearly jeopardised all their achievements. To us it seems doubtful whether even the gain to their organisation from keeping their ranks clear of placemen and self-seekers, is worth the loss to their country involved in the self-denying ordinance which forbids them to take office.

The part which diplomacy has played in this crisis would make a curious study, for which the materials are not yet available. Each Power seems to have suspected the others of supporting the Sultan against the Committee. That Sir Edward Grey has personally retained his sympathy for the Young Turks we are fully convinced. But there are grave reasons for doubting the tact with which he has been served by the Embassy staff in Constantinople. It seems to have allowed itself to contract a firm alliance with Kiamil Pasha, whose own conduct has been more than suspicious, while his associations with the "Liberal" plotters and their financial backers have been ruinous. The "Levant Herald" and the "Times" contrived between them to convince the Young Turks that they had lost the sympathy of official England. Their complete victory has already brought back the more than ever unstable "Times" to their side. But the simple and generous attitude of disinterested and trustful friendship has been seriously compromised by these infidelities. What part has been played in them, respectively, by finance, by personal ties, or by diplomatic complications caused by our Russian partnership and the feud with Germany, is difficult to measure. The general idea has often seemed to be rather to use Turkey than to help her. That, we are sure, was far from being the attitude of Sir Edward Grey. A new chapter has opened. It will be marked, we hope, on our side, by a less nagging criticism, a less calculating friendship.

---

THE WORLD'S SHORTAGE OF WHEAT.

The notion that some gigantic gambler across the sea can starve whole nations by cornering and withholding from the market the world-supply of wheat when it is running low has gained wide prevalence from the speculative operations of men like Mr. Leiter and Mr. Patten. But it has little support in fact. These dealers in imaginary wheat do not affect the production, or to any appreciable degree the distribution and consumption, of the real wheat which is brought for a time under their actual control. No doubt if a solid corner of the real world-supply could be formed and held, the monopolists could extort a huge ransom for the right to eat, and the poorer classes might be unable to pay it. But when the supply has run very short, the rise of price under "free competition" will impose a similar disability upon the poor. The only completely successful corner in wheat, as Mr. Patten reminds us, was Joseph's operation in Egypt, where he extorted the entire liberty and property of the whole nation as the price of corn from the public granaries. Up to the limit of the American tariff wall it might be possible for Mr. Patten and his friends to dictate prices inside America, though even there the suspension of the tariff, already vigorously demanded, would ease the situation by throwing the United States on the world-market. But even if it be true that Mr. Patten holds 15,000,000 bushels of wheat on the Great Lakes, and that he has netted a million pounds profit by his squeeze, it by no means follows that he is mainly responsible for the high price of wheat, and that his million has been made out of the starving masses. He will have to "loose" this wheat to dealers and consumers before the next harvest begins to come in, or he will lose his market. Nor will he sell to us, at any rate, as a monopolist. For, though his store may comprise the bulk of the present visible supply, it usually happens in such cases that watchful dealers in other places, often unknown to the trade, have been holding supplies which are called out by a sufficient rise of prices. Probably portions even of the last good harvest in this country are as yet unsold. More important still, the new crop from India will begin to come in about a month, helping to tide over the critical time between now and next September.

But though the Chicago corner is not responsible, the gravity of the situation is undeniable. It is attributable to a number of forces operating upon the supply and the demand for wheat. Though no great producing country suffered a complete collapse last year, there were poor harvests in a number of countries both last year and the year before, as the following computation of the world-supply will indicate:—

| | Quarters. |
|---|---|
| 1906 ... ... ... | 423,480,000 |
| 1907 ... ... ... | 389,815,000 |
| 1908 ... ... ... | 388,450,000 |

The acreage of wheat in the United States during recent years has failed to keep pace with her population, and though her diminishing contribution to the export supply is in course of compensation by the development of North-West Canada and Argentina, the readjustment is not yet complete. Moreover, within this last year Japan has been taking a considerable increase of wheat from the United States, and Germany has bought largely from Russia, while for intelligible reasons Roumania and the Balkans have recently dropped out of the list of exporting nations.

It is, no doubt, a melancholy fact that our conquest over Nature is still so incomplete that our necessary food supplies are still, to some extent, at the mercy of droughts, storms, crop diseases, and other incalculable and unpreventable accidents. But we are not utterly defenceless. The extension of cheap, rapid, and safe transport by sea and land has opened up large new sources of food supply in many distant quarters of the earth, and our wide commercial connections, with our system of free imports, have enabled us to take fuller advantage of these equalising forces than any other country. It is not true that our wheat supply is becoming more precarious either in quantity or in accessibility. Quite the contrary. Were we so crazy as to make ourselves dependent for wheat upon our own Imperial resources, we should at least once in every four years be placed in a predicament compared with which the present pinch is trivial. For, widely dispersed though our possessions are, they afford no sufficient variety to ensure a steadiness of supply and prices approaching that which our present open market procures for us. This is no matter of mere speculation. The following table shows how much more widely our Imperial supplies of wheat fluctuate than the supplies from foreign countries:—

| Countries. | 1900 | 1901 | 1902 | 1903 | 1904 | 1905 | 1906 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Per cent. | Per cent. | Per cent. | Per cent. | Per cent. | Per cent. | Per cent. |
| Argentina ... ... ... | 19·0 | 8·2 | 4·2 | 12·2 | 18·5 | 21·1 | 17·2 |
| Roumania ... ... ... | 0·8 | 0·5 | 2·2 | 2·7 | 1·3 | 1·8 | 3·3 |
| Russia ... ... ... | 4·6 | 2·5 | 6·1 | 14·8 | 20·1 | 21·8 | 13·4 |
| United States ... ... | 58·2 | 66·2 | 60·2 | 40·0 | 15·7 | 12·7 | 32·1 |
| Other foreign countries ... | 5·1 | 3·3 | 3·7 | 3·3 | 5·2 | 4·9 | 3·0 |
| Total foreign countries ... | 87·7 | 80·7 | 76·4 | 73·0 | 60·8 | 62·3 | 69·0 |
| Australia ... ... ... | 3·0 | 6·1 | 3·9 | — | 9·6 | 10·1 | 6·9 |
| Canada ... ... ... | 8·1 | 8·5 | 11·3 | 12·4 | 7·6 | 7·3 | 12·2 |
| India ... ... ... | — | 3·3 | 8·2 | 14·6 | 21·6 | 20·0 | 11·2 |
| Other British possessions | 1·2 | 1·4 | 0·2 | — | 0·4 | 0·3 | 0·7 |
| Total British possessions | 12·3 | 19·3 | 23·6 | 27·0 | 39·2 | 37·7 | 31·0 |

The world-harvest seldom fluctuates more than 10 per cent., but the harvest of the British Empire not seldom fluctuates to three times that amount. What conspicuous folly, then, it would be for us, who depend for full three-quarters of our wheat upon external sources, to weaken or withdraw a single one of our bases of supply! This argument applies in time of peace. But the really monumental folly of Imperial Preference would appear in time of war, with any nation strong enough at sea to menace our food supplies. For, though food still remains "conditional contraband," whether carried in belligerent or neutral vessels, the actual risk of capture and stoppage is far greater in the former than in the latter case, and the whole trend of international agreements is towards a discrimination in favor of neutral trade.

There remains, however, for consideration the really grievous issue raised by the effect of a high price of bread upon the condition of the poorer working classes. For most of our readers it may be of little personal import that the price of a quartern loaf has risen from 5d. to 6½d., or even 7d. But there is a considerable section of the people for whom this means an increase of ten, or even fifteen, per cent. in the total cost of living. And the income of these people is chronically fluctuating just above the bare physical subsistence point. What can such people do, and what can be done for them? Not only bread, but wheat-bread, remains for them the staff of life. Practically more conservative than Germans, our people will not have recourse to rye, and even oatmeal is adopted with reluctance as a supplementary food. The better-to-do workers will doubtless reduce their proportionate consumption of bread, using more largely other articles of diet without great damage. But the suffering and the injury to the poorest classes of a high price of bread, falling in a period of unemployment and irregular incomes, are indeed terrible. Should bread prices reach famine height, there will, doubtless, be an outbreak of charitable distribution. And a few more persons may be led to the reflection that the only safe remedy for the natural fluctuations in supply of wheat is to build up for all the workers a standard of wages and of subsistence high enough to enable them to bear without real suffering even so considerable an increase in the price of wheat.

THE GROWTH OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

After the gun-maker and the scare-monger, the doctrinaire. Start the idea that some concrete physical peril broods over the British nation in the shape of coming invasion by a powerful neighbor, and the perverted theorist and moralist come quickly in to persuade the people that they may go cheerfully forward to such an encounter with the full belief that religion and humanity are vain things, and that, in the words of the "Spectator" of last week, "war is the law of the civilised quite as much as of the uncivilised, and that mankind has as yet found no other way of settling which will is to prevail" in a clash of conflicting national purposes and interests. It is easy to preach this doctrine, based even less on the falsification than on the ignorance of history, because the argument jumps with an imposing mass of superficial sentiment, and because history is so often treated on purely national lines. But what substance lies behind it? How do the broad facts of individual and State life within the Christian and civilised ages bear it out? Let us see. Doubtless, when Christianity united itself to the world under Constantine the religion of peace was lost, and the universal humanity of a primitive faith disappeared in the practice of an earthly and earthy hierarchy. Then, indeed, anarchy and violence spread themselves over Roman Europe. For many ages under the banner of the Cross, as under the banner of the Crescent, Force and Fraud, Avarice and Ambition, Intolerance and Cruelty, marched together triumphant. In the Masque of Anarchy our poet-prophet saw such diabolic shapes moving along—

> "All disguised, even to the eyes,
> Like bishops, lawyers, peers, or spies."

Piety shrank into the cell and brooded in the cloister. Morality found nothing to choose between layman and cleric, between believer and unbeliever. But sometimes out of the darkness and tumult came the light of humanity and the voice of protest. Dante dreamed of peace. Erasmus, first of the humanitarians, a good European in every sense of the word, schemed for it. Grotius saw and developed the germs of an international law which should improve the relationship between States in time of peace and mitigate the barbarities of warfare. His book is said to have been read by Gustavus the Great, whose victory over Tilly in 1631 gave prestige to the new conception of a civilised and disciplined army. In England, too, not many years later, the superiority of serious and orderly troops over a licentious soldiery was proved by Cromwell. Yet so late as 1651 a distinguished jurist doubted "an in feminas et pueros bello victos saevire liceat!"

Since Grotius, the progress of international law and of a general conscience to support it has been steady and sustained. It moved but slowly at first, but it has gathered force, and in the last two centuries, and especially in the last twenty years, it has made almost miraculous strides. In the course of the seventeenth century, private war, which still flourished at its commencement in Germany and Austria, vanished; in the next century duelling began to decline. War as a method of converting nations to the orthodox faith, and torture as a method of converting individuals, went out of fashion together. The practice of hiring poisoners and assassins to remove their rivals, long congenial to Popes, monarchs, doges, and commanders-in-chief, was silently abandoned after innumerable Machiavellians had argued, with much learning and theological subtlety, on both sides of the question. As countries became better policed, and the means of communication improved, brigandage receded. On the high seas, the concomitant growth of commerce and of regular navies made piracy more and more precarious for those who wanted a quiet and lucrative profession in time of peace, though it was not until after the middle of the nineteenth century that the privateer—a pirate licensed to prey upon the commerce of an enemy in war time—was finally abolished by the Declaration of Paris.

It would be hard to say what causes have been most potent in lifting mankind out of the horrors of an almost perpetual state of war. But lifted it has been. If bad coin drives out good, it is equally true that, in the long run, good ideas drive out bad; and perhaps it is the invention of printing which has been the most powerful engine of advancement. Without it, the ideas of a Grotius, a Penn, an Abbé de Saint-Pierre, a Franklin, a Kant, or a Bentham could never have been circulated, and could not have turned the currents of thought and opinion. But the inventions of steam locomotion by land and sea, and of the telegraph, have been tremendous factors. Travelling facilities have brought all kinds of stranger nations together. Tokio is now as near to London as Edinburgh was two centuries ago, and the journey is far safer and more comfortable. By this means a mass of new international tissue has been securely woven into the fabric of human life. A banker's letter in London will finance a traveller all the world over. Postal arrangements are now international, as is the machinery of credit, food supply, insurance, and the assessment of Stock Exchange values. The growth of international commerce has been prodigious and irresistible. The natural interests that bind England to Germany or France are now so vast (and they are daily increasing) as almost to preclude the possibility of war. And the machinery of destruction, perfected as it is year by year by chemists and mechanics, has produced another kind of fear almost as potent in its appeal to the soldier as the danger of ruin to the merchant. Men like Lord Milner, who find their account in force alone, are surely blind to facts. If they cannot see the fruits of idealism, they might at least open their eyes to mechanical things, to the growth of an enlightened selfishness which is steadily undermining their position. The rise of organised democracy means, in the long run, that the classes which never gain by war are coming, largely through the machinery of conscription, into a position in which they can effectively prevent war. Most great European Governments no longer dispose of mere hireling forces; they have to satisfy their own soldiery—i.e., the nations —that the game of war is worth the candle. Even in the Franco-German war close observers of feeling in the conquering nation testified to the indifference—almost the sullenness—of the last detachments of German troops which were sent to the front. And everyone knows how "fed up" was the British Army in South Africa during the later stages of the Boer War.

The fanatical worshippers of force will have it that the disputes between nations can only be settled by war, because (they say) there is not, and can never be, an international army or police sufficiently strong to make the awards of international tribunals binding. How do they know that an international police force is impossible, or that any very crushing or considerable organisation of the kind would be necessary? A League of Peace is possible. A Concert of Europe is possible. A Hague tribunal has been created. Hundreds of difficult cases, embodied in more than eighty separate treaties, which in the old days would have provoked war, have been settled by arbitration; and the awards of international assessors have always been carried out, though no physical pressure has been used in their behalf. Conferences on all manner of subjects, from the laws of copyright to the postal service and the rules of land and sea war, have been held and settled amicably by conventions. International conventions are not more, but less, likely to be ignored and broken than national statutes. Whole sections of European territory have been permanently excluded from the zone of separate war, either by union with great Powers, or by international guarantees of their independence and territorial rights. The party of force thus scouts probabilities and ignores facts. It ignores, for example, the fact that, in most countries, the duel has practically disappeared without the intervention of law. So long as duelling seemed the right, proper, and sole means by which gentlemen could support their honor, the most drastic laws against duelling were of no avail. But when a new standard of good sense began to prevail, no legislator or policeman was required to destroy a custom which had grown up under a false chivalry; it merely withered away.

It is quite true that the Government even of a civilised State is often content with a rather low standard of international conduct. Statesmen will cling to the notion that they may do things in what they call national interests which they would be ashamed to do as individuals. But this notion also is dying out, because it has been found not to pay. Public opinion does not like to see those in authority disgracing it. A worthier emulation to lead the way in improvement is seen among the Great Powers. International conferences have disclosed an unsuspected willingness to co-operate. If it were not so, international law would begin to decline. But it grows. International courts are more firmly established and more widely appreciated every year. The preventability of war is more and more widely acknowledged, and there is no great country in which a strong and determined party cannot be found which looks with confidence to the adoption of a general scheme for the restriction of armaments, and counts upon bringing all the nations sufficiently into line to make such arrangements practical.

Life and Letters.

THE MAID.

From early morning last Sunday till evening came, the Square of St. Peter's in Rome and the interior of the great basilica itself were thronged from end to end with worshippers and pilgrims. The scene was brilliant with innumerable lamps, with the robes of many cardinals and the vestments of bishops, archbishops, and all the ranks of priesthood. The ceremony of adding one more to the calendar of the Blessed was performed, a solemn "Te Deum" was sung in praise of God's eternal greatness, and Pontifical Mass was celebrated, with all the splendor of ancient ritual and music of the latest harmony. In the afternoon Christ's Vicar himself entered from his palace, attended by fifteen cardinals, seventy of the archbishops and bishops of France, with an equal number of their rank from elsewhere, and, amid the gleaming lights of scarlet and gold, of green and violet, of jewels and holy flames, he prostrated himself before the figure of the Blessed One, to whom effectual prayer might now be offered even by the Head of the Church militant here on earth. Till late at night the vast cathedral was crowded with increasing multitudes assembled for the honor of one whom the Church, which judges securely as the world, commanded them to revere.

It was a simple peasant girl—"just the simplest peasant you could ever see"—whom the Head of the Church thus worshipped and crowds delighted to honor. Short and deep-chested she was, capable of a man's endurance, and with black hair cut like a boy's. She could not write or read, was so ignorant as to astonish ladies, and had only the peasant arts. The earliest description tells of her "common red frock carefully patched." "I could beat any woman in Rouen at spinning and stitching," she said to her judges, who, to be sure, had no special knowledge of anything beyond theology. "I'm only a poor girl, and can't ride or fight," she said when first she conceived her mission, and she had just the common instincts of the working woman. We may suppose her fond of children, for wherever she went she held the newborn babies at the font. She hated death and cruelty. "The sight of French blood," she said, "always makes my hair stand on end," and even to the enemy she always offered peace. "Or, if you want to fight," she sent a message to the Duke of Burgundy, "you might go and fight the Saracens." She never killed anyone, she said at her trial. Just an ordinary peasant girl she seemed—"la plus simple bergerette qu'on veit onques"—with no apparent distinction but a sweet and attractive voice. To be sure, she could put that sweet voice to shrewd use when she pleased. "What tongue do your Visions speak?" a theologian kept asking her. "A better tongue than yours!" she answered with the retort of an open-air meeting. But in those days there were theologians who would try the patience of a saint, and Joan of Arc is not a saint yet, having been only Beatified last Sunday, nearly five centuries after her death.

And she was only nineteen when they burnt her. At least, she thought she was about nineteen, but was not quite sure. Few years had passed since she was a child dancing under the big trees which fairies haunted still. Her days of glory had lasted only a few months, and now she had lain week after week in prison, weighed down with chains and balls of iron, watched day and night by men in the cell, because she always claimed a prisoner's right to escape if one could. Her trial before the Bishop of Beauvais and all the learning and theology of Paris University lasted nearly three months. Sometimes forty men were present, sometimes over sixty, for it was a remarkable case, and gave fine opportunity for the display of the superhuman knowledge and wisdom for which divines exist. Human compassion they displayed also, hurrying away just before the burning began one May morning, and shedding tears of pity over the sins of one so young. Indeed, their preachings and exhortations to her whilst the stake and fire were being arranged continued so long that the rude

English soldiers, so often deaf to the beauty of spiritual things, asked whether they were going to be kept waiting there past dinner-time.

However, the verdict of divine and human law could never be really doubtful from the first, for the charges on which she was found guilty comprehended many grievous sins. The inscription placed over her head as she stood while the flames were being kindled declared this Joan, who called herself the Maid, to be a liar, a plague, a deceiver of the people, a sorceress, superstitious, a blasphemer of God, presumptuous, a misbeliever in the faith of Christ, a boaster, idolatress, cruel, dissolute, a witch of devils, apostate, schismatic, and heretic. It was a heavy crime-sheet for a mere girl, and there was no knowing into what a monster she might grow up. So the Bishop of Beauvais could not well hesitate in pronouncing the final sentence whereby, to avoid further infection to its members, this rotten limb, Joan, was cast out from the unity of the Church, torn from its body, and delivered to the secular power, with a request for moderation in the execution of the sentence. Accordingly she was burnt alive, and the Voices and Visions to which she had trusted did not save her from the agony of flames.

At first sight the contrast between these two scenes, enacted by the authority of the same Church, may appear a little bewildering. It might tempt us to criticise the consistency of ecclesiastic judgment, did we not know that in theology, as in metaphysics, extreme contradictions are capable of ultimate reconciliation. The Church's attitude was, in fact, definitely fixed last January by the Papal proclamation declaring that the girl's virtues were heroic and her miracles authentic. We can only regret that the discovery was not made sooner, in time to save her from the fire, when her clerical judges came to the very opposite conclusion. Yet we must not hastily condemn them for an error which, even apart from theological guidance, most of us laymen would probably have committed.

Let us for a moment imagine Joan herself appearing in the England of to-day on much the same mission. It is not difficult to picture the contempt, the derision, the ribaldry, with which she would be greeted. In nearly every point her reception would be the same as it was, except that fewer people would believe in her inspiration. We have only to read her trial, or even the account given in "Henry VI.," to know what we should say of her now. There would be the same reproaches of unwomanliness, the same reminders that a woman's sphere is the home, the same plea that she should leave serious affairs to men, who, indeed, had carried them on so well that the whole country was worn out with perpetual panic of an enemy over sea. There would be the same taunts of immodesty, the same filthy songs. Since science has presumed to take the place of theology, we should talk about hysteria instead of witchcraft, and hallucination instead of demoniacal possession. Physiologists among their instruments would expound her enthusiasm as functional disorder of the thyroid gland. Historians among their books would draw parallels between her recurring Voices and the "tarantism" of the Middle Ages. The superior would smile with polite curiosity. The vulgar would yell in crowds and throw things in her face. The scenes of the fifteenth century in France would be exactly repeated, except that we should not actually burn her in Trafalgar Square. If she escaped the madhouse, the gaol would be always ready.

So that we must not be too hard on that theological conclave which made the mistake of burning a Blessed One alive. They were inspired by the highest motives, political and divine, and they made the fullest use of their knowledge of spiritual things. Being under such direction, they could not allow any weak sentiment of pity or human consideration to influence their judgment. Their only error was in their failure to discern the authenticity of the girl's miracles, and we must call that a venial error, since it has taken the Church nearly five centuries to give a final decision on the point. The authenticity of miracles! Of all questions that is, perhaps, the most difficult for a contemporary to decide. In the case of Joan's judges, indeed, the solution of this mystery must have been almost impossible, unless they were gifted with prophecy; for most of her miracles were performed only after her death, or at least only then became known. And as to the bare facts they knew of her life—the realities that everyone might have seen or heard, and many thousands had shared in—there was nothing miraculous about them, nothing to detain the attention of theologians. They were natural events.

For a hundred years the country had been rent and devastated by foreign war. The enemy still clutched its very centre. The south-west quarter of the kingdom was his beyond question. By treaty his young king was heir to the whole. The land was depopulated by plague and impoverished by vain revolution. Continuous civil strife tore the people asunder, and the most powerful of the factions fought for the invader's claim. Armies ate up the years like locusts, and there was no refuge for the poor, no preservation of wealth for men or honor for women. Even religion was distracted by schism, divided against herself into two, perhaps into three, conflicting churches. In the midst of the misery and tumult this girl appears, possessed by one thought only—the pity for her country. Modest beyond all common decency; most sensitive to pain, for it always made her cry; conscious, as she said, that in battle she ran as much risk of being killed as anyone else, she rode among men as one of themselves, bare-headed, swinging her axe, charging with her standard which all must follow, heartening her countrymen for the cause of France, striking the invading enemy with the terrors of a spirit. Just a clear-witted, womanly girl, except that her cause had driven fear from her heart and occupied all her soul, to the exclusion of lesser things. "Pity she isn't an Englishwoman!" said one of the enemy who was near her after a battle, and he meant it for the most delicate praise. In a few months she changed the face of her country, revived the hope, inspired the courage, rekindled the belief, re-established the unity, staggered the invader with a blow in the heart, and crowned her king as the symbol of national glory. Within a few months she had set France upon the assured road to future greatness. Little over twenty years after they burnt her there was hardly a trace of foreign foot upon French soil.

It was all quite natural, of course. The theologians who condemned her to death, and those who have now raised her to Beatitude, were concerned with the authenticity of her miracles, and there is nothing miraculous in thus raising a nation from the dead. Considering the difficulty of their task, we may forgive the clergy some apparent inconsistency in their treatment. But for ourselves, as mere laymen, we should be content to call any human being Blessed for the natural magic of such a history, and, compared to that deed of hers, we would not turn a street corner to witness the most astonishing miracle ever performed in all the records of the saints.

---

THE REVOLT OF THE POET.

The poets of the past wrote in revolt against their surroundings. So write also the poets of the present. The average citizen, in a cool hour, unjaundiced, will boast—or at least acknowledge—an immense amelioration. Freedom, toleration, spiritual and even material emancipation are accepted as natural as the sunshine and common air. Yet the poets seem none the less unhappy. Plato would have expelled them all from the Republic. He was convinced that their controversy was less with the remediable than with the irremediable ills of humanity. They stir up a discontent which cannot be directed to any fruitful issue, because it is discontent against the inevitable: the passing of youth into age, the lack of buoyancy and inspiration amongst those condemned to the mechanical work of the world; "quick-coming death"; the caprice and fickleness of love. However this may be, the life of the poet in twentieth-century

England is still a tragedy. It is tragedy even when the poet himself possesses indubitable genius and a secure appeal from the present to the future. It is tragedy unrelieved when that genius is still obscure, but hardly finding utterance, choked and impeded by waywardness or some twist or turn of nature, or just the inadequacy of the powers of expression for the thoughts conveyed. And such was the genius of John Davidson, who, after years of protest and indignation, appears to have effected an angry exit from life. Others have torn their days to pieces with bodily weaknesses or excesses, or turned aside, liko Ernest Dowson, simply shutting their eyes to the squalid and baffling present; or, like Francis Thompson, sought refuge in older, confident religions from the confusion of modern belief. There were occasions when this man attempted a similar flight from reality. In the "Fleet Street Eclogues," in some of the earlier songs and ballads of the seasons, in rejoicing over the return of spring or the splendor of the woods in autumn, he manifested a deliberate effort at escape—out to a world still clean and tranquil and beautiful, from all the dust and fury of men's disappointed days. Always he seemed drawn back as by a magnet into the vast city. The burden of it lay heavy upon him, stifling utterance. He spat out a fury of revolt against it; he broke into almost inarticulate curses and blasphemies against it; he hated whatever Providence was ruling over it; he hated the men who were making it what it was—arrogant, intolerant, blindly content. He came to hate himself for acquiescing in it. He has died—if he be dead—in protest.

The resolution to bring it to a close appears to have been deepened by two facts: the one was the possibility of painful disease coming to add discomfort to the malady of the soul: the other was the failure of all his later work to relieve him from poverty or to obtain recognition. It is pathetic to-day to look back upon the earlier praise of more than ten years ago, when the work of John Davidson, in its sincerity and vitality and strong relentless determination, was hailed as the promise of a new poetic dawn. "Scaramouch" was compared to "Shagpat," the early plays and romances hailed as possessing the "natural magic" of the Celt: Mr. Andrew Lang announced a belated pair of hands clapping that "remarkable book," the "Fleet Street Eclogues." "A type of the younger generation," Mr. Zangwill called him, "which is knocking at the door, and will assuredly vivify us with the breath of its new life and the ardor of its new song." And here was no grudging tribute of the few, rather a chorus of approval at evidence of work which, whatever its deficiencies, suffered from no sugary sweetness, and was a voice rather than an echo. The praise was not exaggerated. The earlier volumes remain to-day, rugged, irregular, often failing to attain their mark, lacking, except in certain isolated lines and passages, that beautiful setting for emotion which is the work of supreme art: but still revealing power, which was rightly hailed as opening rich promise for the future. It is a misfortune that no such verdict can be passed on his work to-day. No one expected much more from him than he has given already. His work was torn and jagged, deliberately mutilated (as it seems), while he hacked and stabbed at the life he saw around him. "The happy country tone" was lost in the "stormier note" of "men contention tost, of men who groan." Here, also, was as legitimate a subject for poetry as the earlier idylls, and there are poets who have revolted as fiercely whose voice has still maintained the quality of music. FitzGerald's epicurean pessimism is, perhaps, too slight an affair to be associated with deep reaction—rather revealing itself as a kind of pleasurable sadness over the wine-cup amid the roses—at the passing of love and the death of the flowers. Swinburne's assaults were made by one who always felt first the poetic impulse, the "reed" through which all sounds—even discordant injustices and tyrannies—were "blown into music." But in the work of James Thomson, a poet with temperament and indignation very similar to John Davidson, and perhaps a deeper neglect, the careless cruelty of the city and the intolerable injustices of God and man, became gathered into a sombre and magnificent vision of a City of Dreadful Night, with, brooding over it, the Melancholy that transcends all wit. Davidson effected no such unity. His impeachment lost power in rhetoric which sometimes became tedious in its catalogue of discontents, until the reader could almost see the pen spluttering under his hand. His later "testaments" and philosophic meditations are almost as unintelligible as the philosophic meditations of the later Browning, and will probably be forgotten as easily. He thought himself called to reveal an ultimate theory of life and destiny which was to replace all the older faiths, a combination of lessons learnt from Darwinism and Nietszche and sundry "materialistic" and "iconoclastic" authors, all garnished and flavored by the bitterness of individual failure. The creed has perished with him—without a disciple. It is a deeper charge against it that, in the effort after its exposition, there perished also his poetic genius.

"I have shown you," he declared in the preface to "The Testimony of John Davidson," "the litter and broken bits of a shattered society, the débris and wreckage of Christendom, clamoring to be put together again—after a pattern of its own." Nothing, he believes, can effect that rebuilding. He examines certain items in this ruin: lecturing Ireland on its demand for self-government that shall include Ulster, railing at representative Government, mocking at the demand of the women for the vote, announcing that marriage is dependent on property, and that "when men have no lands and money to bequeath, a son of their own blood will be of no consequence." "For my part," he asserted, "I have come out of it all, and have found another abode for my mind and imagination, not in any symbol of the Universe, which Christendom was, but in the Universe itself." And so he lays down the new gospel, which, indeed, is suspiciously like many old gospels, with some scientific jargon added. "There is no other world: there never was anything that man has meant by other world: neither spirit, nor mystical behind-the-veil: nothing not ourselves that makes for righteousness: no metaphysical abstraction." But there is matter, beginning as one "unponderable ether, oblivious, omnisolvent": lightening "the first emergence of the ponderable from the imponderable: fermentation in the "eternal ether" cells, electrons, the first limitation of matter: eddying vortices: atoms: evolutions: metalloids and metals: finally, man and woman arrived at by life through geological periods by natural selection. "Man" he hails as "the very form and substance of the universe, the material of eternity, eternity itself become conscious and self-conscious." "This is the greatest thing told since the world began." What, in the name of God or the ether, asks the indignant reader, as he wades through obscure and difficult attempts to set all this to blank verse, has this pseudo-scientific concoction to do with poetry? "Glory to man in the Highest," cried Swinburne, "for man is the master of things." But he found that glory in the present experience—of exultation, agonies, love, an unconquerable mind. Davidson loses these impressions of splendor in a revolt against present experience, scarcely mitigated by attempts to describe the development from the primeval electron to present bewildered humanity.

But to the poet it came as an inspiration. He proclaimed himself the apostle of a new faith which was to redeem mankind from all the old scourges which he traced to Christendom. With Lucretius he associated the destruction of the gods with an act of emancipation. No sadness accompanied the ruin of heaven, the fall of the gates of pearl and courts of jacynth and shattered crysolite. He exults with rejoicing over the collapse of belief in the soul and in a future life. Man is exalted, asceticism blasphemy against the human god: Sex triumphant.

"Like leprosy, the soul
With all its noisome blotches, ulcers, blains,
Of evil conscience, penances, remorse,
Contrition, sloughs, now crumbles into nought,
Leaving the proud, sweet body, clean and pure
The wholesome earth, the sun, the Universe,
Infinite loveliness, ethereal power."

"You are the Universe," says Mammon to Guendolen, "and everything that is. This is the thing the world is waiting for, this that I tell you." And what Mammon told Guendolen, Davidson told the world—believing with an intense, pathetic seriousness that this message was that for which all humanity was waiting. It was a message of destruction—écraser l'infâme. It was a message of exhilaration; destined (as he thought) to bring summer into men's lives.

"Were I unloosed
I should upheave this vault and batter down
The buttress of the Church that hides high Heaven—
Heaven and the heavens, showing you far and wide
The immaculate, material Universe,
All radiance, darkness, beauty, glory, power."

"We can never know enough," he wrote in the epilogue to "Mammon," "that man is the Universe capable of self-consciousness, that there is nothing higher than man. This is the knowledge that will change the world."

It is a knowledge that brought no summer into this man's life. With one voice he is hailing man as God; with another, he is exhibiting man blind and weak and brutal, the plaything and sport of chance and jealousies. What message of transformation does the great discovery bring to the hero of that gaunt and bitter ballad of "Thirty Bob a Week"—who awoke "a million years before the blooming sun," a little sleeping seed, and "always went according to the laws" until he had attained consummation in that dreariest hell of hopeless acquiescence? "Thy will be done," he flares out. "You say it if you durst!"

"They say it daily up and down the land
As easy as you take a drink, its true;
But the difficultest go to understand
And the difficultest job a man can do
Is to come it brave and meek with thirty bob a week
And feel that that's the proper thing for you."

The difficulty is fairly faced in the ballad of the making of a poet: when, fleeing from the hard and (to him) unbelievable puritan theology of Scotland to the worship of Apollo and Aphrodite, the young dreamer confronts the vision of man as God with the reality of men as men—a "god that lies and steals and murders": "passionate, dissolute, incontinent"; a god that starves in thousands:—

"Whose nostrils in a palace breathe perfume,
Whose cracking shoulders hold the palace up,
Whose shoeless feet are rotting in the mire."

He determines then to walk another path; to listen to the tune of Nature's heart; to be a thoroughfare for all the pageantry of Time; to put aside all creeds. So long as he was faithful to his resolution he produced poetry: now a passionate expresssion of Nature's moods, the Romney Marshes, in Epping Forest, gazing from the northern heights over the monstrous city or from other heights over vaster and more splendid plains:—

"Where everlasting mountains flung
Their shadows over tower and town,

The adventurous sun took heaven by storm,
Clouds scattered largesses of rain,
The sounding cities, rich and warm,
Smouldered and glittered in the plain."

When this resolution failed, and he embraced a faith as dogmatic, compelling, and intolerant as any of the older creeds, his inspiration departed.

Two years ago, at the age of fifty, "nine-tenths of my time," he was compelled to write, "and that which is more precious, have been wasted in the endeavor to earn a livelihood." "For half a century I have survived in a world entirely unfitted for me," "having known both the Heaven and the Hell thereof." The thought of suicide recurs in his later work. "So men should die," says Prince Mammon:

"It shall become again a shameful thing
To wait in debile age, a pap-fed dotard
Shunning disdainful death."

The "last journey" which closes "The Testament of John Davidson" is a nobly-written confession of defeat and weariness:—

"My feet are heavy now, but on I go,
My head erect beneath the tragic years,
The way is steep, but I would have it so;
And dusty, but I lay the dust with tears,
Though none can see me weep; alone I climb
The rugged path that leads me out of time—
Out of time and out of all,
Singing yet in sun and rain,
Heel and toe from dawn to dusk,
Round the world and home again."

"Scotland sent him forth," it could be said of him as of another, "a Herculean man. Our mad Babylon wore and wasted him with all her engines." And if it cannot be continued, "he sleeps with his fathers in that loved birthland," yet the end is common to both—as to all—"Babylon with its deafening inanity rages on; but to him henceforth innocuous, unheeded—for ever."

THE LABORER'S LISTLESSNESS.

On a recent Saturday Mr. G. K. Chesterton discoursed in a column of the "Daily News" on the English shepherd of to-day. He described him as "a beery, bloated, stunted yokel," remarking at the same time that "this is the picture, not of the natural, but of the artificial shepherd." In a passage as admirable as it is true, he enumerated the artificers who have labored at the production of this work of art. "A fastidious aristocracy framed and proportioned that figure; the men who stole the Abbey lands whipped him (literally) into shape; the enclosure of commons enclosed him more and more in an artistic frame; he was long rubbed down and polished by the squires; and the last touch was given to him by the hunger of the 'forties and the far-off madness of the city."

The true history of the making of the English peasant is here succinctly set forth in half-a-dozen lines of newspaper; and that history should be weighed and pondered by all who consider the finished product. The present writer cannot agree with Mr. Chesterton that the peasant of to-day is "bloated"; that he is "stunted" is true enough. Neither, in the great majority of cases, can he fairly be described as "beery." When this is the case, it often seems his one redeeming virtue, the most human and genial thing about him. The impression that South English rustic life would make on a hasty observer would be that the laborers were a half-witted, brutalised, anæmic horde. This would not be a true impression, but it is the first impression that would strike the observer looking with his own eyes at the facts as they are. A deeper view would come later, but the honest inquirer would begin with this.

"The destruction of the poor is his poverty," is, if the writer remembers, a text of the Bible. The poverty of the poor is the all-excusing, all-explaining fact which their mentors of the upper classes seem incapable of realising. It happens, for instance, again and again that a little child is burned to death through playing near the fire in a flannelette night-gown. "You know the danger," says the Coroner to the mother, "why didn't you get a fireguard?" But a fireguard costs at the very least a shilling. The man's earnings are fifteen shillings a week, three of which go every week for rent. A fireguard is one of numberless things which "better-class" people take for granted, but which have to be bought with shillings and florins and half-crowns. But all the money the man can earn is wanted for bread. In normal cases he has a shilling a week for beer and 'baccy. It is held by many that this shilling should not be spent in this way—that it should be used, say, to buy tooth-brushes for the children. This appears, to say the least, to be asking a great deal of human nature.

The historical retrospect given by Mr. Chesterton, and the life they lead at the present day, explains the grudging malignity and bitterness which is ingrained in the whole peasant class. This bitterness is not felt so much against their "betters," as against people of their own station, who by some means or other have managed to gain for themselves more of the ease and pleasantness of life. The writer remembers a cottage woman one summer evening leaning over her garden gate watching the trim figure of a young village girl go by on her bicycle. "Lord, how I should like to see she fall off," was the comment he caught as he passed. The girl was a clever dressmaker, who had saved money enough to buy a machine. This is their continual feeling towards one another.

Their necessary absorption in the most contracted routine, and in the wearing, grinding struggle to exist, must be borne in mind by those who are startled by the complete want of imagination which they display, the absolute lack of interest in anything outside the narrow circle of the things amongst which they live and work. The writer recently endeavored—much, indeed, against his better judgment, but knowing from long experience that at any rate he could do no harm—to startle some of them from their lethargy by portraying the terrors of the impending German invasion. He did not succeed in creating a ripple of interest in a single mind. His lurid pictures were received with complete indifference. One woman said, "Oh! indeed," and immediately entered into a long narration of how the schoolmaster had refused to give the key to Mrs. Portsmouth. A man, apparently thinking that "the news" was all one subject, and that anything contained in the same newspaper was relevant to the discussion, said that in America a lady had got £2,000 damages from a railway company for an injury to her knee, whereby she was disabled from kneeling at prayers. This was his sole comment on the "war scare." It must be borne in mind that War, Europe, Germany, England, are words which convey no meaning to their minds. One has known women whose husbands were in the South African war who had not the least idea that battles were real. The war was looked upon as a sham fight on an immense scale in distant lands.

In matters not immediately connected with their work there is almost no observation of nature among the rustic poor. They will assure you, for instance, that butterflies turn into chrysalises, or tell you that the lanes are lit up with glow-worms on a frosty winter night. Time was when they gave names, like "Charles's Wain" to the constellations, or called the Milky Way "the Walsingham Way," because it lighted pilgrims on their way to Walsingham. In France the popular name for it was "la voie de St. Jacques," the way trodden by St. James when he went before Charlemagne to lead him to fight against the Moors. It would be almost impossible to-day to find an English farm laborer who distinguishes the Milky Way from the vague mass of stars. The writer remembers a cottage family who found it exquisitely ludicrous that a lady had tried to teach them the constellations.

There are, of course, weak and strong characters among them, those who miserably succumb, and those who by continual fighting "hold their own." The long fight goes on with poverty and illness—it is little wonder that when the fighting instinct has so constantly to be exercised, its operations should not be confined to circumstances, but should be extended to persons, to the neighbors or the clergymen. A certain undaunted gaiety, a resolute determination to make the best of things is required if they are not to be altogether submerged in the misery of their lot. This is sometimes found. Squire Osbaldiston, in running over the list of his sons, remembered that "Archie was hanged." One of the boys of a numerous family known to the writer once spent three months in prison. His mother euphemistically refers to this period as "when my Jackie was in the Home."

There are here and there æsthetic stirrings. A woman told the writer that in her youth she had composed a poem which had caused many people to say that "if she'd studied and give her mind to such things she'd have got on with it as a good many had done." She recited the poem, which was of interminable length, and consisted of a description of the cottage in which she lived, which was known as "Horner's Hut." It had this peculiarity that the second and fourth lines of each verse ended with the same word. Thus the first verse ran:—

"Horner's Hut's a very nice place,
Surrounded by woods and trees,
But now it don't look quite the same,
For the leaves are off the trees."

From internal evidence the poem appears to have been written in November. It was inscribed on a long scroll of paper pinned to the wall of the cottage, and was read and admired by all visitors. The good woman often recited it for her own solace, whilst at work.

There is in England between the rich and the educated on the one hand, and the poor on the other, a great gulf fixed, so that they who would pass from either side cannot. It is very questionable if this gulf has been really crossed, even, say, by the author of "A Poor Man's House." Mr. Galsworthy, in his recent novel "Fraternity," makes Hilary say to the model "Don't talk like that; every woman is a lady." "The stolidity of the girl's face, more mocking far than any smile, warned him of the cheapness of this verbiage." One has sometimes had the same experience in telling country boys that "every decent lad is a gentleman."

On the evening of last Easter Sunday the writer called at a cottage on his way to dinner at a pleasant house. He found the wife sitting miserably over a tiny fire with two listless and unoccupied little boys on their respective stools. Her husband was a carpenter, and she complained sadly of the four days' holiday which he was obliged by his employers to take, during which time there would be no pay. It was then a quarter past seven, and the man himself had gone to bed. "Tom generally goes to bed after tea," his wife said. On the bare deal table there was no sign of food. Half-an-hour afterwards one was having warm and pleasant food of various kinds amid lights and flowers and the gay, careless humor of boys home for the holidays from Cambridge and London. Gerald complained of the antics with which Reggie (aged sixteen months and clad in a red velvet pelisse) had indulged at his christening:—"Why should my christening have been turned into a scene of confusion by Reggie?" he asked. But one could not get the former dreary picture out of one's mind.

The one good and to some extent happy thing in the farm laborers' lives is their work in the open air. One has heard a young farm lad talk of the work of the farm and its varied operations with a fresh, eager interest, as of the one important thing, the one thing that mattered, and was really worth doing. There is no gaiety among the English rustics now, but it is not unpleasing to think of a solemn group of them over their beer in the ale house, or in the West Country over their brown mugs of cider, repeating the sacred traditional formulæ, the refrains in the pauses of the year, with which, bent and bowed and crippled as they are, the children of those who for centuries have starved and stolen, they assist at the great drama of summer and winter, seed-time and harvest—the one tenet of their religion, the drama that will not cease till the end of the world.

---

TOWN AND COUNTRY MICE.

We have to deplore the dwindling of many of our animals, but the rodent tribe still faithfully fills all the small corners in the economy of nature for which it was designed. Theirs is the blessing of the meek. The fierce marten and polecat are on the verge of extinction; the nocturnal and peaceful, though inconvenient, badger tries with indifferent success to hold his own; the swift fox is only permitted to exist on condition that he makes sport for the still swifter fox-hound. But the rabbit yields up her life without protest, as though secure in the knowledge that there are five little rabbits to come after her, and rats, mice, and voles furnish tons of carcases annually for cats, owls, hawks, and vipers, and are still as common as ever. Either one of them is ready to eat us up if a single hostile wheel should fall out of order, and, in spite of every persecution, each of them has its scouts within our lines.

There is the proverbially silent house mouse, which while we sit before the fire comes out and flits about the white hearth like a moveable blot, seeming to amuse itself by appearing in all manner of unexpected places. We would gladly spare it if it were guaranteed to be the only one of its kind here. But we know that our kindness would be repaid with a family of half a dozen and by four more families of half a dozen each before we were three months older. So the cat and the traps are kept very busy, and still the unwelcome breed flourishes in the wall-spaces and floor-spaces of the house.

The house mouse is the town mouse, whether he live in a country mansion or in the midst of slums. Our little flitterling of the hearth is a combination of fine gentleman and street arab. He takes a pride in his personal appearance, and his vanity evidently extends to delight in the observation of the human being he has adopted as his patron. But it must be observation at a distance. His eyes, set a little wide apart on a rather hatchetty face, and very prominent, see askance almost as well as in front. His ears are wide and thin to catch every sound and locate it in the world of strange echoes that a house must represent. His nose is alert for every message in that direction, and the fine vibrissæ on his muzzle stand for a sixth sense of which we have no conception. He is the figure of watchfulness against danger, and also the figure of curiosity and daring up to the very gate of danger.

On the other hand, take the vole, a rodent, but not technically a mouse, though sufficiently well named by us country people "short-tailed field-mouse." He has a broad, flat, farmer's face, with the eyes set close together, and his ears are almost lost in a bushy growth that resembles the bucolic beard. Not living in a world of continuous noise, he can keep out of the way very well by taking note of the tremors of the earth when men and other enemies walk upon it, and, to be on the safe side, he usually moves through tunnels in the long grass. When the snow was on the ground we saw here and there a short track where his run had broken out into the open, and then, following up the tunnel, were astonished at his activity under that wintry scene. In nose he does not yield to the town mouse, and wherever in the fields or outhouses there is food that appeals to him, there we find him. Potatoes, peas (just planted in their rows) crocus bulbs, acorns, are good enough for him, and he has not followed the epicure house mouse into the bee-hives after the honey in the honey-comb. The vole rarely comes into the house, whereas the hearth mouse is capable of making long excursions into the field. We have just found three of them far out in the garden, snugly camped out in the blankets of a bee-hive that had too large an entrance.

The house mouse is a thing all nerves and sensibility. Civilisation has made kittle cattle of it. Creatures out of doors are so stoical under pain that the casuist easily persuades himself that they feel no pain, and cannot be the subject of cruelty. But anyone must be convinced of the contrary when he has caught a house-mouse in a live trap. It is trembling with fear, and actually drenched with perspiration from the obvious mental agony—deliberate anthropomorphism this—into which its mishap has thrown it. The wood mouse shares this in some degree when we catch it in the box-trap designed for weasels and stoats, but the vole is as stoical as Fennimore Cooper's red Indians under torture. So, by the way, is the rabbit, which, with a ferret gnawing at its back, often utters no sound, and sits apparently chewing the cud as imperturbably as an ostler with a straw between his lips.

We found the other day in a corner of the tool shed a nest of the "wee timorous beastie," for undoubtedly the "mouse" of which Burns wrote was the field vole. There were five or six helpless babies in the nest, and while we watched, the mother vole came for them one by one, and carried off the whole family to a safer retreat. While we stayed quiet there was no hesitation in her coming and going. Her straight, narrow-set eyes pointed straight to the family to be fetched, and she came at them in a straightforward, one-ideaed way. A slight movement on our part gave a contrary impulsive stimulus. She checked in her path, but with her eyes still fixed on the major attraction. Then she came on again, and, the power increasing with the nearness of the object, she rushed the last few inches, seized one of the naked youngsters, and bolted as best she could for the retreat. We do not believe that the hearth-mouse would have come for her young at all under like circumstances. She would accept the first adverse verdict as final, and, mourn as she might, would make no attempt at appeal. Civilisation has thus far killed the primal maternal impulse without having put in its place, as it has done for us, a social standard of what it is right for even the most timid and the most philosophic to suffer in defence of a fellow-creature.

The vole, like the rabbit, is sociable, but not social. The devotion of the individual to the community does not rise to the height that it reaches in the vizcacha, the members of one colony of which will, according to Mr. Hudson, travel far in order to dig out their neighbors who have been buried in their township by the ranchers of the pampas. There is a favorite corner of the field below the garden, where we can always find a colony of voles. They drill their neat holes very near to one another, but rarely, if ever, share a common entrance. It is difficult to see how they gain by this colonising habit, while the kestrel by day and the owl by night find their work comparatively easy, thanks to the hunting-ground being so circumscribed. Probably there is a sentinel, delegated by the community, or self-appointed, usually ready to give warning from which all the others may profit. More likely, the hourly sacrifice of one of the voles is cheap because it scares hundreds instead of few or none, as it would do if each vole family lived apart. Twenty-four casualties a day may seem a heavy toll, and is, no doubt, in normal times seldom reached, but when a large colony is bringing forth its thousands of young every week it can stand a far greater drain and still go on increasing to plague dimensions. In the great Scottish vole years of 1901 and 1902 the local owls were reinforced by hundreds of the short-eared species from the Continent, which nested there and reared several broods of young in a single season, some of them with twice the usual number of chicks. It was a superb battle of mice and birds, though it is not certain that without the intervention of man the birds would have won. Most probably so, however, for, while more mice led always to more owls, they also meant less grass, and thus fewer and weaker mice to withstand more and hungrier enemies. We are content to have the balance perennially even, or oscillating without marked sensation. A mouse or two in its place is an addition to the interest of the field, or even the house, and we can sleep without worrying at the potential volcano of vitality that they represent.

---

The Drama.

THE POWER OF THE YELLOW PRESS.

The intelligent person and the lover of poetic work may concern themselves with two kinds of drama—that which deals with universal ideas and feelings, and that whose special object is to criticise (not to photograph) the life of the times. Work that does not answer one or other of these needs is bound to go to the dust-heap. The question is: Which kind of play is this age better able to produce? The widest and most intimate forms of imaginative production are sustained by one living writer only, and he has not often chosen the stage for his medium. But all the civilised nations tend to self-examination. And the play furnishes, perhaps, the most apt, the most lurid, material of such criticism. So, in spite of the Lord Chamberlain, the managers, and the dramatic critics, who all combine to keep the stage frivolous, immoral, and stupid, the more or less conscience-stricken, at least the serious and inquisitive, drama goes on, and, incidentally, all playgoers may own their obligations to Miss Lena Ashwell for her services in keeping it alive. For this reason, it seemed to me more important to see a play like "The Earth," which deals with a characteristic feature of modern life, the growth of the Yellow Press, than Mr. Tree's brilliant re-setting of "The School for Scandal."

"The Earth," by Mr. James Bernard Fagan, is a play with a very interesting and apposite subject—that is to say, the power of a common minded, non-moral, highly self-centred man, controlling so many newspapers that, by concealing their common ownership and using them for his private ends, which he persuades himself are public objects, he can bend national opinion to his will. Now we all know this to be a real problem of our modern British life. But it seems to me that Mr. Fagan has not asked himself the question what ends such a person as his Sir Felix Janion is likely to pursue, or, if he has asked it, he has not supplied the right answer. The quality which most clearly appears in our yellow journalism is its trade instinct. The sensational paper is a shop; its proprietor is a cheap-jack. It does not want power so much as customers—customers rich and poor, above stairs and below stairs, and if it can suck from the printed page the last farthing's-worth of profit that this steadily pursued object opens up, it is content. In the process, it may incidentally select or reject this or that political party, and may seek to exalt or to depress the personalities that favor or retard its pursuit. It may ingratiate itself with one set of buyers or advertisers, or (as in the case of the soap libels) may seek to intimidate another. But thanks to its general commercial bent, and to the tolerably tight provisions of the law of libel, it will steer clear of dangerous political adventures. For such enterprises it has neither the brains nor the courage. Its line, in this country at least, is rather that of the faux bonhomme, an affectation of universal friendliness and good nature, the opening of its columns to a scheme of general advertisement of everybody but the rival it wants to crush. Behind this affected geniality, the "business" ends of the promoters, whatever they may be, will go on. But private blackmail, which is the special device of Sir Felix Janion, is one of the less likely of their instruments.

Mr. Fagan, however, has chosen his theme from this form of tyranny by newspaper in order to give the sharpest possible edge to his sketch of the malign influence of a man with eighty journals and no conscience. Of the type of publication he has in mind he has obviously made a pretty careful and not untruthful study. His Sir Felix Janion, like the brigand chief in "Fra Diavolo," works from the inside of the society on which he preys. He runs his papers from his country house as well as from "Janion Buildings." His guests are either his victims or his accomplices. He brings down a statesman in order to pump him, and, when that device fails, to spy on him and blackmail him. Business is his real, as against his masked, life. He carries on his papers through a telephone in his garden, in which the very rhododendrons are vulgar. He "runs" everything—crime, dirt, social gossip, religion, Liberalism, Toryism, everything, it seems, but Socialism, in which this patriot soul foresees the ruin of the land he loves. His papers deal in transferable stories; they live on sensation; they invent and embroider, dwell "in the street," and descend to the gutter; and would rather discredit themselves, and contradict their own news, than give a rival journal the advantage of an "exclusive" piece of information. And here and there Mr. Fagan's touch is both powerful and subtle. It is clever of him, for example, to make Sir Felix turn instantly, and without apparent discomfiture, from his failure to blackmail a statesman to the business of "negotiating" a football article and running a "cyclopædia for infants."

Much less good, less profitable, is the blackmailing theme on which the play is made to run. Here Mr. Fagan betrays lack of knowledge, and, more conspicuously, of the subtlety with which Mr. Granville Barker, in "Waste," analyses the motives and operations of the politician. Why should Sir Felix Janion, tradesman as he is, develop a passion for stopping Mr. Trevena's anti-sweating Bill? Because he thinks its sentimentalism imperils the public interest. Mr. Fagan comes near the truth about Sir Felix Janion's type of journalism when he makes him fight, even against his own interest as a dealer in sensation, a measure which is meant to cut sharply at the power of wealth. But I hardly think this was in his mind, and, if it was not, the Janion character is twisted clear out of proportion. Nor has he created in Trevena, the author of the Bill, a type strong enough to act as a dramatic foil to Janion's ruthless meanness. I can assure him that even Radical statesmen, those butts of the stage satirist, do not privately drivel about social reform after the fashion of the phantom Trevena, and that they might conceivably, in a moment of undue exaltation, kick downstairs (personally or by proxy) an inconceivable piece of impudence like Sir Felix Janion.

But after all he has only just missed. His play is not dramatic enough. It is too much like a photograph, with its local color laboriously laid down, not lightly and graphically sketched. Yet it comes near powerful and deep-searching drama. Here, no doubt, yellow journalism does not blackmail statesmen to abandon a policy in order to be spared an exposure of a private entanglement. But what are its methods in America, in Germany? And how far would Mr. Fagan have been wrong if, with a more vivid and penetrating intelligence, he had pitted the true motives of our Janions against the real weakness of modern statesmanship, its love of réclame, and its consequent fear of mean opinion and common sensationalism? As it is, his characters want depth and consistency. The political talk is on the shallowest surface of things. Neither the sentimental Trevena nor the brutal Janion gets beyond or beneath the rhetoric of the platform. Trevena's intrigue with Lady Killone is an old subject, the situation does not ripen into a very profound or moving play of human interest, and Janion's low exploitation of it, his personal spying on a guest, his coarse detective work on an old friend and school-fellow, are devices of melodrama rather than true developments of mind and character. But the play is a thing to be seen, for it is truthful after its fashion, and both sincere and bold.

Moreover, it is illuminated by the work of an artist of singular power and distinction. Mr. Norman McKinnel will go far—farther, perhaps, than any English actor since Irving. For he sets up in the playgoer the intellectual curiosity that only artists of a singular and original stamp can arouse. His face is worth close watching, for, like Coquelin's, it is a most expressive mask. His conception of Janion was exactly right. He showed the vulgar, but not over-vulgar, man of power—made up of coarse, direct intellect and simple, self-centred will—the kind of Napoleon-Scapin whom Mr. Fagan meant, but was not quite able, to draw. His face exhibited the entire commonplaceness, the moral obtuseness, the unfeeling harshness of such a type, and yet did not exaggerate or distort it with one touch of melodrama. The most difficult incident in such a representation was the moment when Janion, confronted with Lady Killone's reckless woman's threat to ruin her lover, herself, and Janion together, by a full disclosure of the parts that all have played in the drama of blackmail, turns tail and abandons his object. The actor hid his face till it had settled again into that of the director of "The Earth" in its normal and more benign mood. Miss Ashwell's part is to show in turns the wretchedness of an ill-mated woman, and her passionate tenderness to the man of her choice. She does both very well.

H. W. M.

Art.

THE NEW GALLERY.

THE change in the conduct of the summer exhibitions at the New Gallery is one that should have taken place long ago. This fact, however, does not make it less welcome. Briefly put, the innovations are as follows: The two directors, who have practically controlled the Gallery since its inception, retain their position as directors, but the control has passed from their hands into those of a body of artists who pay subscriptions, elect their own hanging committee, and otherwise manage the summer exhibitions in much the same way as any other art society would manage them. The summer exhibitions are now divided into two portions, the second of which, due to open on June 21st, may be partly retrospective if the exhibitors so choose. All exhibitors have been elected by votes, painters voting for painters, sculptors for sculptors, and so forth. The exhibitions are reserved entirely for the works of these, and their number is strictly limited.

We are not concerned with the question whether this scheme of reorganisation is the best that could have been devised, but it has certainly been attended by most beneficial effects on the character and arrangement of the exhibition just opened. Theoretically nothing could have been better calculated to ensure a satisfactory collection of pictures than the annual visits paid by the directors to the studios for the purpose of selecting works. In practice, however, this custom, which answered very well at first, became in later days a lamentable failure, and we cannot pretend to regret its disappearance. Under the new arrangement there are fewer exhibits, and they are hung with greater regard to artistic merit than has been the case for many years past. A few well-known painters long identified with the Gallery appear to have withheld their support from the new society, or to have been left uninvited by its organisers; but there are new and welcome adherents, such as Mr. Charles Shannon, and, on the whole, we notice the absence of reputable artists less than that of the many exhibitors under the old system whose qualifications for exhibiting were recognised by the New Gallery directors alone. Indeed, the elimination of rubbish from every part of the Gallery, including the balcony, is one of the most pleasant events to be placed on record; the suppression of the unwelcome nonentity appears to have been complete. At the same time, one or two features of former New Gallery shows have been retained. We refer especially to the neo-pre-Raphaelite group of artists, working for the most part in tempera, to Mrs. Evelyn de Morgan, Mrs. Adrian Stokes, Mr. Joseph Southall, and other talented craftsmen, who are represented here as strongly as ever they were, and are seen to even better advantage.

In its essence, therefore, the twenty-second summer exhibition marks a satisfactory stage in the development of the New Gallery. At the same time, it is rather doubtful whether the improvement in quality, pronounced as it is, corresponds exactly with the changes in the exhibiting personnel. The list of artist-subscribers is a particularly strong one; it might be more representative in regard to the modern element, but still it includes a very sound section of the artistic community. One might expect, therefore, that the exhibits, regarded individually as well as collectively, would give the impression of strength and of talent far in excess of that displayed at the average artists' gallery. As a matter of fact, this was not the impression we received. A good few exhibitors of established reputation hardly do themselves justice. Others, whose reputations are still in the making, are not likely to add to them by the work by which they are represented. In one instance, at any rate, there is the distressing spectacle of a young painter who, having obtained recognition for a picture showing a certain effect of diffused sunlight, seems to have stereotyped that effect for use in all subsequent pictures. Even an artist of Mr. Hornel's calibre reproduces in his picture, "The Blackbird's Song," the weaknesses rather than the virtues of his individual talent; and Mr. Hughes Stanton's big square "Mountain Road, Provence," offends, despite its many admirable qualities, by the ungracefulness of its composition. Some allowance must, of course, be made for the circumstance that the general standard of work is very much higher. A passably good picture, surrounded by others almost equally good, does not tell in the Gallery as it did when its neighbors were very greatly inferior. Similarly, the conscious or unconscious tendency of the spectator is to judge the work from a loftier standpoint, in short, to be more critical. Another probable reason for the disappointing results that detailed examination reveals here and there, may be found in the fact that the new régime has not yet had time to get into working order. The last few summer exhibitions at the New Gallery have, moreover, shaken the confidence of the educated public, and, to a certain extent, of the capable artists who have supported them, and this confidence will have to be restored before the new system can do itself justice.

Meanwhile, if some of the big pictures by big painters appear to us to be perfunctory exhibitions of skill rather than representative specimens of the best art their producers are capable of, a few of the smaller works remain very pleasantly in one's memory. To Mr. Charles Shannon's sterling sense of design we owe the decorative panel "Winter" in the South Room; to the same artist's Venetian color inheritance the softly sumptuous "Mermaid" in the West Gallery. Then Mr. C. W. Bartlett, weaving blue-bloused peasant and cherry-bloused woman and black-and-white cattle into landscape harmony of browns and greens, or peopling a tavern interior with picturesque visitors of the like description, achieves in his water-colors, by sheer instinct for the decorative juxtaposition of colors kept religiously subdued, a strength of character that enables his work easily to hold its own among the oil paintings by which it is surrounded. Mr. Cayley Robinson's blue and white "The Farewell," painted in tempera, has an unimpeachable grace of line; though the severity of the treatment associates it with the idea of a wall decoration in a severely imposing building rather than with that of any easel picture ever painted. It is interesting as a declaration of artistic faith. More humanly attractive is Mr. G. Spencer Watson's portrait, "Study," in the West Room. The picture of a girl in evening dress, a fragile figure with thin face and thin lips slightly parted, this is assuredly the most sensitively felt, if not the most exquisitely painted portrait in the Gallery. The expression is a little wistful; the eyes have the far-away-ness of mental pre-occupation; the lips, almost tight drawn as they are, quiver on the border-line between hardness and tenderness; the flesh, superficially bloodless, has yet the firmness of life. In the scheme of this arresting and unostentatiously beautiful study the draperies take their place easily and naturally, helping to build up the symphony in reticent tones without for an instant obtruding their presence. And just as the effect is dependent on simplicity for its charm, so the simple painting explains the effect. An economy of means, almost as rigorous as that associated with Sir W. Q. Orchardson, has been observed by Mr. Watson. There is not a superfluous touch in the flesh painting; the brush work, broad as it is, is content not to shout its breadth; its liquid ease suggests the inspiration of a moment or the steadier flame of genius, or both.

Concerning the large pictures—the pictures that will be talked about a week or so hence when the Academy excitement sets free the annual current of society art gossip—there is really not much to remember or to talk about. However, Mr. Lavery's "The Motor Bonnet," Mr. George Henry's ambitious "Butterflies," Mr. J. J. Shannon's splashy "Mrs. Douglas Vickers," and Mr. Harrington Mann's portrait groups of children, are almost certain to figure in conversational circles where current art figures at all. In the quieter and less discussed realm of landscape, a somewhat inadequate display—speaking from the higher standpoint that is suited to the consideration of the new New Gallery—is redeemed by sound, if sombre, canvases by Messrs. D. Y. Cameron and J. Coutts-Michie, by the "Tidal River" of Mr. Arnold Priestman, and by Mr. Hughes Stanton's lesser picture, "Among the Mountains, Provence." Mr. E. A. Walton, too, in his landscape with figures, entitled "The White Mill," gives us a piece of blithe poetry, and solves with his scheme of light atmospheric greens and faded purples the naturalistic problem of clear, evenly distributed, daylight.

Letters from Abroad.

THE NEW PRESS LAW IN EGYPT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The situation created by the enactment of a very stringent Press Law by the Egyptian Ministry is one which deserves, I think, more attention in Liberal and Radical circles than it has yet received. At the end of last month the Ministry in Cairo, not without an internal crisis, revived, with some slight modifications, a law against the Press originally passed in 1881, but which had been obsolete for fifteen or sixteen years. Under this law no newspaper or periodical publication can appear without previously obtaining an authorisation from the Government, which authorisation must be renewed on any change occurring in the proprietors, managers, or editors. Each newspaper or periodical must deposit £E100 with the Government, from which fines may be deducted when the Ministry considers an offence has been committed. All printing offices where newspapers are produced must obtain similar authorisation. All communications from the Ministry of the Interior must be inserted in newspapers gratuitously. The fines range from £E2 to £E10, and they may be inflicted by the Ministry without any right of appeal. The most serious and important provision of the Law is Article 13, which runs: "In the interest of public order, of religion, or of good morals, any journal or periodical publication may be suspended or suppressed by decree of Our Ministry of the Interior after two warnings, or without previous warning, in virtue of a decision of Our Council of Ministers. Each warning may be accompanied by a fine of from £E5 to £E20."

By this enactment the Egyptian Press exists at the will of the Ministry and any newspaper may at any time be suppressed without any judicial process or any right of appeal. No doubt one of the objects of the law, as of the Regulation of 1818 in India, is to avoid the publicity and risks of a public trial, since, of course, sedition may still be prosecuted under the ordinary Penal Code.

With reference to the question of licences and deposits, it was announced that in the case of journals existing at the date of the enactment of the Law no licence would be needed, nor would any deposits be required. Such a concession was almost inevitable, though the whole machinery of fines and deposits seems rather pettifogging and clumsy. Otherwise the Law applies to all Egyptian newspapers. A question much discussed in Cairo is as to whether it applies to the European Press. Boutros Pasha Ghali, the Prime Minister, in an interview, said it was intended to apply to all papers published in Egypt without distinction of nationality. And in a schedule of existing journals, issued by the Ministry of the Interior as being ipso facto entitled to recognition, the European papers figure. But all this confessedly seems a rather shallow pretence, since, unless there has been a vital and radical alteration of the judicial status of foreigners in Egypt under the Capitulations, of which none of us have heard, it is a pretence which is bound to be very quickly detected. It is, of course, open to any Power to expel any of its subjects it chooses, at any time, on a request from the Egyptian authorities. But that is a different matter, and there are Powers which might not choose to expel journalists who had merely made themselves obnoxious in the way of free criticism. Already, in fact, some of the European papers have hinted pretty openly that the new Law does not, and cannot, apply to them.

This, however, is only one of the many difficulties which the application of such a law will involve. In 1881, when it was originally passed, an Egyptian Press can scarcely have been said to exist. To-day there are a large number of newspapers, some of which enjoy quite respectable circulations. The "Lewa," the "Garida," the "Moayad," all appeal to a large public, and are sold not merely in Cairo, but throughout Egypt, whilst there are a great number of smaller papers. Some of these, I believe, have already taken, or sought to take, protection of the Capitulations by associating Europeans who are not amenable to native jurisdiction as joint proprietors with Egyptians.

As one might expect, the promulgation of this law has been very badly received by the press generally, even journals which give a general support to the Occupation authorities strongly condemning its wisdom, whilst there have been serious disturbances in the streets due to the breaking-up of demonstrations against the Law. One extract from a native paper, "Al Garida," is a fair example of the general tone, and it embodies a perfectly sound criticism as well. "Those contemporaries," it says, "who plead the cause of the Government forget, it seems, that it is unjust to strike a whole group or a nation because one or two journalists have not known how to keep within limits. If one were to follow everywhere this rule, the French would be obliged to suppress the Chamber of Deputies because of some representatives who do not know any moderation; they would also have to suppress liberty because it permits a Hervé to preach anti-militarism. . . But the French have contented themselves with combatting the principles of Hervé whilst respecting the general liberty, because liberty is sacred amongst all the peoples who respect themselves, and its benefits are a thousand times greater than some inconveniences which may result from it." The "Garida" is a Nationalist paper. I turn to a European paper which is anti-Nationalist—"Les Nouvelles" of Alexandria. It is not, perhaps, a paper of great importance, and it writes of all Nationalists as fanatics. But discussing the Press Law it says: "It is finished. There is a rupture between the Government and the people. War is declared between those who possess the legal force and those who possess the force of opinion. . . . The people imagine—rightly or wrongly is not the question for the moment—that the Government has failed in its tacit promises. It expected of the Ministry of Boutros Pasha Ghali a liberal action, a policy essentially Egyptian. Let us avow that its deception is comprehensible." And "Les Nouvelles" asks and answers in its own manner, What will be the moral result? "It will," it says, "be to aggravate the revolutionary character of the Opposition. In place of combatting with address and with certainty the fanaticism of the Nationalists they have been given a new force. The Nationalists were struggling against chimeras, they will fight henceforth for a precise programme, for the freedom of thought, for the independence of consciences. In a word, they will now have a raison d'être." It is not true or fair, of course, to say that the Nationalists hitherto were fighting chimeras. They were fighting, adroitly or maladroitly, for constitutional government, for such a régime as English statesmen actually praise the Young Turks for winning. But the fact that an anti-Nationalist journal should write in the strain of the paragraphs quoted shows the feeling with which the Government's action is regarded even by normally friendly opinion.

What is the case on the other side? It is, of course, stripped of varnish and paraphrase, that Eastern human nature is so radically unlike Western human nature that only the bad and obsolete methods of Western coercionists are applicable in dealing with Eastern political growth. Personally, I have never been quite able to follow the logic of the argument, but it appeals to bureaucrats, whether Eastern or Western, to whom any constitutional developments are idealist absurdities. To this type of mind any demand for representative institutions is a species of sedition. As a subsidiary incident it should also be mentioned that "Al Lewa," the chief Nationalist paper in Egypt, has recently begun a campaign against the Khedive, accusing him of having virtually betrayed the interests of the Egyptian nation and of having joined with the British Occupation authorities to resist constitutional advance. In this article I desire chiefly to record the facts of the present situation, and I pass no opinion on such accusations as I have referred to. It must always be remembered that there is a widespread Nationalist agitation in Egypt, more vigorous, perhaps, than mature, and the Nationalists point with irresistible force to the traditional mission of England in Egypt being to fit the Egyptians for self-government. Reams of quotations might be made, and are continually made, in the Egyptian Nationalist Press, from Gladstone, from Lord Granville, from Lord Dufferin, and from others, as to this being the declared object of British tutelage. Yet virtually nothing has been done to redeem these promises, and now, in the very year which witnesses the triumph of Turkish constitutionalism, there is this relapse to a repressive piece of legislation nearly thirty years old, designed to place the freedom of the Egyptian Press at the mercy of the bureaucracy.—Yours, &c.,

FREDERICK RYAN.

Cairo,
April, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

THE DECLARATION OF LONDON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Any view upon a point of International Law which may be expressed by Mr. Lawrence is deserving of the highest respect, and would certainly be so received by any of his old pupils, of whom I am one. Will you allow me, however, to give some reasons why, notwithstanding his letter upon Articles 33 and 34 of the Declaration of London, I still think the matter is left in an unsatisfactory state?

Article 33 provides that conditional contraband is only liable to capture if destined for the enemy Government: Article 34, according to its language, raises a presumption, which may be rebutted, that e.g. foodstuffs consigned to any provision merchant are within Article 33. The onus is thus thrown on the neutral conveying foodstuffs to any provision merchant in the enemy country, of disproving the presumption. There would be nothing unreasonable in itself in casting this onus upon him; but its practical importance to us is enormous, and this appears to have escaped attention.

The effect of Article 34 is to justify the belligerent in capturing and taking in for adjudication neutral vessels carrying foodstuffs consigned to any provision merchant in the enemy country, and requiring the neutral to discharge the onus thrown upon him by proving before a Prize Court that the conditional contraband was not intended for the enemy Government.

Just see the immense practical importance of this to us. Suppose that we were at war with a strong naval Power, and that our navy were hard pressed, if not defeated, it would be of the greatest importance to our enemy to cut off our food supplies and starve us into submission. If we and other neutrals have assented to Article 34, we should have provided our enemy with, at any rate, a plausible justification for capturing neutral vessels bringing foodstuffs and taking them in for adjudication before a Prize Court. Can it be doubted that the vital importance of the matter would cause our enemy to capture all neutral cargoes of food, or enable him to starve us into submission long before the Prize Court had delivered judgment? The indemnity exacted from us would be made to cover any possible damages he would have to pay to neutrals who ultimately succeeded in rebutting the presumption thrown upon them by Article 34.

True, the official memorandum greatly narrows the construction of Article 34, and frees the neutral from the necessity of rebutting the presumption of contraband in all cases except where the foodstuffs are consigned to a well-known Government contractor. Unless the cargo were so assigned, the belligerent would have no plausible justification for taking the vessel in for adjudication.

Unfortunately, by some strange oversight, the plenipotentiaries failed to make the language of Article 34 the same as that of the explanatory memorandum; and as the explanatory memorandum forms no part of the final protocol agreed to, an enemy, in the circumstances mentioned above, would be provided with an arguable case, which is all he would require, to justify him in capturing neutral ships conveying foodstuffs to us, and in starving us pending the decision of the Court.

I asked Sir E. Grey whether he would, before ratification of the Declaration, obtain from the plenipotentiaries an additional protocol substituting the words of their own explanatory memorandum for the words in the existing Article 34. In reply he promised to accompany our ratification by a declaration that Article 34 was limited as mentioned in the explanatory memorandum. This, I submit, is not sufficient. We ought to obtain by agreement the substitution of a new Article 34; because the important point for us would be not that we, but that the neutral desiring to supply us with food, was party to an agreement with our enemy which gave that enemy no excuse for stopping his vessels when bringing us food supplies.—Yours, &c.,

ARNOLD HERBERT.

House of Commons,
April 20th, 1909.

THE ANGLICAN CHURCH AND NONCONFORMISTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your current issue Mr. Everard Wilson remarks that "it is puerile for anybody to imagine that the Catholic Church of this land, of which Canon Henson is an ordained priest, is of the same nature as a man-made dissenting sect." It is a little disappointing to find that the special spiritual advantages Mr. Wilson enjoys as a member of a God-made Church do not involve a double portion of charity and courtesy; judging by the tone of his letter, Dissenters have good reason to rejoice that their "man-made" sects are not of the same nature as "the Catholic Church of this land." But what does Mr. Wilson mean by a God-made Church—for such he evidently thinks "the Catholic Church" to be, since dissenting sects are man-made? Does he mean a Church made without human instrumentality? He can hardly mean this, seeing that the first thing Jesus Christ did when beginning His ministry was to select certain men to aid Him in effecting His purpose. Mr. Wilson sneers at the man-made dissenting sect, but that was exactly what the primitive Church was in the eyes of "the Catholic Church of this land" of Christ's day, and exactly what members of that Church called it. The men Christ chose to make His Church were human to a degree, and it was a constant source of wonder to them that "common kitchen vessels" had been entrusted with so great a charge. Not only was the primitive Church a dissenting sect, but its Jesus Christ was as much anathema to the Established Church of the time as Dr. Clifford is to "the Catholic Church of this land" to-day. Members of the State Church in Christ's day went even further than Mr. Wilson in their condemnation, alleging that this dissenting sect was devil-made, whereas Mr. Wilson, surveying the Free Churches, is content with "man-made." It was the priests of "the Catholic Church of our land" who endeavored to stamp the dissenting Christian sect out of existence, and who to this end crucified its founder and leader.

Further, if for a sect to be man-made is a crime worthy stone-throwing, your correspondent does not live in a cement house. Has he forgotten Henry VIII., of pious memory, who made "the Catholic Church of our land" as we know it? Henry has had his traducers, but no one ever accused him of being anything less, or reverenced him as being anything more, than a man. Certainly Dissenters have manifested greater sensitiveness in their choice of makers, requiring a little more grace and a little less meat in them; but they can hardly be blamed for this. Henry compelled the Church to acknowledge the Royal supremacy in place of the Pope's; in other words he made it a dissenting sect, and it was because John Henry Newman could not stand this that he became a Roman Catholic. To the Roman Catholic Church, "the Catholic Church of our land" is a man-made dissenting sect, and the Church of Rome, in refusing to recognise the validity of Anglican orders, shows it thinks as little of them as Mr. Wilson does of Free Church orders. To speak as if the Catholic Church did not include dissenting sects is foolish. One might with the same accuracy refer to a man who only sold soap as a universal provider.

In conclusion, may I remind, or inform, Mr. Wilson, that the present Bishop of Birmingham, who recently inhibited Canon Henson from speaking in a Free Church hall, himself, when Canon of Westminster, spoke in Dr. Clifford's chapel? Nor were Nonconformists false to their principles in inviting him to speak there. Nonconformist principles are those of their Master, who desired His followers to love their neighbors as themselves and did not qualify the instruction with the words, "provided they are not dissenters, or members of the Church as by law established."—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD MUDIE-SMITH.

9, Clifton Villas, Maida Vale, W.
April 17th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is refreshing to meet occasionally a little thorough-going candour. There can be no question as to the sincerity of your correspondent's scorn for the "man-made dissenting sects." He is genuinely amazed that a clergyman of the Established Church should so degrade his office as to associate on equal terms of Christian brotherhood with a Nonconformist minister. Of the warmth of his indignation with Canon Henson, and the depth of his contempt for the Free Churches, his letter leaves no shadow of doubt.

Let it not be imagined that Mr. Everard Wilson is alone in his opinion. Such outbursts in the public Press may be prudently few, but the feeling behind is not by any means yet extinct. Perhaps we ought not to regret this open exhibition of a spirit of intolerance that dies very hard. What one has the courage frankly to avow, many either secretly cherish, or manifest in deeds of petty spite. Social life in rural villages is the peculiar province of this anti-Christian temper. Although this attitude, when openly taken, usually appears in a more subtle and guarded form, it is still far too common and widespread, and nearly always as hopelessly incorrigible as it is blindly unreasonable.

After his ineffective captatio, your correspondent's appeal to Free Churchmen to have more self respect than to respond to the friendly overtures of catholic-spirited members of other branches of the Christian Church, falls quite flat. Indeed, his delicate accusation of "worldly snobbery" against these despised Dissenters seems not a little rash on his own part. Who are they to hold up their heads? They may not be without their share of spirituality and culture, but they certainly fall short in "worldly" prestige and wealth. But, in any case, Mr. Wilson should remember the mote and beam. Worldly snobbery, indeed! Which is the more snobbish—cordially to welcome fraternal advances of broad-minded Christians of other denominations, or disdainfully to repel all such approaches as impertinent and insulting?

Before there can be any peace in Christendom, the superior tone too frequently heard to-day, and especially the presumption of exclusive privilege and monopoly out of which it rises, will have to be reasoned down or shamed out.—Yours, &c.,

D. EASTHAM AUTY.

Lancashire College, Manchester,
April 19th, 1900.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent of last week, Mr. Wilson, has an assured scorn of a "man-made dissenting sect," which would quite outpace a Pharisee's attitude towards "publicans and harlots," and the accursed people who know not the law.

But if I may ask a question without incurring a charge of "something akin to worldly snobbery," I should be grateful if your correspondent would tell me in what sense the Church and faith of Mr. Jowett are more "man-made" than the Church and faith of Canon Henson? And if he gets so far, would he kindly name the man?

I know, of course, that men like Cyprian, Anselm, Luther, Newman, and Dale have made manly contributions to the Church's doctrine and practice—and I hope none the less divine because manly.

I know, too, that the genius of Paul made Chrisitanity a "sect everywhere spoken against," in respect to the Church to which it was attached under the régime of the older apostles. But so far as I can see, the only point which makes Mr. Jowett's communion more "sectarian" than Mr. Wilson's is that, like the Apostolic Church, it dispenses with bishops, in the Anglican sense of the term.

But then, Canon Henson and many other priests of the Anglican Church do not believe in the divine right of bishops, nor did Bishop Lightfoot or Dr. Hatch, the chief luminaries on the subject of Cambridge and Oxford respectively.

No doubt dissenting sects will be able to endure being called man-made, even by members of a Church whose bishops are appointed by the Prime Minister, who may belong to a dissenting sect himself, so long as they continue to make men. Mr. Wilson may rest assured that Canon Henson would not have been invited to Digbeth Institute had he not been more of a man than a priest. "Cannot a priest be an Englishman too," and a Christian who does not see in inter-communion "something akin to worldly snobbery?"—Yours, &c.,

A. NORMAN ROWLAND.

April 20th, 1099.

---

"A STUDY OF THE BYE-ELECTIONS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The interesting leader on bye-elections in last week's issue of THE NATION furnishes further evidence of the unstable and unsatisfactory results of our electoral methods. When partisans hailed with joy the absurdly exaggerated majority with which the Liberals returned to power in 1906, students of electoral methods fully realised that that large majority, in so far as it was false, would prove to be a source of weakness to Liberalism. The pendulum, in the violence of its swing, had touched every constituency in which it was possible for Liberalism to gain a victory. That being so, it was obvious that it would be extremely difficult for the Liberals to win any additional seats at bye-elections, correspondingly easy for the Conservatives to achieve success, and that the impression would quickly arise that the Government had lost the confidence of the country. These things have happened, and the future uncertainty undermines the power and prestige of the Government.

Moreover, it is not sufficiently recognised that many of the votes that helped to swell the Liberal victory of 1906 were of a negative character. The electors wished to express their dissatisfaction with Mr. Balfour's Government, and could only do so by voting for Liberals. Doubtless a good many votes polled at the bye-elections express dissatisfaction with items of the Government's programme, rather than a positive approval of the Conservative candidate for whom they have been cast. It is not impossible that the swing of the pendulum at the next General Election will be as violent as in 1906, and a new, falsely exaggerated majority will, in the absence of any true constitutional check, be able to impose its will upon the people.

In order to break the force of some of the factors contributing to possible disaster at the next General Election the writer suggests the introduction of the Second Ballot, the transferable vote, or some mutual agreement as to seats between the Liberal and Labor parties. The latter suggestion—essentially undemocratic in character—implies that political organisations can dispose of the votes of the electors without any corresponding resentment on their part. Yet in Belgium, where party discipline is much more strict than in England, the "cartel" arrangements made by the Liberals and Socialists proved a failure; a certain number of the electors refused to ratify the agreements entered into over their heads. Moreover, the second ballot has proved an absolute and unqualified failure wherever it has been tried—with it the representation of parties depends not on their own strength, but on the action of the minorities which are not strong enough to reach the second ballot.

The writer speaks of the possible "whimsical but disastrous result of a Protectionist majority in the House representing a Protectionist minority in the country"; he does not appear to be aware of the fact that, as a result of the General Election of 1886, we had a Unionist majority of 104 representing a Unionist minority in the country. This result was not due to Home Rule losses at three-cornered contests; it merely arose from that crude electoral system—single-member constituencies—which was consecrated once more by the last Redistribution Bill.

We are to have a new Electoral Reform Bill and yet there are some Liberals who still hesitate as to whether advantage should not be taken of this opportunity to place the composition of the House of Commons upon a stable basis. Yet M. Georges Lorand, the Liberal leader in the Belgian Chamber of Deputies, says, in a recent issue of the "Frankfurter Zeitung," "It is astonishing that the Liberals of England did not long ago realise that a proportional system is for their party a question of life and death, and that this system alone can free them from a predicament to which they fall victims at every election." How long is our representation to depend upon chance majorities, upon the "final rallies" of the worst type of voters, upon constituency-nursing, instead of upon the number of electors supporting the party?

It is too often overlooked that a proportional system will provide a constitutional check of the utmost value, for that check will be within the House of Commons itself and not outside. Minorities, instead of being obliterated by the insensate swing of the pendulum, will be present in full force to speak on behalf of the large body of electors they represent.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN H. HUMPHREYS, Hon. Sec.,
The Proportional Representation Society.
107, Algernon Road, Lewisham, London, S.E.
April 20th, 1909.

ADULT SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mrs. Vaughan Nash's letter on the above subject is purely encouraging. It has that faith which removes mountains, and stands out in happy relief against the argument which declares that the smaller measure, at present claimed, will surely lead to the larger.

If all who are in favor of the smaller measure were equally in favor of the larger, this might be true. The thin end of the wedge, as it is called, would then lead to the thick end. But the thin end of this wedge is not trustworthy enough to ensure the completion of the job.

Among those who advocate the smaller measure are three distinct classes:—

1. Those who wish for Adult Suffrage, and hope to arrive at it through the smaller measure.

2. Those whose only interest is the removal of sex disqualification.

3. Those who, besides wishing for the removal of the sex disqualification, demand the vote for women on a property test and no other.

This irregular wedge will never be a workable tool for those who claim the right of "one man, one vote; one woman, one vote."

I hope Mrs. Vaughan Nash's appeal to those whose ideal is Adult Suffrage will waken them to their duties, and cause them to resolve to come out into the open, and help with her to hold the banner for the only really just measure.

As adult Suffragists we demand, in the name of the rising generation, an outlook which shuts out none, and an access to all to attain their full manhood and womanhood through responsible individual liberty.—Yours, &c.,

CATHERINE RYLE.
15, German Place, Brighton,
April 19th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Either your correspondent, R. Nash, has wholly failed to grasp the point of the present agitation for women's enfranchisement, or she is one of those people who would be glad to see it turned aside, and, if possible, divided against itself. The woman suffrage movement has for its sole object the gaining for women of political equality with men before the law. With opposing party or class interests it has nothing to do, in spite of the fact that a possible majority of its adherents have been largely prompted in their efforts by sympathy with working women. Women of all shades of political opinion, belonging to all classes, are united in their determination to get rid as speedily as possible of a disability which insults their common womanhood. They differ as to methods, not at all as to the immediate object.

R. Nash says that a belief seems to be spreading among women that they will get nothing from the Liberals. Is that belief a strange one, considering the history of the past three years? The present administration has by its persistent refusal to further the women's claim to simple justice, and by its repeated efforts to divide the movement on party issues, done everything to promote and foster such a belief. It is at any time open to the Government to satisfy the women's demand, and afterwards to bring in if they wish, and carry into law if they can, a measure of full adult suffrage.

But, since every woman is at present outside the constitution, it is foolish and unreasonable to blame the women's societies for not giving the Liberal Government a lead. R. Nash pathetically complains that adult suffrage "has never been put to the electors on its merits"; that "it has not had a chance." Then, why, in the name of common sense, do not the right people undertake this education? Liberal organisers and electors should themselves engage upon an adult suffrage campaign throughout the country, and not expect the women's societies to do it for them. These have enough to do to mind their own immediate business, in which they are unfortunately hampered by the very people from whom they might expect the most support, if political principles stand for anything.

It is true that many suffrage speakers dwell strongly upon the hardships of the poorest class of women, a class who will remain unenfranchised under the existing law. Not only is there no "conscious deceit" (as R. Nash puts it) in this, but also there is no contradiction. Rightly or wrongly these speakers believe that the outlawry of all women aggravates the unfortunate position of the very poor. Rightly or wrongly they believe that all social legislation applying to the poor and down-trodden will receive great impetus from the inclusion of women in the present electorate. Indeed, we may say that this belief forms as great an incentive to the women's agitation as does their sense of injustice, caused by denial of citizenship on the ground of sex. For "conscious deceit" we must look to the persistent efforts made by party politicians to turn aside the suffrage movement, and this deceit we have to thank for the growing hostility to the present Government which appears in the women's ranks. That the hostility is by no means unsuccessful can be plainly seen by study of the local Press wherever a bye-election occurs. If only the Liberal politicians would realise that the women have made up their minds! This condition of mind is said to be difficult of attainment by the fair sex, but it is proverbial that once having attained it they are determined.

"If she will she will, you may depend on't;
If she won't she won't, and there's an end on't."

—Yours, &c.,

B. BLAGG.
St. Helen's Villas, Burton Joyce,
April 19th, 1909.

FORM IN POETRY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The writer of the eloquent tribute to the art of Swinburne in last week's NATION raises a very interesting point.

He protests against "the old, but barren criticism which insists on Swinburne's splendor of form, and says he sacrificed sense to the music and melody of words." He might have gone further and pointed out that, except in a figurative sense, the beauty of poetry has nothing to do with the "music and melody of words" at all. The beauty of poetry is wholly concerned with the form and relation, the meaning, and suggestion, and association of words. It is this particular word, or this particular context, that makes the poem. Rhythm, rhyme, alliteration, and assonance, and all the other "musical" tricks are, in truth, irrelevant.

Those sublime poems, the Psalms of David, are untainted by any of these adulteries, and so is the Epistle for Quinquagesima, which is probably the finest poem in the language.

The words which Poetry makes her own are often quite unpleasing to the ear. "Rapture," and "love," for instance, are beautiful and poetic symbols, but most unbeautiful sounds. Browning is often most inspired when he is most harsh and dissonant.

Even Bernard Shaw's critical insight seems to have failed him here. "In a deaf nation the plays of Shakespeare would have been dead long since." In point of fact the congenitally deaf, who, strangely, can appreciate rhythm though not rhyme, love and understand Shakespeare as much as those who hear.

"On such a night
Stood Dido, a willow in her hand."

There you have it; the mind is filled with pictures, not with sounds. When we speak of the music of poetry we should remember, I think, that we are using a metaphor—that it is a music of the mind, not of the ear.—Yours, &c.,

J. C. Graham.

64, Summerfield Crescent, Birmingham,
April 20th, 1909.

THE MEDICAL VALUE OF SUNLIGHT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Let it not be suggested that the solid influence of the medical profession is lacking in support of the objects of the crowded meeting held at the Guildhall to-day, under the distinguished aegis of the Lord Mayor, and other Notables of the State and of Science. Though no professional voice, except that of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, was prayed in aid to bless the Daylight Saving Bill, that profession which has consistently preached the necessity for pure air, pure water, and pure food in the welfare of the people, is insistent also on the free introduction of sunlight wherever humans live and move and have their being.

For the medical profession knows the problem as expressed in terms of pounds and inches, and actuarial calculations. Adolescence is the period which provides the great object lesson. As with air-space, so with sunlight; there is a mathematical ratio between these and the foot-pounds of a growing girl or boy. In the case of sunlight, this is effectively banished by over-crowding; and over-crowding reduces the available inches of stature by four, and the avoirdupois by close upon twelve pounds, during adolescence.

At no period of life are special facilities for sun and air of sovereign importance more than during the period of growth. Now is determined the physique of the future; so much direct sunlight means definitely more, so little means definitely less, in height and weight at the end of the growth-period. This applies especially to the proletariat, and if we do not want so-called "ricketty boys" for the Services, we must take care to delete the influences which provide stunted height and narrow chest in the defenders of the realm.

So much for the adolescent. How directly potent in the well-being of adult life is the effect of sunshine on the microbial foes of mankind. Here the mathematical expression is that of the actuarial expectation of life. The sun's rays are definitely inimical to the proliferation of the tubercle bacillus, the cause of the "white plague" of the century. The Registrar-General presented a statement of 51,000 deaths in 1907 as due to tuberculosis. What holds good for this germ is similarly true for many other vacillary enemies of the human race. It is to the protective character of the solar rays that we owe our increasing immunity to many invisible but deadly germ antagonists.

These facts are typical of hosts of others which underlie expert medical views as to the value of sunshine in daily life. And if the profession of medicine has not come into the arena and openly joined forces with those making for the passing of Mr. Willett's Bill, it is not that it regards the struggle as of little moment, or this particular measure as worthy of aught but its good will and support.

The Guildhall meeting of to-day heard the case put by members of Parliament, philanthropists, princes of commerce, and the highest dignitaries of the City. But the testimony of all is based on the influence, needing no proof, that the medical postulates of the Bill are sound.—Yours, &c., George Burford, M.B.

35, Queen Anne Street, W.
April 20th, 1909.

POETS AND CHILDREN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Amongst those who estimate the worth of Swinburne's poetry, there seems to be a strong consensus of opinion as to the sentimental worthlessness of his poems on children. People greet such a collection of poems as "The Dark Month," with derisive shouts or parodies.

I notice that in your columns the reviewer, sympathetic as he mostly is, writes of "the maudlin wash that Swinburne sometimes poured over babies."

"Maudlin wash" is often the comment passed on the expression of a feeling which is unshared. That a poet should feel absolute delight in his devotion and surrender to a little child that appealed to his heart may seem strange, but to Swinburne it was evidently as inevitable as the love of sunlight and the sea; only more inwardly personal! Young, he would probably not have felt the loss of a child's presence so poignantly as in middle age or later. He who is drawing nearer to the wayside inn is attracted and touched by young, fresh, and unconscious life, which is expressible only by the poet who has known the passionate love of childhood. To him the surrender of all gifts and powers would be as nothing compared to the gaining and keeping the love of a little child. It was not the art of being a father, but "l'art d'être grand-père" that the old great French poet loved to express when he immortalised George and Jeanne, as surely no children were ever immortalised before. Most poets have sung of children; few poetesses, strangely enough, have given us poems of the exquisiteness of a child's love, and the intense longing for it, though Mrs. Hamilton King implies it in her passionate poem, "The Children." Charles Lamb and the grave Wordsworth knew it, and the gentle poet who sang of "The Children's Hour" and the weariness of age felt to the utmost the pathos of the relation of age to youth, the intense love, yet touched with pity and sympathy, for the unknown road that lies before those little feet. And love in its fullest sense Swinburne knew—but Swinburne-like—with a rejoicing in the child's kingliness of youth.

For utter simplicity in expression, take these three verses:—

"You send me your love in a letter,
I send you my love in a song:
Ah, child, your gift is the better,
Mine does you but wrong.

No fame, were the best less brittle,
No praise, were it wide as earth,
Is worth so much as a little
Child's love may be worth.

We see the children above us,
As they might angels above;
Come back to us, child, if you love us,
And bring us your love."

Or this, with all its music of sound:—

"As a soundless shell, as a songless nest,
Seems now the room that was radiant then,
And fragrant with his happier rest
Than that of slumbering men."

It is the heart that insists on immortality, not the brain.

It was from the heart that Swinburne wrote:—

"Where children are not, heaven is not, and heaven if they come not again, shall be never,"
"But the face and the voice of a child are assurance of heaven, and its promise for ever."

Yours, &c.,

B. Brooksbank.

April 22nd, 1909.

GOGOL'S CENTENARY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—A ceremony—the opening of a national monument, &c., will take place on May 9th, in Moscow, in connection with the centenary of Gogol, author of "Dead Souls," "The Inspector-General," &c., and founder of the modern "natural" school of Russian literature.

Addresses will be read in various languages, and this affords an opportunity for English admirers to express their appreciation of the great literature of which Gogol was the forerunner.

Such recognition is likely to be specially welcome at this moment in Russia, where the cause of truth and literature has always been connected with the cause of freedom, and few literary men have escaped suffering at the hands of the Government.—Yours, &c.,

CONSTANCE GARNETT.

19, Grove Place, Hampstead,
April 22nd, 1909.

THE FIGHTING VALUE OF "DREADNOUGHTS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In reply to my letter published in your issue of April the 3rd, Mr. Kelway seems merely to repeat his former statements, and avoids producing proofs or answering the arguments produced against his theory.

If the high explosive shells could have been used in 6-in. guns, why did not the Japanese use them in their light cruisers against the "Slavana" and "Donskoy"? Wood entered very largely into the construction of these two vessels, and they should have fallen an easy prey. And further, why did the Russians treat the 6-in. so lightly, while the portmanteaus (12-in.) were held in such great respect?

His statement that the "Osylaba" was not sunk by penetration he contradicts in his own letter. "Three shells, one after the other . . . All in the same place, on the water line. Not a hole—but a regular gateway. Three of them penetrated together." He then says that this probably did not occur, but that the officer who said it was excited at the time. But since Mr. Kelway's arguments are based on Captain Semenoff's book, he can hardly be allowed to pick such evidence as suits his theory, and reject that which does not fit, as inaccurate.

"Subjected to the same gunnery fire as that which destroyed the Russian fleet in the Battle of Tsushima, the 'Dreadnought' and her improved sisters would be similarly destroyed." They might, if they had not the speed which they have—the main reason for their actual size is that they might have that extra speed which proved so invaluable to Togo—and also they might, if they replied with the same inaccuracy and badly-made shells as the Russians. But here Mr. Kelway has altogether failed to note Captain Semenoff's most important remark, namely: "The Russians, like the French, believed in shells made for penetrating, while the Japanese, like the British, in shells with a large bursting charge."

Finally, your correspondent shifts his ground entirely. From a demand to cease building "Dreadnoughts" he merely proposes to do away with armor-piercing shells, which proposal, in face of what is stated above, seems unnecessary.

The fact that all the great nations of the world are building "Dreadnoughts," or improved "Dreadnoughts," not only refutes the statement that they are frauds, but seems to be the sincerest flattery that our Admiralty could have received.—Yours, &c.,

C. G. WALKER.

Knowle House, Mirfield,
April 19th, 1909.

Poetry.

A SONG OF LIFE.

"Better than sovereignty over the earth, better than going to Heaven, better than lordship over all worlds, is the reward of the first step in holiness."—Buddhist Scripture (Dhammapada xiii. 178).

"Ye shall find rest unto your souls . . . . The kingdom of God cometh not with observation: neither shall they say, Lo, here! or, lo, there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you."—Christian Scripture (Matt. xi. 29, and Luke xvii. 20 and 21).

"As to those who . . . . work righteousness, the Lord will direct them . . . . and their salutation shall be peace . . . ."—Mahommedan Scripture (Koran x. 166, &c.).

I.

WORLD of wonders, fair to see,
Bountiful exceedingly,
All our wants 'tis you supply,
You receive us when we die,
Stern, but smiling on us, show
All the things we need to know!

II.

"First distinguish false and true,—
See what you are called to do!
Duties nearest to be done
Are the first to think upon;
Patient, till you see what's right;
Forward then, with all your might!

III.

"Darkness all, within, without,
All things hid in mists of doubt;
Humbly be content to see
What the next step ought to be;
Forward then, your doubting past,
For the next may be the last!

IV.

"If through weakness, sloth, or pride,
Duty should be put aside,
Or if passion, mean or strong,
Lead you on to doing wrong,
All things past unchanged remain—
E'en repentance may be vain!

V.

"Work is worship, thought is prayer;
Each his sorrows has to bear;
Steady labor, real thought,
Win whate'er success they ought;
Even sorrows by-and-by
Sweeten soon in memory.

VI.

"Men like ants may swarm on earth,
Boasting loudly of their worth,
As if they'd the world remake;
But if God should them forsake,
Two days' extra frost or heat
Could make all men maggots' meat.

VII.

"Life is real, not a dream;
But the things that real seem,
Chariots, buildings, sports, and game,
Are mere pastimes, all the same;
Pleasure-seekers never cease,
Never find the road to peace.

VIII.

"Peace they seek but never find;
Peace is harmony of mind,—
When the beauty of the world
To the loving eye's unfurled,
And the sounds that fill the air
Breathe of music everywhere. . . ."

IX.

World of wonders, fair to see,
Bountiful exceedingly,
All our wants 'tis you supply,
You receive us when we die,
Stern, but smiling, plain you show
All the things we need to know!

DAVID WILSON.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

MR. JOHN MURRAY'S quarterly list of announcements is, as usual, strong in biography and memoirs. One of the most interesting of the new books promised is the "Reminiscences of Carl Schurz," which is to appear in three volumes. Schurz was a young German student of promise when he took part in the Prussian rising of 1848, as a result of which he had to emigrate to America. He took the Northern side in the Civil War, and showed great ability in the field, rising to the rank of General. Subsequently he became American Ambassador to Germany, and took a leading part in politics during the presidencies of Johnston, Grant, and Hayes. He opposed the high-tariff policy of the Republican Party, both on moral and economic grounds, but gave the party his support while the questions growing out of slavery and the Civil War were of predominant importance. He supported Cleveland, but returned to the Republicans when Bryan declared for free silver, only to turn Democrat once more in opposition to McKinley's Imperialism. It is no small tribute to American discernment that in spite of these changes, Schurz's honesty and public spirit were always recognised, and few speakers had more influence in turning votes. The "Reminiscences" should prove a valuable contribution to American history.

* * *

ANOTHER biography to come from Mr. Murray is the Life of Giuseppe Baretti, the author of the famous Italian dictionary, and the friend of Johnson, Burke, Garrick, and other eighteenth century men of letters. The book is based chiefly on Baretti's letters to his Italian friends, which are said to contain fresh information about Johnson, the Thrales, and their circle, as well as to bring out the contrast between literary society in Italy and in England during the eighteenth century. There is to be an introduction by the late Mr. Marion Crawford.

* * *

ANTICIPATING the publication in the course of the forthcoming autumn of Henrik Ibsen's posthumous works, a Copenhagen journal the other day published a fragment of a novel which Ibsen, in a letter to his friend Ole Schulevud, called his chief work at that time. It is an historical novel, "The Prisoner of Agershuus," and has for its subject the history of a certain Christian Lofthuus, who appears to have played a part in the political history of Norway towards the end of the eighteenth century, and being wrongfully accused of conspiring with Sweden against Denmark, was arrested under most dramatic circumstances, and kept in prison until his death in 1794. The same journal also publishes three new poems by Ibsen, the one dating from 1856 and the other from the following year, to his fiancée, now his widow; while the third is a congratulatory poem to his fiancée's sister on the occasion of her confirmation. One of these poems recalls Heine, and would quite have fitted into the "Buch der Lieder," although less pessimistic in its tone.

* * *

A BOOK by Mark Twain bearing the title "Is Shakespeare Dead?" is to be published shortly by Messrs. Harper. The book is a medley of appreciation, fact, and fiction. Among the subjects dealt with are Mark Twain's experiences as a Mississippi pilot and in the Far West.

* * *

Two books of more than usual promise upon the question of a future life may be expected during the next few weeks. The first is Mr. Lowes Dickinson's Ingersoll Lecture for 1909, which, under the title of "Is Immortality Desirable?" examines the significance which the idea of immortality has for different types of men. The other, to be published by Mr. Francis Griffiths, is called "Is Death the End?" and presents the case for immortality in a non-religious aspect. The author has collected the opinions of Mr. Balfour, Sir Oliver Lodge, Professor Jevons, and others of distinction in various fields, the consensus of opinion being that the question asked in the title of the book must receive a negative answer.

* * *

LAST week we mentioned a couple of historical memoirs which, though of great interest, are not likely to be published for many years. Another book to be added to the list is the "Reminiscences" of M. Emile Loubet, late President of the French Republic. The manuscript is said to be very voluminous, and deals chiefly with M. Loubet's seven years' residence at the Elysée. It will not be published until twenty years after M. Loubet's death.

* * *

IT is a pity that the difficulty of copyright prevents several volumes of the American "Cambridge Poets" series from being published in this country. No such difficulty can, however, exist in the case of "The Cambridge Dryden," upon which Professor Noyes, of California University, has been engaged for the past seven years. The object of the new edition is to furnish in an accurate text a more complete edition of Dryden's writings than has hitherto been attempted in popular form. All Dryden's undoubted poetical works, both original and translated, together with a large number of his critical essays, will be included. English readers are fairly well off with the "Globe" edition of the poetical works and Professor Ker's excellent two-volume edition of the "Essays." The dramas are not accessible, except in a very expensive form—Sir Walter Scott's edition, as revised by Professor Saintsbury. A critical text of all Dryden's works might well be taken in hand for the series which Dr. Ward and Mr. Waller are now editing for the Cambridge University Press.

* * *

ONE of the characteristics of current American fiction, according to a writer in the "New York Times," is a marked tendency towards "the masculization of the novel." "By its masculization," he says, "I mean its tendency to concern itself more and more with that side of life which has been heretofore largely the domain of man, and to concern itself less with those affairs and conditions of life which have been of keen interest to what some cynic has called 'the marrying sex.'" The writer also laments the inferior artistry of most American novels, and their almost unvaried concern with material things. English novels, on the other hand, frequently fall into the opposite error, and present life as seen through a distorted haze of pseudo-romanticism, fatal alike to sincerity and any convincing treatment of actual problems.

* * *

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have arranged for the publication of "The Economic Annals of the Nineteenth Century," by Dr. William Smart, Adam Smith Professor of Political Economy in the University of Glasgow. During his three years' work as one of the Royal Commissioners on the Poor Laws, Professor Smart felt himself much hampered by the absence of accessible information regarding the economic and social evolution from the time when the Poor Law came into evil prominence during the great war, and this determined him to do something towards filling up the gap. The first part of the work, which will probably appear in the autumn, deals with the period from 1801 to 1820.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"A Pluralistic Universe: Hibbert Lectures at Manchester College on the Present Situation in Philosophy." By William James. (Longmans. 5s. 6d. net.)

"Studies in Mystical Religion." By Rufus M. Jones. (Macmillan. 12s. net.)

"Sir Robert Hart: The Romance of a Great Career." Told by his Niece, Juliet Bredon. (Hutchinson. 6s. net.)

"Mendel's Principles of Heredity." By W. Bateson. (Cambridge University Press. 12s. net.)

"Mansfield College Essays, Presented to the Rev. A. M. Fairbairn, D.D." By Various Writers. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)

"The Faith and Works of Christian Science." By the Writer of "Confessio Medici." (Macmillan. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Milton Memorial Lectures, 1908." Edited by Percy W. Ames. (Frowde. 6s. net.)

"Treasure Trove." By C. A. Dawson-Scott. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"The Staircase of Honour." By Maud Stepney Rawson. (Mills & Boon. 6s.)

"Chronique de la Duchesse de Dino." Tome II. 1836-1840. Publiée avec des annotations et un index biographique par la Princesse Radziwill. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 7fr. 50.)

"La Vie politique dans les deux mondes, 1907-1908." Par A. Viallate. (Paris: Alcan. 10fr.)

"La Formilière." Roman provincial. Par Lucien Alphonse-Daudet. (Paris: Flammarion. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE HERO OF THE SIX ACTS.*

THERE are many statements in Mr. Hassall's sketch of Castlereagh which are open to question, and one of them meets us on the first page of the preface. Mr. Hassall thinks that the misconceptions of which Castlereagh's memory has been the victim have steadily increased. We should have thought that, whatever else might be matter for dispute, it would have been common ground among historians that Castlereagh has received not harsher, but more kindly treatment during recent years. We might take, for example, the treatment of Castlereagh's military administration. Mr. Fortescue has shown that Castlereagh's tenure of the War Office stands out as a conspicuous success among the records of failure which surround the names of Pitt, Dundas, and Addington. In one other direction, modern criticism, in its anxiety to be just to Castlereagh, has tended to be unjust to Canning. In place of the old dramatic and picturesque view that Castlereagh and Canning represented two opposite policies, and that Canning's glory was won in revolutionising the system he inherited from Castlereagh, some modern historians have maintained that Canning was merely following in the footsteps of Castlereagh, that the credit for initiating a liberal policy was due to Castlereagh, and that the two men had the same sympathies and aspirations. Mr. Temperley has shown, we think, that this view is an exaggeration, and that if England's attitude to the Holy Alliance was determined before Canning became Foreign Minister, it was so determined, not by Castlereagh's own native ideas, but by the influence of Canning in the Cabinet. Castlereagh said himself, in a letter to Bathurst, "Alexander suggests all the Powers of Europe being bound together in a common league guaranteeing to each other the existing order of things in Thrones, as in territories, all being bound to march, if requisite, against the first Power that offended. I tried to present something which would meet somewhat his ideas, which we could present to Parliament." That design was upset by Canning, who had fortunately joined the Government in 1816, and it was due to his influence that Castlereagh perceived, in 1818, that the ideas of the Holy Alliance were in danger of carrying the Government a good deal further than it had meant to go.

We do not propose, however, to discuss the rival claims of Canning and Castlereagh in this respect, or for the honors of the Peninsula War, for Mr. Hassall raises a still more interesting question in his challenge to Castlereagh's Radical critics. Why is it that the hatred of which Castlereagh was the object during the last years of his life, a hatred that would not make a truce even over his grave, has taken so fixed and prominent a place in the imagination of the time? Thackeray said that to be mentioned by Gibbon was like having one's name inscribed on the dome of St. Peter's, for all the world to read. Castlereagh, of course, owes something of the immortality of his unpopular fame to the fact that Shelley inscribed his name on the dome of Hell. But it was not, as Mr. Hassall seems to think, mere literary caprice or mere partisan malice that inspired this passionate feeling about Castlereagh. The reason for that bitter hostility is that Castlereagh represented the oligarchy in its internal policy at the worst moment in its history. He represented that phase because he overshadowed his chief accomplice, Sidmouth. Now, what is the case of the English poor against him in this character?

It is this. Castlereagh governed England at a time when the poor were in a state of inconceivable distress, when their distress was growing fast, when their place in the State was becoming more and more insignificant and dependent, and he offered them two consolations: one the policy generally represented by the "Six Acts," the other the diversion of a million of public money to a church which had about as much compassion for the poor as the governing class itself. Let us consider how a poor man would have received Castlereagh's speech in introducing his coercive legislation. Castlereagh began by remarking that the example of the French Revolution ought to have convinced everybody of the wickedness and folly of any revolutionary undertaking. It was an excellent argument for a House of Commons that represented property and sinecures, but an English agricultural laborer might pertinently have replied that between 1789 and 1817 the English peasant and the French peasant had changed places, that the French Revolution, if it had brought a great deal of trouble and confusion on the world, had lifted the French peasant out of his squalor and established his independence, and that the English oligarchy expected the English poor, who had been driven off their common fields, debauched, impoverished, and enslaved by a bad pauper system, who were sentenced to ignorance and neglect, who were punished under a penal system so brutal that boys ten years old were transported for trivial offences, and whose children were crowded in factories where no effective law sheltered them from cruelty and disease, to sit down and thank God and the governing classes for the defeat of Napoleon, and never to raise a whisper about their own sufferings and grievances.

Such a critic might further have pointed out that other nations had found time to improve their institutions during the Napoleonic War. For example, Stein had abolished serfdom in Prussia; whereas in England the ruling class declared that reform was unnecessary and dangerous, not only in times of war, but in times of peace. Those rulers did their best to show that in fighting France they had been fighting for their property in men and in acres. In this same speech Castlereagh went on to congratulate Parliament on the fact that a dangerous spirit was now to be found only in the uneducated classes. Whose fault was it that those classes were uneducated? What had Castlereagh and his friends done, what did they propose to do, to educate the poor? They had done, and meant to do, nothing at all. The truth is that there never was a time when social evils and social dangers called so loudly for action, and there never was a time when an English Government had so little imagination, so little care, and so little sympathy. The defence of the English Constitution, not in its virtues, but in its vices, not as a system of free government, but as a system of inflexible police, was the beginning and the end of the political creed of England's rulers. Hence it was that Castlereagh's answer to starvation and to famine, to the suffering and decay which Cobbett witnessed in the villages, to the cruelties and abominations of the factory system which were revealed to Parliamentary Committees, was to withdraw what liberties of protest and complaint the poor possessed, and to punish criticism with brutal and arbitrary laws. Mr. Hassall, who has very little to say about these conditions and the oligarchy's responsibility for them, thinks that it is ridiculous for anyone to-day to question the necessity of the Six Acts and the suspension of the Habeas Corpus. We wonder whether he has studied the careers of the famous spies, Castles, Oliver, and Edwards, the trio whose names are immortalised in Lamb's little poem, "The Three Graves":—

> "Close by the ever-burning limestone beds
> Where Bedloe, Oates and Judas hide their heads,
> I saw great Satan like a sexton stand,
> With his intolerable spade in hand,
> Digging three graves. . . .
> I asked the fiend for whom those rites were meant,
> 'These graves,' quoth he, 'when life's brief oil is spent,
> When the dark night comes and they're sinking bedwards,
> I mean for Castles, Oliver, and Edwards.'"

These informers, on whose evidence Castlereagh and Sidmouth largely relied, were forced to admit that they had themselves fomented the plots of which they gave information, and Edwards encouraged the Cato Street conspiracy. The secret committees of both Houses, that reported in 1817, found that there were revolutionary opinions abroad (it would have been strange, indeed, if there had not been), but from that day to this no evidence has been produced to show that there was danger of a rising. After all, the decisions of juries who had all the facts before them demonstrate as much as the decisions of a secret committee of Parliament. The trials of 1817, like those of 1794, are a not unimportant commentary on the panic-stricken measures of the Government. One result of those measures was to drive discontent into other and more dangerous channels, a consequence that Whigs like Holland predicted, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that the Cato Street conspiracy would never have happened if criticism had not been made a crime. A more serious consequence was the suffocation of the popular movement. In fact, the only good result of Castlereagh's legislation, a result certainly not designed by its author, was the sympathy which sprang up between the popular leaders and the best Whigs, like Grey and Holland, who combated that legislation with great courage and power, for it was out of that sympathy that there developed the alliance which carried Reform.

* "Viscount Castlereagh." By Arthur Hassall, M.A., Student and formerly Censor of Christ Church, Oxford. Pitman. 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. Hassall is very severe on writers to whom he refers as "so-called Irish historians," for their criticism of Castlereagh's Irish policy. He thinks they are to blame for ignoring the fact that Castlereagh always held the view that without Catholic Emancipation the Union of Ireland, though itself necessary, would bring in its train innumerable dangers and difficulties. But it is rather cold comfort surely to the men whom Castlereagh bribed into accepting the Union by a promise which he did not redeem, to be told that he knew what a disaster the Union without Emancipation would be. Castlereagh's own record in this matter, though not so bad as Pitt's, is not quite as heroic as Mr. Hassall paints it, for he took office in 1807, his promises not ten years old, in a definitely anti-Catholic Government. Altogether it is difficult to see what Ireland has to thank him for. Mr. Hassall, who is fond of stating his opinion without giving reasons, and dismissing all contrary opinions with some phrase about "profound ignorance," thinks that the time chosen for carrying the Union and the means adopted were right and necessary. Mr. Lecky, after a very careful survey of the evidence, reached the very different conclusion that "it would have been far wiser to have deferred the Union question till the war had terminated, and till the English Ministers had arrived at a well-grounded certainty that it was in their power to carry the measures that could alone have made it acceptable to the majority of the nation."

Mr. Hassall's book is interesting, not for any new light that it throws on Castlereagh's career, but as an example of the persistence of the traditions and ideas of the old governing class in a University of which that class took possession.

A CORRESPONDENT OF BRAHMS.*

THE title-page of the English edition of the Brahms-Herzogenberg correspondence differs slightly from the title on the cover, the latter running, "Letters of Johannes Brahms," while the former runs, "Johannes Brahms: The Herzogenberg Correspondence." The latter is more correct. Brahms's own letters are less than half the total number of those contained in the volume, and, being mostly short, they occupy probably not more than a sixth of the total space. It does not often happen, as it has done in this case, that the interest of a great man's correspondence lies mainly in what is said to him rather than in what he has to say himself; but then, all great men do not have such exceptionally intelligent correspondents as Frau Elisabet von Herzogenberg. She was the wife of one Heinrich von Herzogenberg (1843-1900), a man of wide general culture and some musical capacity, who gradually concentrated himself wholly upon music, making serious studies in technique, and composing a good deal in a conscientious, but apparently not very inspired, style. At first his sympathies had been wholly with Wagner and the so-called "New German" school; later he went back to Bach at his severest, and, for modern music, took Brahms as his model. In his letters and in those of his wife we can see poor Herzogenberg hungering and thirsting for a word of praise from the great man. But praise comes scantily from Brahms. He apparently does not think the music very striking, and it is hard to get any expression of opinion from him upon it. He thanks Herzogenberg for the pieces when they are sent to him; he is busy just then, but hopes to write him about them later; sometimes that is the end of the matter; at others there comes a word or two of encouragement or of guardedly expressed liking. Herzogenberg and his wife, we can see, would be glad of a little more enthusiasm on Brahms's part; and once or twice Elisabet's wifely affection is wounded by something Brahms has said or hinted, and she gives the master a courteous, but firm, lecturing on his unwitting cruelty of speech. But both husband and wife love him to the end with an almost canine devotion.

The real interest of the volume lies in the picture it gives us of the mind and soul of Elisabet. Besides being a woman of unusual general understanding, she was an excellent musician, and particularly quick to seize the fine points of feeling or of workmanship in the music of Brahms. He paid her the compliment of submitting many of his works to her before performance or publication. She frankly told him of anything she thought less admirable than it might be, and more than once he altered a work in deference to her criticism. The pages of the book are strewn with the most delicate and subtle appreciations of Brahms's music; while now and then she lays her finger unerringly on the faults that are typically Brahmsian. She cannot reconcile herself to one of his songs: "Either," she writes, "I am quite irresponsible and capricious in my tastes, or it really is not on the same musical plane with the others. To put it brutally, I feel as if it had only the contours of a Brahms piece—what is called mannerism as distinct from style." In another letter she points out to him that some of his work in the fourth symphony is mere paper-work, impressing the eye but not the ear. She tells him, too, of his occasional woodenness and dryness. "Just because I am so strongly predisposed to enthusiasm, so hotly prejudiced, I might say, in favor of this same Brahms, I often ask myself—softly, discreetly, but I do ask—whether he does not sometimes produce things born, not of his heart's blood, but only . . . of his cleverness, his routine, his supreme skill; while the impulse which stamps the thing produced as inevitable, enduring for all time, is entirely lacking." His "Ständchen" does not please her; it is "more of a Brahms manufacture than a Brahms inspiration." It needed unusual insight to see these things, and unusual honesty to say them.

Brahms at any rate could be sure that in criticising him she was applying to him no standard but one drawn from his own work at its best. She was curiously prejudiced against most other modern music and musicians, especially against anything of Wagnerian tendencies. Her hatred of Wagner is quite amusing. Like Frau Schumann, she is convinced that Wagner is a charlatan who is ruining music. She tells with bated breath of an incredible insult that has been put upon Frau Schumann, who has actually been asked to play at a concert the programme of which includes Wotan's "Abschied." "One Feuerzauber," she writes, "would be Frau Schumann's death. It is inconceivable that she should play. There really is a want of delicacy in the arrangement." Both she and Brahms are fearfully disturbed. Then it turns out that Frau Schumann, with a heroism of which only truly great souls are capable, has announced that she will play, but that, of course, she is not bound to listen to the Feuerzauber. It is evident that both the good ladies took themselves rather seriously on this point. Frau Herzogenberg's dislike of Bruckner also comes out; and it is surprising to read that Brahms shared her opinion of Bruckner, for it has been said elsewhere that Brahms regarded him as the greatest symphonist of the day. We do not see much, however, of Elisabet's little narrownesses; and her letters leave an almost undisturbed impression of a thoughtful, generous, lofty, and beautiful soul. What Brahms thought of her is shown by the fact that he kept her photograph on his writing-table to the day of his death. She died in 1892 of heart disease, aggravated by her devoted nursing of her husband through a serious illness. Brahms survived her only five years, and her husband eight.

The volume has been excellently translated by Miss Bryant, though there is a queer mistake in a note to letter 276, where the texts of the "Four Serious Songs" are spoken of as being "incredible" (unglaublich) instead of "unbelieving" or "irreligious" (ungläubig).

* "Johannes Brahms: The Herzogenberg Correspondence." Edited by Max Kalbeck. Translated by Hannah Bryant. John Murray. 10s. net.

AMONG AUSTRALASIAN CANNIBALS.*

The writer of this autobiography enjoyed the friendship of Robert Louis Stevenson. Some of the incidents in his romantic and unselfish career appealed so strongly to the imagination of the accomplished Scot that he offered to write the life which is here presented to us. But the convenient occasion never came. It is interesting to speculate what the product would have been, if the story had been shaped by the master of such a delicate and picturesque style. The missionary here ventures to tell his own tale, and in lack of fine tapestry we must be content with honest homespun. Perhaps this handsome volume partakes too much of the character of a personal Apology. It is preceded by a sketch of the experiences of a runaway Yorkshire lad who afterwards became an apostle to the cannibals and is rounded off by complimentary resolutions passed in the Methodist Conferences of the Southern hemisphere. Mr. Brown deserves the expressions of confidence he received, for he was often placed in painful and difficult positions, and, if now and again exposing himself to criticism, acted for the most part with cool judgment and served the cause of Polynesian missions for nearly half a century with heroic devotion and painful sacrifice. He is doubtless sensitive to newspaper attacks made upon him a generation ago, but he might well have allowed the simple story of his work to stand as a sufficient vindication. This famous missionary began his career in Samoa when native churches had already been formed. Many instructive things are told us about the island populations in the midst of which he labored. Judging from the admirable photographs with which the book is enriched, the Polynesians of Tonga, Samoa, and Fiji are much more comely than the raw, uncouth ruffians for whose improvement he afterwards toiled, and the explanation may be found in the inheritance of finer traditions of courtesy and loftier standards of feeling, as well as in the beautifying power of a new faith. It is possible that in the forgotten centuries Indian influences may have affected the physique and the etiquette of the higher-grade islanders. Four different names are used to describe the same disease when it appears in different classes of society, or when a man is being addressed by others or is speaking of himself.

Most polite and elaborate forms of speech, from which modern Europe might learn, precede the declaration of war:—

> "When the vanguard of the two opposing parties first met one called out, 'You the eyes of the forest.' The other party at once answered, 'Yes,' or 'It is I.' . . . Then one would walk out unarmed to the opposite party, with many marks of respect, and using the most polite language, say, 'This is a piece of kava for you chiefs and warriors to drink.' The first speaker would then retire, and at once a chief from the opposite side would walk out and present a similar piece of kava to the first party, using the same words and expressions. After this, one of the parties would ask, 'When shall we trample the grass?' The others would answer, 'It is not becoming to us to dictate to such renowned chiefs and warriors as you.' And so the talk might go on for a long time, until at last some one might casually observe the sun appeared to be getting low. The others would at once take advantage of this, and would say, 'Well, if that is so, let us sleep to-night and pray for success and trample the grass to-morrow; it is too late now.' And they would retire, to fight at dawn next morning; but would sleep in peace that night, as such a truce was never broken."

The early missionaries agreed to put out of church membership all who took part in tribal wars, from which policy Mr. Brown dissented. One could almost wish that the spirits of these wise old missionaries might be reborn into the clergy of both the Established and Nonconformist Churches. As we read Mr. Brown's description of a war-palaver in Samoa in which he vainly attempted the part of "holder-back" or peacemaker, we can imagine we are listening to the proposals, compromises, and ultimatums of European statesmen put into child's speech and acted in a nursery, with coral reefs and cocoa-palms for a background.

After fourteen years' service in Samoa, the subject of this autobiography entered upon a formidable piece of fresh work in New Britain. He was accompanied by a staff of Fijian preachers and teachers who had freely offered themselves for the hazardous enterprise and who were somewhat officiously examined and re-examined by the Governor of that newly acquired Crown Colony, to make sure they knew the risks and had counted the cost. Mr. Brown proved himself an evangelist with a strong hand. When a chief who lived close by the Mission Station on Duke of York Island had speared and tomahawked his favorite wife and left her for dead upon the ground this zealous philanthropist took her into his own house, fortified himself against attack and refused to restore her to the chief, who wished to kill her right out, till security had been given for her proper treatment. She afterwards regained her lost position of pre-eminence in the affections of her spouse. Ex-territorial rights were claimed for the Mission House. If such an incident had occurred in some countries of Asia it would have been called a piece of political interference and a disregard of native customs, but amidst primitive races such humane actions, if somewhat masterful, may be the basis from which a better order of life is in due time evolved.

Another incident in the career of this resolute missionary provoked much animadversion at the time. A native preacher brought from Fiji and several teachers were treacherously killed and eaten in a village of New Britain, a few miles from the central station. No warship was at hand to punish the outrage. After calling into council a handful of white traders, reprisals were organised, the missionary taking the part of commander-in-chief of the campaign. One or two of the villages implicated were burned at the cost of a modest death-roll. The plea for this bit of private war was that the lives of the white traders and a white woman would have been in danger if the outrage had been ignored. It is not for those who have never been placed in such a frightful emergency to pronounce judgment. It is easy to point out a more excellent way in the abstract, and a William Penn might have been strong enough to tread it. The line of demarcation between right and wrong under such circumstances is obviously not a red-tape line, although certain British officials, who, perhaps, resent any trespass upon their prerogatives, were amongst the hardest critics of the incident. Colonial opinion was mainly on Mr. Brown's side, and within recent years the man in the street would have applauded the step taken to the echo. But the mind of even the latter is not obsessed forever by dreams of Isandluna. Many who know and honor Mr. Brown would rather not be challenged to pronounce upon the incident. Perhaps the least satisfactory part of this campaign of chastisement was that the chief murderer escaped and people who had no proved personal connection with the outrage were killed, a misfortune which sometimes occurs in orthodox campaigns. At a later stage in his career Mr. Brown had to act a happier part in ending the schism within the churches of Tonga which arose through the dictatorship established under Mr. Shirley Baker, an ex-missionary who had risen into the position of director-general of the converted king's conscience.

This founder of Methodist Missions in what is now known as the Bismarck Archipelago, did the work of a patrolling overseer rather than point duty, and it is scarcely to be expected that he would supply exhaustive studies in primitive culture and in the problem of race-origin such as have been received from missionaries who have concentrated their labors for a generation upon the same tribes. His book, however, abounds in fresh information and casts many side-lights upon these important subjects. He tells us that in one of the scenes where he labored warfare was so common and the suspicions it engendered so wide-spread that people of villages two or three miles apart had no communications with each other, and did not always understand each other's language. The bushmen of the interior hold little intercourse with the coast villages, and move to and fro in almost complete concealment. They cover themselves with leaves and grasses so that it is almost impossible to distinguish them from the background of vegetation. Life is everywhere cheap, and may be paid for by a few cowries. The methods of burial vary. In New Britain the bodies of dead chiefs are put into their canoes and hoisted up into the branches of trees, whilst the bodies of the common tribesmen are sunk in the sea. On one of the Solomon Islands the dead are buried together in cemeteries which are sprinkled over with clean white sea-sand, and the graves are marked by head-stones of variously colored coral. Some

* "George Brown, D.D., Missionary and Explorer." Hodder & Stoughton. 15s. net.

CASSELL'S BOOKS IN DEMAND

Can be obtained at all Libraries and Booksellers. New and Complete Catalogue on application.

WOMEN OF ALL NATIONS

Edited by T. Athol Joyce, M.A., and N. W. Thomas, M.A.

Profusely Illustrated from Photographs and magnificent Plates in Colour. In 2 vols., half leather, gilt top. 15s. net each.

"The text and the illustrations are the last word in popular anthropology. The whole thing is admirably executed throughout."—Morning Leader.

EVERY-DAY JAPAN

By Arthur Lloyd, M.A.

With 8 Coloured Plates and Ninety-six Reproductions from Photographs. 12s. net. Written after Twenty-five Years' Residence and Work in the Country.

"Gives a very complete idea of everyday life, the curious customs and the startling contrasts of modern Japan."—Standard.

THE NATURE BOOK.

Profusely Illustrated from Photographs and a Series of Coloured Plates. Vols. I. and 2 now ready. 12s. each net. Vol. III. in preparation.

"Will form a veritable treasure to all who love wild nature and would read of her ways."—Westminster Gazette.

THE ROYAL BOTANIC GARDENS, KEW.

By W. J. Bean.

Historical and Descriptive. Cloth, gilt back, 20s. net. Large Paper Edition, limited to 100 copies. £3 3s. net.

FAMILIAR SWISS FLOWERS

By F. E. Hulme, F.L.S., F.S.A.

Series 1, With 24 Coloured Plates. 1s. net.

"Everyone will be glad to find a book which teaches so much about Alpine and other plants."—Ladies' Field.

LIFE HISTORY OF FAMILIAR PLANTS

By John J. Ward.

With Rembrandt Frontispiece and numerous Illustrations reproduced from Photographs and Photomicrographs taken by the Author. 6s.

"We know of no book relating to Nature Study to equal Mr. Ward's work, and we heartily commend it to all who are interested in plant life and desire to obtain accurate information relating the many and varied forms in a manner that renders the study a pleasant one."—The Gardeners' Magazine.

THE WALLACE COLLECTION

At Hertford House.

By M. H. Spielmann.

Illustrated. Medium 8vo, paper covers. 1s. Being Notes on the Pictures and other Works of Art, with special reference to the history of their acquisition.

FAITH Its Nature and Work.

By Rt. Rev. Handley C. S. Moule, D.D.

With Photogravure Frontispiece. Portrait of the Author. 3s. 6d.

"A thoughtful and suggestive dissertation on Faith, one of the great watchwords of Christianity."—Birmingham Post.

MIND AND WORK

By Luther M. Gulick, M.D.

3s. 6d. net.

"The doctor deals largely with the relation between the tired mind and the tired body. . . . Contains the answer to many problems."—Yorkshire Evening Post.

QUAINT SUBJECTS OF THE KING

By John Foster Fraser.

With 77 Reproductions from photographs. 6s.

Telling, in a light and chatty manner, about the "Quaint Subjects of the King," and bringing stay-at-homes to realise how varied and strange are the tribes over which His Majesty rules.

FICTION. FICTION.

THE SHOW GIRL

FRONTISPIECE IN COLOURS. 6s. By MAX PEMBERTON.

The Field says:—"A capital story, which is breezy and exciting. We can commend 'The Show Girl' to all who appreciate a brisk story in a setting a good deal out of the common."

THE SWORD OF THE LORD

FRONTISPIECE IN COLOURS. 3s. 6d. By JOSEPH HOCKING.

"Associates a lively human interest of love and adventure with celebrated figures in Church History."—Scotsman.

DOUBLE BONDS

FRONTISPIECE IN COLOURS. 6s. By FLORIND McCALL.

An interesting picture of Australian life, both in the bush and in Melbourne society. A charming love idyll.

THE CIRCULAR STAIRCASE

By MARY ROBERTS RINEHART.

FRONTISPIECE IN COLOURS, AND FIVE HALF TONE PLATES. 6s.

"An admirable specimen of the detective story . . . the melodramic incidents are agreeably toned down by the spontaneous humour of her method of presenting them."—Birmingham Post.

THE YELLOW GOD

An Idol of Africa.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD.

FRONTISPIECE IN COLOURS, AND TWO HALF-TONE PLATES. 6s.

"A breezy, spiritedly written tale of adventures weird and wonderful."—Globe.

"As vivid, thrilling, and picturesque as even Mr. Haggard can make it.—Pall Mall Gazette.

CASSELL & CO., LTD., LONDON, E.C.

Books to be Read

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

PRISCILLA AND CHARYBDIS.

By F. FRANKFORT MOORE, Author of "The Jessamy Bride," &c.

The Times.—"This most entertaining social comedy."

Morning Leader.—"We commend 'Priscilla and Charybdis' to all who like plain unaffected pleasure of a kind not common enough in an age of careless or boring fiction."

THE STORY OF THYRZA.

By ALICE BROWN, Author of "Rose Macleod," &c.

Liverpool Daily Post.—"A charming story, a triumph of simple, sincere, and unaffected art."

THE PERJURER.

By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "The Square Peg."

[Shortly.

GLIMPSES OF THE TWENTIES.

By WILLIAM TOYNBEE, Author of "Vignettes of the Regency." With Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 Plates. demy 8vo, 12/6 net.

Glasgow Herald.—"Mr. Toynbee's absorbingly interesting book is in effect a complete review of English Court and political history during the period from the last days of George III. to the death of George IV."

Daily Telegraph.—"A very able piece of work."

ECONOMIC HERESIES:

Being an Unorthodox Attempt to Appreciate the Economic Problems presented by "Things as They Are." By Sir NATHANIEL NATHAN. Demy 8vo, 10/6 net.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"The author's general attitude may be gathered from his frank recognition that the authority of the professional economists has completely broken down, and that the orthodox teaching requires a thoroughgoing reconstruction . . . A distinctly valuable contribution to the thought of the day."

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF WAGNER.

By ANGELO NEUMANN. With 4 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10/6 net.

Daily Telegraph.—"Call no man a perfect Wagnerite till he has read and digested this addition to Wagnerian literature . . . this delightful and interesting book."

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS.

By FRANCIS GRIERSON, Author of "Modern Mysticism" and "The Celtic Temperament." Demy 8vo, 6/- net.

Nation.—"A genuine document of much historical interest and and artistic force. . . . One scarcely knows whether to admire most the extraordinary tenacity of his memory, or the living freshness of his vivid pictures."

Daily Telegraph.—"A highly significant volume. A picture of the spiritual and intellectual atmosphere of America in the days immediately preceding the Civil War."

THE SONG OF THE STEWARTS: PRELUDE.

By DOUGLAS AINSLIE. Demy 8vo, 7/6 net.

Observer.—"The author has a distinct sense of ballad rhythm, and writes with cultured fervour and distinction."

FAMOUS WOMEN of FLORENCE.

By EDGCUMBE STALEY. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10/6 net. [Next week.

The careers and characters of some of the famous ladies of Florence whose stories illustrate the Renaissance period.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A SILVER FOX.

By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON. With numerous Illustrations by the Author. Demy 8vo, 5/- net.

This charming life of a fox, by the Author of "Lives of the Hunted" and "Two Little Savages," will be ready next week.

THE DOMINION OF DREAMS.

By FIONA MACLEOD. New Edition. Pocket Size. Cloth, 2/6 net; leather, 3/6 net.

The mysterious personality and peculiar genius of the writer who chose the name of Fiona Macleod were never more beautifully rendered than in "The Dominion of Dreams." It was the book she liked best herself, and the critics were unanimous in placing it first among her writings. [Shortly.

N.B.—Every Housewife should read

IDEAS OF A PLAIN COUNTRYWOMAN.

Price 3/- net.

The Westminster Gazette says: "It is a delightful book, full of grace and charm and good sense, and of laughter as well as of tears, and we recommend it to all but the superior."

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD.

10, ORANGE STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE, W.C.

"THE COUNTRY HOME," on sale everywhere.

of the natives tattoo themselves, while others have no such customs. Once Mr. Brown thought he saw white men on the shore where he was about to land, but they proved to be natives who had white-washed their faces and bodies. In one place effigies in conical hats and ruffles were worshipped, which were probably imitations of the first European navigators. The same problems arise amongst savages which beset the steps of the evangelist in more highly civilised countries. A debtor tried to shelter himself from his creditor by making friends with the missionary. Mr. Brown is a close observer of Nature, but it would not be fair to put into a review all he has to tell us of the formation of volcanic islands under his own eye, seas boiling with hot water issuing from a volcano, and the bird which has discovered an incubator for its eggs in the hot crater of a volcano.

Much success has been vouchsafed to these valiant and unselfish labors. The results have been reached through steady teaching and organisation rather than through such magnetic mass-movements, akin to Welsh revivals, which transformed many of the South Sea inhabitants two or three generations ago. Perhaps the islands are too detached and the tribesmen cut up into too small fragments of population to admit of such catching and wide-spread movements. Besides the statistics of communicants and teachers given at the close of the volume we are told that the natives have come to build better houses and improve their cocoanut plantations. This life-story records the attempt to evangelise uncouth savages by the help of converted Tongans, Fijians, Samoans, whose grandfathers were almost as degraded. The imported teachers seem to have been diligent and faithful, although lacking initiative in the absence of the white missionary. The mortality in their ranks was pathetic and they were as much subject to fever as the Europeans themselves. Wisdom in its missionary manifestations is doubtless justified by all her children, but we read this and similar records of self-denial and unwearying devotion with a sense of depression. Lives like those of Patterson, Chalmers, the two Patons, and, last but not least, George Brown have been ungrudgingly lavished in doing a work that for the present does not seem likely to affect the broad stream of human history. Gluttons in human flesh have been changed into harmless trepang, copra, and tortoise-shell gatherers, with a narrow religious outlook; but the influence of such conversions does not seem likely to spread out into the world from the little bits of coral reef and tiny patches of pumice-stone islands where these Melanesians pass their lives. It is, perhaps, no slight gain to prove that, in common with every branch of the human race, they possess the religious instinct and answer to the appeal of better moral ideals. And something surely must be done to cleanse the coarse, bloody scenes enacted almost within sight of the North Australian shores, and to wipe out the steaming abattoirs where human beings are the victims.

---

AN HISTORICAL ROMANCE.*

The qualities that distinguish Mr. Ford Hueffer's historical romances are an imaginative fecundity, seemingly as spontaneous as the flow of water from a spring, and an extraordinary picturesqueness. These qualities, as The Nation has pointed out before, being in excess of the author's psychological insight, are apt to grow overpowering at crises in his tales, and suddenly impair the artistic illusion. His characters, convincing at first, on occasion do the most unlikely things, because their creator's teeming imagination sets no just bounds to their activities. It is a pleasure, however, for a critic, cautious and captious as his fellows, to state that "The Half Moon" is, in his opinion, the best romance Mr. Hueffer has given us, a story most original in its picturesque charm, and one marked by no obvious deficiencies. The book is highly successful in its creation of the mental atmosphere of an age, when, as the author puts it in his dedication, "the Dark Ages were finally breaking up . . . when men were beginning to look out for new faiths, for new methods of government, and perhaps above all, for lands in which Utopias might be found, or might be founded." And the reason, it seems to us, why the author has succeeded in conveying to us a more cunning and convincing illusion of the merchant-adventurers and nobles of the reign of James I. than of the courtiers of Henry VIII. is that he has hit on a period in which the intruding modern breath and modern feeling are just strong enough to make comprehensible to us all those differences of social ideas in the English towns man of to-day and his progenitors of three hundred years ago. In writing an historical romance, the chief difficulty is to strike a just balance between the representation of the permanent elements of human nature and the temporary. Supposing that "Pepys' Diary" were not in existence, and a modern novelist were to select some London citizen of Pepys' day as his hero, we should almost certainly find that the temporary elements were made incongruously modern in feeling, while a Pepys' striking kinship with a modern bourgeois, would not be divined. In like manner, critics a hundred years hence will probably point out with justice that most of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's and Mr. Bernard Shaw's characters are as remote from the reader as, say, the characters of Wycherley—the three distinguished authors having laid too excessive a stress on the fleeting characteristics of their own contemporaries. Human nature at back is unchangeable, but in attitude and conduct it evolves changing features, according to the pressure and stress of its changing environment. The author of an historical novel must therefore study carefully the social conditions of his period, by which the ideas and manners of his characters are largely determined. This Mr. Hueffer has done in "The Half Moon," and where he has not found the exact facts he has been in search of, he has invented them with a brilliancy of imagination that puts to shame Mr. Froude and other professional historians.

The novel opens with an extremely clever picture of life in old-time Rye, three hundred years ago. Outside the gates of Rye Royal lies the quarter of the foreigners, Protestants and Anabaptists from Germany and Holland, who had fled from persecution abroad, and, settling down, "built houses and conventicles for their pastors; wove, cured bacon, dried simples, traded in cordials, or changed money: they buried, they married, they were born, and they were baptised, or they refused to baptise, much at their own sweet wills, denouncing every seventh day, or three times a day, according to their faiths and practices, the bishops and clergy of the Established Church, or the deacons and pastors of the six other several sects that existed amongst them." The most prominent Dutchman is Pastor Koop, who has the care of the Knipperdollings of Rye town, and the worthy man's household is drawn with an admirable felicity of touch which makes Mr. Hueffer's scenes as easily visualised by us as are the interiors of Peter de Hoogh:—

> "The Pastor Koop wore his hair very long for those days; he dressed in hodden-grey; spoke Dutch better than English, and Hebrew better than either. He was extraordinarily square upon his feet; had a lifeless face; corrected all conversations addressed to him so constantly upon points of doctrine, that it was very seldom that he conversed with any one, save his deacon or his long-haired apprentice. . . . Magdalena Koop was very conversant with both doctrines, by reason of her father's enunciation of the one and denunciation of the other; she was fairly confident of another fifty years of life; she was able to contemplate herself with placidity, for she was fair, large, strong, gentle, and enduring. She could read Dutch and English, she could write English, she could nearly understand Hebrew when it was read to her in passages familiar to her in the Scriptures. She wore rather Dutch clothes: a white hood, and, on fair days, golden twists above her ears; her hair was golden, her eyes large and blue, her forehead white and smooth. . . . She wove an excellent strong cloth for making men's coats of, and had a linen loom of her own in the big room below the rafters, where she sat all through the summer days, with the roof-door open, looking at Edward Colman among his ships, and throwing backwards and forwards the shuttle.
>
> "She sat with Edward Colman in the shadows of the dusky houseplace. The Pastor, huge, square, and decorated with horn spectacles, sat astride a three-legged chair, his huge book upon a ledge that rose from the chair-back, after the manner of a lectern. It was the Pastor's habit thus to sit astride whether he read or wrote. Beside him, with long, lank hair, a high-crowned hat, and a lugubrious expression, on the broad hearth, with his woollen stockings stretched across

* "The Half Moon. A Romance of the Old World and the New. By Ford Madox Hueffer. Eveleigh Nash. 6s.

NIETZSCHE.

"The most remarkable writer of Europe for a generation."

NEW AND COMPLETE EDITION OF WORKS.

Volumes just published—

Thoughts Out of Season. Vol. I. With preface and introduction to series. 230 pages. 2/6 net.

Thoughts Out of Season. Vol. II. 214 pages. 2/6 net.

The Birth of Tragedy. With biographical introduction by the philosopher's sister. 230 pages. 2/6 net.

Thus Spake Zarathustra. With introduction and commentary. 650 pages. 6/- net.

Beyond Good and Evil. With introduction. 276 pages. 3/6 net.

The Future of our Educational Institutions. 2/6 net.

Ready this year—

Human-all-too-Human. 2 Vols. 5/- net each.

The Gay Science. 6/- net.

The Will to Power. Vol. I. 5/- net.

A complete list of NIETZSCHE Literature post free from—

T. N. FOULIS, 21, Paternoster Square, E.C.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

No. 428. APRIL, 1909. Price 6s.

I. GERMAN IMPERIAL FINANCE.
II. HALLEY'S COMET.
III. THE PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE OF LABOUR CO-PARTNERSHIP.
IV. THE POETRY OF CARDUCCI.
V. PRAGMATISM.
VI. THE ECONOMICS OF EMPIRE.
VII. FRENCH LITERATURE FROM THE RENAISSANCE TO THE "CLASSIC AGE."
VIII. THE POOR LAW REPORT OF 1909.
IX. TWO CANADIAN POETS: FRÉCHETTE AND DRUMMOND.
X. SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY.
XI. THE POLITICAL SCENE.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

10/6 FOR 5/6 Post Free. ABROAD 6/-

THE VARIORUM REFERENCE BIBLE

With Footnotes giving a Digest of the Various Readings and Renderings.

Edited by Cheyne, Clark, Driver, Goodwin and Sanday.

Handsome Morocco Yapp. Specimen Page post free.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

THE

NEW QUARTERLY

A Review of Science and Literature.

Edited by DESMOND MacCARTHY.

Contents for April, 1909:

Is Immortality Desirable? ... G. LOWES DICKINSON
An Essay in Æsthetics ... ... ... ... ROGER FRY
Gogol, and the Cheerfulness of the Russian People MAURICE BARING
Genius ... ... ... ... ... SAMUEL BUTLER
The Physics of M. Gustave Le Bon NORMAN R. CAMPBELL
The Ideas of William Morris ... A. CLUTTON-BROCK
The Old Culture and the New ... ... OSCAR BROWNING
Letters from Thomas Carlyle to the Socialists of 1830
Flaubert and Some Critics ... ... T. STURGE MOORE

2s. 6d. net. Yearly Subscription, 10s. post free.

A POCKET LEXICON AND CONCORDANCE TO THE TEMPLE SHAKESPEARE.

Prepared by MARIAN EDWARDS.

Illustrated, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. net.

Consists of various readings and interpretations of words and phrases, including the latest contributions given in the Oxford Dictionary. The Glossary is accompanied by a Concordance; and illustrations from authentic sources have been introduced as a necessary means of understanding words referring to dress, armour, etc.

NEW POOR LAW or NO POOR LAW.

Being a Description of the Majority and Minority Reports of the Poor Law Commission. With an Introductory Note by Canon BARNETT. 1s. net.

J. M. DENT, Aldine House, Bedford St., W.C.

A NEW WORK BY

Sir J. Compton-Rickett,

D.L., M.P.,
Author of "THE CHRIST THAT IS TO BE."
"THE QUICKENING OF CALIBAN," etc.

6/= PUBLISHED TO-DAY UNDER THE TITLE 6/=

Origins and Faith

Hodder and Stoughton, London, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2 COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

the sea-coal fire, there sat the Pastor's deacon and apprentice, Tribulation Jones, an Englishman, who patiently carved the head of a bobbin of boxwood into a grotesque face, with squinting eyes and a protruding tongue. Edward Colman was drawing upon a slate that he used because paper was dear, the lines of a ship of seventy tons. The price of timber having risen very much in that neighborhood of late years, it was a matter to be considered to make the lines of a ship to take very little timber. From time to time he spoke, saying, 'So!' or 'So!' with his eyes upon his drawing, and his little smile upon his lips.

"Magdalena sat close beside him upon the polished oak-wood top of the chest; at times she looked tranquilly over his shoulder; at times she polished the brass sconce that she had taken down from the wall; at times she lifted slowly to her nostrils one or other of the two oranges that Edward Colman had brought to her, and that lay on the dark, polished wood of the huge table. The firelight flickered tranquilly upon the wooden chests that lined all the walls as high as the beams of the ceiling; it flickered on the metal hinges, and dimly on the sconces along the walls. Mirror-bright as they were, they were covered with network to keep them unsullied. Every piece of furniture in the room was, in the older Dutch fashion, formed of a chest. The seats all round the walls, upon which, during service time, the Pastor's disciples sat, were formed of chests standing before the other chests. The huge table itself had lockers below; the chairs themselves, all save the Pastor's, were formed of chests that had necks or arms set to them. And all of these things were of wood that Magdalena polished, with a love for the brown, rich surfaces, and for the love of polishing, that was as great, as tranquil, and as deep as her love for Edward Colman, or for the scent of that rare fruit, the orange. She looked upon Edward Colman's drawing, and it was good; upon his smile—and it was good; upon the brown wood of the chests, and it was good; and she inhaled the perfume of the orange's surface—and that was good.

"The Pastor turned over a leaf; pushed the horn spectacles up to his forehead; took with the little tongs a coal from the brass brazier on the table, and set it on his pipe. He puffed out wreaths of smoke, but never took his eyes from the page. The apprentice laid down his carving with a sigh; turned up his eyes towards the chimney-bar above his head; muttered with his lips, and then began to bray the Pastor's cane tobacco that was warming in a boxwood mortar beside his knees. Then they were all still again, and the fire rustled."

Edward Colman, the sailor hero, is denounced by the woman he has slighted, Anne Jeal, the Mayoress of Rye, to the Lord Lieutenant of Sussex, the Earl Dalgarno, on the charge of "owling"—i.e., the illicit trade in wool with the Continent. The officers come to seize him in Pastor Koop's house, but are outwitted by the slimness of the Dutchman, and Edward Colman escapes to Amsterdam, where he ships on board the "Half Moon," a vessel commanded by Henry Hudson, the discoverer of the North-West Passage. The brilliant audacity of Mr. Hueffer's imagination finds full scope in the ingenious plot by which we follow the hero on his adventurous voyage to the New World with the great navigator and his crew of sullen and mutinous Dutchmen, while the termagant Anne Jeal, having failed in her plan of kidnapping him in Amsterdam, pursues him by bearing false witness against him before King James, and by casting witch spells and sorceries to bring him and his ship to grief. The scene between the furious Mayoress and the Scottish Solomon who, to discomfit his attendant lords, is eager to swallow all the lies she invents, has in it a whimsical quaintness that seems to spring from life itself. Again, Hudson's learned expositions to his men of the navigator's passion for sailing unknown seas have an individuality of tone that is surely no mere invention of the modern mind. But the best proof of the author's familiarity with the mental atmosphere of his period is that he almost makes us believe that his hero's ill fortune is actually interwoven with the incantations of Anne Jeal! That is to say, he admits us into that dim-lit region of superstitious fear which existed even in the minds of even the most far-sighted and sagacious thinkers of James I.'s day. The scenes on board the "Half Moon" are, perhaps, a trifle overcharged with the picturesque quaintness which characterises all Mr. Hueffer's descriptions, but his portrait of the great navigator, Hudson, is a most cunning and impressive study. While the "Half Moon" is too romantic in its elaborate picturesqueness to persuade us that Hudson and his companions were, indeed, thus and no other, the book, as a study of atmosphere and manners, is far more convincing than the work of many modern historians who, laboring to construct a body of historical facts, are powerless to fashion for us either a living image of the period or recreate its animating soul.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. Frederick Lawton has lived for the past twenty years in France, where he has been personally acquainted with many of the leading personalities in politics and letters. His book on "The Third French Republic" (Grant Richards, 12s. 6d. net) is a capable performance which gives the reader an excellent summary of French history since the downfall of the Second Empire in 1871. After a short introduction, stating the main problems with which the Republic is at present confronted, the author summarises the events that led up to the Commune and the establishment of the Third Republic. Then follow six chapters on the Presidencies of Thiers, MacMahon, Grévy, Carnot, Casimir Périer, Faure, Loubet, and Fallières, which, we must point out, do not correspond with the more important political developments of the time. Four chapters deal with literature, science, and art, and the book ends with a discussion of the mutualist movement, education, the Parliamentary system, and other topics of present interest. The falling in the birthrate, to which so many observers point as a sure proof of French decadence, is not regarded by Mr. Lawton as a danger to the nation's future nor as a menace to her military security. It will not, he says, go beyond the limit at which families can provide for their offspring in comfort, and in the meantime the Government has an opportunity of suppressing pauperism and thus increasing the vigor of the whole people. It is a pity that Mr. Lawton thought it necessary to introduce so many names into his chapters treating of literature and art. They read too much like a catalogue, and, in the space allowed to each writer or artist, anything like adequate criticism or appreciation is impossible. All contemporary histories are open to the objection that most of the matters dealt with are as yet undecided, and, until they are, no writer can be sure that he has seized upon their correct significance. Nevertheless, Mr. Lawton's work is one of value. He is temperate in his statements and guarded in his conclusions. The book may be recommended to those who wish to learn the main facts of contemporary French history, as well as the points upon which French policy must be concentrated in the immediate future.

* * *

Mr. Horace Bleackley is known as a writer on some of the less familiar aspects of eighteenth century history, and he urges in the preface to "Ladies Fair and Frail: Sketches of the Demi-monde during the Eighteenth Century" (Lane, 12s. 6d. net), that "when the large coverts are exhausted one can only beat the copses and hedgerows." He has accordingly written biographies of six of the most celebrated courtesans of the Georgian era—Fanny Murray, Kitty Fisher, Nancy Parsons, Kitty Kennedy, Grace Dalrymple Eliot, and Gertrude Mahon. The first of these had some influence on politics, for she was the heroine of "An Essay on Woman," a ribald paraphrase of Pope's "Essay on Man," of which Wilkes was charged with being the author, and when he escaped to Calais was expelled from Parliament and made an outlaw. Nancy Parsons' name is preserved in the pages of "Junius," while Grace Dalrymple Eliot's "Memoirs" are known to all students of the French Revolution. The subjects are thus not without historical interest, quite apart from their value as illustrating the social life of the time. Mr. Bleackley has a thorough knowledge of the period, and writes about it in entertaining fashion. His book is on a much higher level than are most of the compilations upon similar subjects which we have met.

* * *

"Galicia," says Miss Annette M. B. Meakin in the opening sentence of her new book, "Galicia: The Switzerland of Spain" (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net), "is the least known and the least written about of all the little kingdoms that go to the making of Spain." Miss Meakin's enthusiasm is, however, likely to attract a good number of tourists to that unfrequented district, for her account of its scenery and architecture makes it appear in a singularly pleasant light. Her book is of a type now very much in vogue, which may be best described as a glorified guide-book. It tells all most people will want to know about the history of Galicia, describes many of its most interesting buildings, and gives information about the lives and habits of the people. For

THE LEGAL
Insurance Company, LTD.

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell,
The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane,
The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Chairman - J. FIELD BEALE, Solicitor.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion.

Write for particulars. HENRY M. LOW, General Manager

THIS IS THE TIME OF YEAR WHEN

Liver troubles

ARE MORE PREVALENT.

If the Liver is weak, the change from Summer to Autumn, renders it incapable of performing its duties, and the result is, an accumulation of bile in the blood which causes depression, irritability, and may develop into Dropsy.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets

will quickly and positively cure all Liver disorders, When the valuable curative and tonic properties they contain, are absorbed into the system, the circulation carries them direct to the Liver, where they stimulate this organ to perform its duties naturally, and strengthen it to maintain health action. MERIT'S LIVERETS are prepared as prescribed by an eminent Physician, from purely vegetable ingredients. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists and Stores, or if unable to obtain, send direct to

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name "MERIT'S LIVERETS." and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Spurious imitations will not cure you.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Will be Ready Shortly, and will be sent free, on application to the Manager.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A TONIC FOR THE FEET.—For all Relaxed, Tender, Swollen conditions of the Feet, Pedestrine gives instant relief. It allays inflammation and the painful smarting that keeps you in perpetual discomfort. A trial will convince. 1/3 and 2/6 post free. Marshall & Co., 70A, Basinghall Street, E.C.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

The Daily News

is now printed simultaneously in London and Manchester.

This means that Liberals all England over are able to get the representative Liberal organ every morning at the same time as their local daily.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

London Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.
Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

SITUATION VACANT.

SECRETARY: required by June 15th, for large Women's Political Organisation, well qualified Woman Secretary to take charge of office; must be a convinced Liberal and take a keen interest in all political questions.—Salary £150 per annum.—Applications by letter only to Mrs. BROADLEY REID, 124, Victoria Street, London, S.W.

English readers, Galicia is associated with Sir John Moore's death at Corunna and Sir Francis Drake's raid after the defeat of the Armada. The chief disadvantage of this remote corner of Spain from the point of view of the inhabitants is the heavy rainfall, which is one of the greatest in Europe, but this is not without its compensations to the tourist, for the country is richly wooded, has plenty of water, and is cool and shady at a time when the rest of Spain is unpleasantly hot. There is an interesting chapter on the great monasteries of Galicia, chief among them being the Cistercian monastery of Osera, "the Escurial of Galicia." As supplementary to the more regular guide-books, Miss Meakin's volume could hardly be bettered, while those who have no intention of visiting Galicia can read it with enjoyment.

* * *

An excellent work-a-day book of birds is the new edition of "British Birds in their Haunts," by the Rev. C. A. Johns (Routledge, 7s. 6d. net). This carefully written work was not designed for the sumptuous colored illustrations that its new editor, Mr. J. A. Owen, has given it. They are by Mr. William Foster, and there are 256 of them on sixty-four plates. They are diagrammatic rather than pictorial in execution, but the coloring and often the characteristic attitudes of the subjects are faithfully given, and pictures could not well be better as a means of identification. A comprehensive statement of the classification of our birds is included, and the late author's description of each species is very readable.

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning. April 16. | Price Friday morning, April 23. |
|---|---|---|
| Consols 2½ per cent. ... ... ... | 85 7/16 ... | 85 1/16 |
| French 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 97 ... | 97 |
| German 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 85½ ... | 85 |
| Russian Fives ... ... ... ... | 100¼ ... | 100⅞ |
| Peru Pref. ... ... ... ... ... | 33½ ... | 32 |
| Turkish Unified ... ... ... ... | 92½ ... | 92¼ |

This week attention has been absorbed in the thrilling drama of Constantinople. Turkey and the Balkans have provided plenty of anxiety and excitement during the last six months, and as soon as one crisis has been safely passed, another supervenes. Consols have been depressed partly by this new alarm, partly by rumors of a naval loan, partly by more credible reports of a new issue of Irish land stock but still more by fear that the forthcoming budget will mean a reduction of the Sinking Fund. Mr. Fielding's budget statement made at Ottawa on Tuesday was more satisfactory than had been expected. The deficiency of revenue caused by bad trade has been offset by heroic retrenchments which are to be continued this year. Thus increase of taxation has been avoided. Nevertheless over ten millions sterling has been added to the debt of the Dominion in the last twelve months, of which three-fourths have been absorbed by the new railway line from coast to coast. However, the population of Canada has now reached seven millions, and there is little doubt that the line, however costly, will be ultimately remunerative, or, at least, reproductive. Perhaps the most striking feature of the Canadian budget is the withdrawal of sugar preference from the West Indies, owing to a belief that the West Indian planters have made a combine in order to extract the whole difference conceded to them by the Canadian preference. It is a good object lesson in the policy of Colonial preferences, and an illustration of the bickerings which would ensue if we once embarked upon an "imperial" scheme.

The Stock Markets.

Money has now become so cheap that bankers have actually been lending at below 1 per cent., and discounts are weaker in sympathy. Thus speculators are encouraged to buy stocks in the hope of a rise, and an upward heave may take place. On the other hand, all the great Powers are faced by deficits, and by the necessity for new debt or new taxation. In the foreign market there has been a large inquiry for bonds which can be deposited with bankers as security for loans. The weakest spot in the market has been Peru Preference, which seems to be regarded with suspicion owing to poor traffics, the recent earthquake in Peru, and other causes. The new Chilian loan, on the other hand, is in favor.

The Mexican Report.

The directors of the Mexican Railway have presented their shareholders with quite a reasonably good report, and they can look forward to a much more peaceful meeting than they had at the end of last year. There is, of course, a considerable decline in receipts, but that one would expect; and in view of the bad condition of Mexican trade in general a drop of 600,000 dol. in gross is not particularly bad. The figures in Mexican currency are as follows:—

| | 1907. | 1908. | Dec. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Receipts ... ... | $4,061,601 ... | $3,444,454 ... | —$617,147 |
| Expenses ... ... | 2,363,645 ... | 2,094,294 ... | — 269,351 |
| Net ... ... ... | 1,697,956 ... | 1,350,160 ... | — 347,796 |

Thus the balance carried to net revenue account was 1,350,160 dol., which, in sterling, is £138,129. With interest, &c., the amount available for distribution amounts to £140,759, a drop of £51,000 from the corresponding figures of last year. The main reason for this difference is the sale of the Vera Cruz Pier and Terminal, a business that produced £14,723 in the second half of 1907, but half-way through last year was handed over to a separate company in return for £148,700 in 4½ per cent. debentures. The first preference stock now gets a dividend of 6⅜ per cent., against the full 8 per cent. last year, and the second preference gets nothing, as against 5¾ per cent. Owing to the system on which the company is capitalised, the stocks are necessarily very speculative, the small issue of second preference stock requiring only about £30,000 to pay the dividend in full for the half-year. In the last few years there has been more criticism of the directors of the line than, perhaps, of any other railway board in England, and one reason for this undoubtedly is that the stocks lend themselves so easily to speculation. It would not be a bad thing to reorganise the capital. The report has had a good effect on the market, and prices this week have been rising. Quotations on Thursday are as follows:—

| | |
|---|---|
| First Preference ... ... .. ... ... | 127⅜ |
| Second ,, ... ... ... ... ... | 62¾ |
| Ordinary ,, ... ... ... ... ... | 30 |

The second preference went up to par in 1907 and varied in 1908 between 46 and 49¼. It does not look too cheap at its present figure.

U.S. Gloves and Woollens.

In his speech introducing the new Tariff Bill, the Hon. Sereno E. Payne (chairman of the Tariff Committee) had to defend an enormous increase in the duty on gloves which was slipped in, they say, to please some of his friends and supporters who happened to be glove manufacturers. "Women," he said, "could get along without the kid gloves, or use fewer pairs of them, use silk gloves and cotton gloves, and all that sort of thing. They could keep their hands warm, although they could not cover their pride." This gallantry is, however, already repented of, for 300,000 women in Chicago alone have signed a petition against the new tax; and Senator Aldrich, whose interest is in the woollen business rather than in gloves, has apparently dropped Mr. Payne's speciality in the Senate. The "Evening Post" reminds me of the part played by a certain Mr. North in composing the woollen schedules of the Dingley Bill. He was a confidential clerk working under Senator Aldrich while that bill was framing, and was at the same time the paid secretary of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers! He was loaned to Senator Aldrich's committee by his employers. When the Dingley law passed, the wool manufacturers gave Mr. North 5,000 dol. "in recognition of the arduous and responsible work" he had done in Washington. It has been repeatedly charged, and not denied, adds the Washington correspondent of the "Post," that Lucius N. Littauer, an ex-member of Congress, a glove manufacturer at Gloversville, in New York State, had a hand in framing the glove paragraph in the Payne bill.

Lucellum.

BENGER'S

Benger's Food prepared with milk, is a complete food.

The more delicate the state of health—the greater the need for it.

When other foods fail try Benger's; but it's wisest to use Benger's in the first instance.

For Invalids and the aged.

Benger's Food is sold in Tins by Chemists, etc., everywhere.

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

TOURS.

£14 14s. Cruise, R.M.S. "Dunottar Castle," 5,625 Tons. Leaving Marseilles April 28th, arriving Southampton May 12th.

Visiting PALERMO, TUNIS, ALGIERS, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER and LISBON.

Full particulars from the Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING

Rowntree's

"Warms and Cheers"

Try it!—
"One taste is worth a chapter of talk."

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 600 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, E.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.
BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.
LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.
A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.
Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.
THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.
SUMMER TERM COMMENCES APRIL 28th, 1909.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.
Chemical and Physical Laboratories, Workshops, &c.
FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.
Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.
Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.
(The Royal Naval School.)
Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large Playing-fields, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath; Chemical and Physical Laboratories; Cadet Corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarships Hertford and Merton College; Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. NEXT TERM, April 28th. Apply Headmaster: Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauser, Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.
Six Scholarships (£60 and under) will be offered on June 16th. Examination at Giggleswick, in London, or at Preparatory Schools. Particulars from Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle Yorkshire.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

MALVERN COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATIONS, JUNE 1st 2nd, and 3rd, one of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Boys) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in Examination. Council Nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well but fail to obtain a Scholarship.—For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE FOR WOMEN
(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).
ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS.—Twelve Entrance Scholarships, from £50 to £60, and several Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years at the College, will be awarded on the results of an Examination to be held from June 28th to July 2nd, 1909. Names must be entered before May 29th.
The College prepares Students for London Degrees. Inclusive fee, £100 a year.
For forms of entry and further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.
Head Master: ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.)
PREPARATION FOR UNIVERSITIES.
CITIZENSHIP COURSE.
LEISURE-HOUR WORK.
For Copies of Prospectus, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.
SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.
Principal: MISS AMY KEMP.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.
THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.
Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.
Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.
ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.
Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations 30 minutes from London.
Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel &Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line
52 ,, ... ... 6d. ,,

1650

To every particular Member of Parliament,

The humble Addreſs of the Sope-makers of London that lately preſented their Petition to this Honourable Houſe,

SHEWETH,

THe Complaint of the Sope-makers in briefis, That by reaſon of an Exciſe laid upon their Materials, and after they have made them into Sope, They are forced to pay 4*s.* 8*d. per* Barrel Exciſe; by meanes of which, thoſe that make it in holes and corners, ſteal the Exciſe of the ſaid 4*s.* 8*d. per* Barrel, and ſo are able to underſell them that pay it; by meanes whereof their Trade is loſt and deſtroyed. For remedy of which, they humbly deſire the Parliament will be pleaſed to lay 12*d. per l.* Exciſe upon all the imported Materials that Sope is made of, and totally take off the foreſaid 4*s.* 8*d. per* Barrel; which they humbly conceive will bring in annually, an equal revenue to what hath riſen of late years, both out of the Exciſe of Sope, and the 6*d.* in every 20*s.* that the Materials have paid, whereby all that make Sope ſhall equally bear the burthen of the Exciſe; and in caſe the Parliament ſhall Judge the ſaid 12*d. per pound* Exciſe upon the materials, not to be enough, they leave it to their Judgements and deſcretions to lay ſo much more above the ſaid 12*d.* in every 20*s.* upon the Materials onely, as they Judge annually will fully make up the ſame.

And they moſt humbly deſire that the Parliament would ſpeedily put this their Juſt Sute to an abſolute and final iſſue, and call upon Colonel George Thompſon to make his Report in the premiſes.

Roger Pears

| | |
|---|---|
| John Hayes | John Hardwick |
| John Lilburne | Lawrence Whitwel |
| Tho. Howlet | Symon Weedon |
| Thomas Woodſtocke | Robert Barfoote |
| John Hutcheſt | Caleb Phinnies |
| Robert Drinkwater | John Murdock |
| Edm. Halley | Rickard Cox |
| William Rudd | Edward Leader |
| Edw. Whitwell | Tho. Bromley |
| Ja. Baker | William Heſter |
| John Wolcot | Tho. Poulsney |

1650.

Sorſon Dee

That when in the Collicrug days of Charles the Second Pears was making Soap

"The Nation," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by The National Press Agency Limited, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by The Nation Publishing Company Limited, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—Saturday, April 24, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 5.] SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Diary of the Week | 145 |
| Politics and Affairs:— | |
| The First Democratic Budget | 148 |
| Land Taxes in the Budget | 149 |
| The Future of Young Turkey | 150 |
| The Last of the Tyrants | 151 |
| Life and Letters:— | |
| The Game of Efficiency | 153 |
| The Sale of a Soul | 154 |
| The Art of Reading Poetry | 155 |
| A Sussex Hanger in Spring | 156 |
| Contemporaries:— | |
| The Chancellor of the Exchequer | 157 |
| Solitary Confinement. An Open Letter to the Home Secretary. By John Galsworthy | 158 |
| Present-Day Problems:— | |
| Organised Labor and Practical Politics.—II. By T. Kirkup | 160 |
| Letter from Abroad:— | |
| Abdul Hamid's Plot and its Failure. By Edwin Pears | 161 |
| Letters to the Editor:— | |
| The Declaration of London. By the Rev. T. J. Lawrence | 162 |
| The Defects of Liberal Propaganda. By W. M. T. | 163 |
| The Unfortunate Argyll. By the Rev. John Willcock | 163 |
| The Salvation Army's Social Work. By Ronald H. Kidd and Social Reformer | 164 |
| The Object of German Expansion. By a Yorkshire Radical | 165 |
| The Small Holdings Act. By A. E. R. Gill | 165 |
| "The Growth of International Law." By D. M. Mason | 166 |
| The Papacy and Joan of Arc. By G. | 166 |
| Concerning our Frivolous Stage. By Austin Harrison | 166 |
| London University Commission. By Professor Kirsopp Lake | 167 |
| Swinburne and the Sea. By Richard H. P. Curle | 167 |
| Poetry:— | |
| Ode in April. By R. C. K. Ensor | 167 |
| The World of Books | 168 |
| Books to be Read | 168 |
| Reviews:— | |
| The Teaching of the Spirit | 169 |
| Causes of Defeat | 170 |
| London by the Sea | 171 |
| Uncle Gregory | 171 |
| Books in Brief:— | |
| The National Gallery | 174 |
| On the Tracks of Life | 174 |
| Passing English of the Victorian Era | 174 |
| Motor Tours in Yorkshire | 174 |
| Fair Women at Fontainebleau | 176 |
| Insect Stories | 176 |
| The Week in the City. By Lucellum | 176 |

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

On Thursday Mr. Lloyd George introduced the first great democratic Budget ever set before the House of Commons, in a speech lasting, with half an hour's interval for physical weariness, from five minutes to three o'clock to eight o'clock. No such effort of exposition had to be undertaken, even by Gladstone, in the most intricate of his Budgets. The speech was, in fact, the initiation of a broad policy of betterment for the people of Great Britain, whose fruits will be developed, not as Mr. Austen Chamberlain properly said, in one Budget, but in "a series of Budgets." This will be apparent when the financial scope of the proposals is realised. The Chancellor had to deal with a total deficit—due mainly to old age pensions and the increased Navy Estimates—of £15,762,000. But a careful view of his anticipations of the immediate increment of his fresh taxes suggests that even in 1910 he may be able to handle the magnificent surplus of £9,000,000. This will enable him not only to provide for the new "Dreadnoughts" which next year alone will cost almost five millions, but to begin to finance his far-reaching scheme of a universal compulsory insurance for the work-people of Great Britain, which should remove the fear of hunger from the entire body of manual laborers. This result Mr. George achieves, in the main, without calling on the mass of the professional and trading classes, by actually relieving the earned incomes of fathers of families which do not exceed £500 a year, and by calling on the workman for a small contribution from his tobacco fund.

* * *

The chief sources of new revenue which he opens up are:—

A. The land of Great Britain (partially excluding agricultural land), and its natural increments of value, with special reference to its mineral wealth and its urban developments.

B. The monopoly value of licences for the sale of liquor, obtained through a moderate adaptation of the American system of high licences. Both A and B represent the bringing into account of forms of social wealth.

C. The mass of rentiers, the higher ranges of unearned incomes, and the greater accumulations of capital accruing through death.

D. A levy on the motor trade, based on an agreed scale of taxes on motor-power, together with a tax on petrol, to be devoted to the maintenance of the roads, the balance for the relief of the rates.

E. The raising of the spirit duty and the tobacco taxes.

* * *

We proceed to state the immediate yield of all these imposts, and the way in which they fill the deficit. They are to be supplemented by three millions taken from the old Sinking Fund, which henceforth disappears as an automatic provision for the reduction of debt, and will re-appear in future years as a National Development Fund for enlarging the internal resources of the country. The full resources of Mr. George's many adroit and bold devices in taxation will, of course, be gradually developed, until they form at once a permanent endowment of social reform (the insurance fund, for example, will probably draw five millions a year), and a solid rampart against Protection.

* * *

| | |
|---|---|
| 2d. extra on all unearned incomes ... | £3,000,000 |
| Surtax of sixpence on incomes of over £5,000, levied on the amount by which they exceed £3,000 ... | £500,000 |
| New scale of Estate Duties, ranging from four per cent. on £5,000, to 15 per cent. on over a million, increase of one per cent. in settlement duty, and new legacy and succession duties raised from 3 to 5 per cent. for close relatives, and 10 per cent. for distant relatives.. | £2,850,000 |
| New scale of Stamp Duties ... ... | £650,000 |
| New scale of Licence Duties beginning at 50 per cent. of the annual value and subject to a minimum scale based on population, ranging from £5 in rural districts to £35 in London; 3d. in the £ on the receipts from liquor in clubs ... | £2,600,000 |
| New Spirit Duties (3s. 9d. a gallon)... | £1,600,000 |
| 8d. per lb. on manufactured tobacco ... | £1,900,000 |
| Land Taxes; 20 per cent. on unearned increments, a halfpenny in the £ on the capital value of unemployed urban and mineral land, 10 per cent. on benefits arising from the determination of leases ... ... | £500,000 |
| Total New Taxes ... ... ... | £13,600,000 |

It will be observed that though the sum of these taxes is large, not one of them is other than moderate in amount.

* * *

THE following are the main lines of immediate provision for social and reforming needs:—

| | |
|---|---|
| Road Repairs and Extension ... ... | £600,000 |
| Development Fund (afforestation, scientific agriculture, &c.) ... ... ... | £200,000 |
| Labor Exchanges ... ... ... ... | £100,000 |
| Land Valuation ... ... ... ... | £50,000 |

The larger schemes of social betterment indicated in the speech cover the inclusion of paupers in the old age pension schemes, and a plan of universal compulsory, State-aided assurance against sickness, invalidity, and unemployment. Mr. Lloyd George concluded his wonderful effort of adaptive, constructive, and prospective statesmanship by declaring that the Budget was a war Budget—"a declaration" of "implacable war against poverty," with the ultimate end of making the wolf of want as remote from the doors of the British people of to-day as the wolves that once infested their forests.

* * *

THE Opposition criticism of this tremendous scheme was, on the whole, less bitter than might have been expected. Mr. Austen Chamberlain was singularly mild, only reproaching the vagueness of the Chancellor's plans, and complaining that they were practically an "electoral manifesto," covering the legislative work of years. Mr. Balfour was silent. The Irish are repelled by the new whisky and tobacco duties, and threaten opposition. The Labor party is undoubtedly both surprised and warmly appreciative. The Ministerialists proper show much enthusiasm in the Radical ranks, and general content, based on the feeling that great and worthy combative and moral issues are opened up to them.

* * *

THE Tory Press inclines to bitterness, but is clearly puzzled what and where to attack—for though wealth is made to bear the main burden of the Budget no single impost is of a crushing character. This disables the Lords from their threatened attack—for the country will not rally round those who ultimately will be the chief sufferers from the Budget—the great ground landlords, and the very wealthy and luxurious classes, with a small fringe of earners of high "ability" incomes. The "Standard" absurdly calls the Budget an attack on the middle-classes, the "Telegraph" describes it as a "penal" Budget, and the "Times" suggests that it "increases the uneasiness of all who have property to be taxed." The final point that the Budget finances the present and future naval programmes destroys much of the hostile criticism. Probably the landed interests will make the chief rally; while in the House of Commons the only apparent difficulties are the necessary complexity of the Budget, the number of its critical points, and the Irish opposition.

* * *

LIBERAL Turkey has at last destroyed its enemy. On Saturday morning the army from Salonika and Adrianople, under the orders of Mahmoud Shefket Pasha, having completed its investment of the capital, marched in divisions on Stamboul, Galata, and Pera, captured the bridges, stormed the barracks where the mutinied regiments were quartered, and surrounded Yildiz Kiosk and its garrison. On Monday the army compelled its surrender by cutting off supplies, and made Abdul Hamid prisoner without bloodshed. The street fighting was sharp, and both forces lost heavily. The attack was actually led by Enver Bey, the young and brilliant military hero of the Revolution. Ten thousand prisoners —soldiers, spies, and reactionary priests and preachers— were taken and disarmed, the city was placed under martial law, and a Military Commission appointed to try offenders, many of whom were discovered with large sums of money on their persons.

* * *

MEANWHILE the National Assembly, returning from San Stefano to Stamboul, sat in the Parliament House to settle the fate of the Sultan—its Charles the First—and decided unanimously to depose him. To this end the aid of the supreme interpreter of the Mohammedan Sacred Law, the Sheikh-ul-Islam, was first invoked. A fetva or decree, by this official, a Liberal, was read, reciting, in the general terms appropriate to such a document, the crimes of Abdul Hamid—the destruction of certain Sacred Books, the slaughter, imprisonment, and exile of his subjects without legal cause, his perjury to the Constitution, and the strife and confusion which that act had caused—and authorising his removal. Abdul Hamid's fate was announced to him at Yildiz. He is said to have received the news in terror, to have begged piteously for his life, to have recited the good deeds of his reign, including the Greek War, and to have asked for leave to retire to the Cheragan Palace on the Bosphorus, where he was born. This was refused him, and he was conveyed by motor car to the railway station, with two of his sons, and a small part of his huge harem, probably consisting of the "consorts," or wives who had borne him children, and thence by train to Salonika. There he will probably be allowed to live, after disgorging part of his vast hoard.

* * *

HIS successor was found at once in the legitimate heir, the oldest of his surviving brothers, Mohammed Reschad Effendi, who ascends the throne with the title of Mohammed the Fifth. Reschad is sixty-five years old, is said to be gentle and enlightened, though not specially able, and has long been the candidate of the Committee of Union and Progress. He at once took the oath to the Constitution, and warmly expressed his adherence to it, and in his hurried drive to and from the Seraskierat was cheered by the populace. In an interview with Mr. Donohoe, of the "Daily Chronicle," he declared that while his voice has been stifled in his gorgeous prison of marble on the Bosphorus, the "voice of conscience had never been stilled," that he had followed the march of progress, and was a firm adherent of Parliamentary institutions. He has now returned to the Dolma Baghche Palace, and is keeping open Court there, thus breaking with the jealous and timid seclusion of his predecessor. Later on the important ceremony of girding him with the sword of Othman at the famous Mosque of Eyub, the friend of the Prophet, will be performed by the head of the Bektashi dervishes, a powerful but not an orthodox sect. The city is said to be rejoicing over its new Sovereign.

* * *

THE hopes of the Dutch people for an heir to the throne have been at last fulfilled. Queen Wilhelmina gave birth to a young Princess on Friday. The whole nation has been thrown into a passion of rejoicing over an event of great consequence both to Holland and to Europe.

* * *

THE second reading of the Trade Boards Bill was moved in the House of Commons on Wednesday by Mr. Tennant, and carried without a division—a result due largely to Mr. Alfred Lyttelton's marked personal sympathy with the measure. Mr. Lyttelton expressed almost unqualified approval, and thought that while it dealt with a national scandal and peril, it was experimental rather than revolutionary in character, following well-known precedents in factory law and industrial organisation. Even if it brought some kinds of "sweated" production to an end, that would be better than suffering them to exist in their present form. Mr. Balfour qualified but did not counter his colleague's support, being chiefly occupied with the old objections that in those cases in which the action of the Bill raised the price of an article it might let in competitive goods from abroad. To this Mr. Churchill answered that we should do well to lead in anti-sweating legislation, but that all countries, especially our rival, Germany, were also contemplating or had actually passed it.

* * *

We have referred so often and so recently to the question of University reform that we have no space this week to give other than a brief summary of Lord Curzon's important, and, on the whole, liberal Memorandum on the constitution of Oxford Colleges and Universities. The central point of the Chancellor's Open Letter to his University is practically an invitation to that body to reform itself. It also makes a number of definite recommendations, such as the abolition of compulsory Greek, the admission of women to degrees, the remodelling of the Hebdomadal Council, of Congregation, and of Convocation, the improvement of the pass-schools, the creation (by a future donor) of a new college for working men, on the basis of a maintenance cost of £60 a year, a redistribution of scholarships and exhibitions, and, most important of all, the setting up of a new Board of Finance for the revision of University and College accounts, and the framing of a general financial policy for the whole University. Some of Lord Curzon's proposals fall short of the reformers' programme, but the whole document is of singular weight and power, and will, we hope, initiate a great movement either of "self-reformation," or, failing that, of State reorganisation.

* * *

In reply to a question by Mr. Craig on Tuesday, Mr. McKenna, speaking on behalf of the Prime Minister, made the important and satisfactory statement that "under existing conditions the navy of the United States of America for the practical purposes of the two-Power standard," as defined in Mr. Asquith's speech on the Navy Estimates, "would not enter into the account." This ought to put an end to the attempt to make this country build ships against the whole united strength of the American and German fleets, plus ten per cent.—an impossible task. Mr. Robert Harcourt, in a letter to the "Times," shows that no other view of naval policy was taken by Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Haldane in the debate in 1904, and we have more than once pointed out that it represents the settled policy of the Government.

* * *

The formal recognition of the independence of Bulgaria by the Powers signatory to the Treaty of Berlin is now complete. The Balkan crisis is at an end. The protocol between Turkey and Bulgaria was signed on Tuesday week, and contained a clause definitely recognising "the new political situation in Bulgaria." Russia was the first Power to signify her approval, and France and Great Britain followed. The Powers of the Triple Alliance delayed their sanction until it was decided to submit to arbitration the dispute between the Turkish Government and the Oriental Railway Company as to their respective shares of the indemnity paid by Bulgaria for the Eastern Rumelian line. It is highly improbable that a Conference will meet to put a final seal upon the recasting of the Berlin Treaty. Doubtless the Turco-Bulgarian difficulty would still have been dragging on but for the internal crisis in Turkey. The problem still remains why the settlement it has taken since October to reach could not have been made in a few weeks instead of many months. The Balkan crisis has exposed in the most damning fashion the unreality and the incompetence of European diplomacy and its complete estrangement from ideals or practical common sense.

* * *

The Tariff Bill has not gone very far yet in the American Senate, but apparently a strong campaign is being conducted to get the Senate to take at least two commodities off the free list. The art dealers are against the free importation of works of art more than twenty years old, on the ground that it would flood America with worthless imitations, a curious argument, inasmuch as the art dealers themselves would in most cases be the agents for transferring such forgeries to the American buyer. The independent oil producers and refiners again want crude oil to be subjected to a 50 per cent. duty; free importation, they say, would deliver them over to the Oil Trust bound and gagged. There appears, on the other hand, no strong movement for a reduction of duties, though a Democratic Senator pointed out that a moderate income-tax would transfer the burden to the wealthy, and permit schedules to be cut by half. Mr. Taft seems to have forgotten his promise of a genuine tariff revision. His only departure from the Roosevelt policy so far has been to drop many Roosevelt actions against the trusts. In anti-trust policy there is to be in future "less smoke and more fire; less noise and more action." The smoke and the noise have certainly abated, but there is no trace yet of fire and action.

* * *

The situation in Persia is curiously complicated. Last week it appeared that the Shah had not informed his troops before Tabriz of the armistice, and that the blockade was maintained. The Russian Government, therefore, hastened to dispatch a force of some 2,600 men to open the roads. This intervention was deeply resented by Satar Khan, and, it would seem, by the Shah likewise. The Nationalists declare that they prefer surrender to the Shah to a Russian occupation, and they entered into hurried negotiations with Teheran. Thereupon the Shah at once issued stringent orders for an indefinite armistice, and for the passage of unlimited quantities of food into Tabriz. The Russian force, however, has crossed the frontier, though its assistance is repudiated by both Nationalists and Royalists. The negotiations between the Shah and Tabriz are proceeding, but the Shah still limits his concession to a Constitution "in accordance with the Sheriat"—an ominous phrase in these days—while Satar Khan demands simply the restoration of the Constitution. Meanwhile, if the Teheran correspondent of the "Times" is to be credited, Russia and England hope to get both parties to accept the appointment of foreign agents to supervise the departments—in other words, the Russian plan of a few months ago for practically a condominium, leading, probably, to Russia "Egyptianising" Persia, is being revived.

Politics and Affairs.

THE FIRST DEMOCRATIC BUDGET.

Mr. Lloyd George's Budget is conceived with a boldness and originality all too rare in politics. Instead of opposing immense difficulties with a cautious defensive, it goes out to meet them with an audacious counter-attack. With a deficiency of over £15,000,000 to make good, most Chancellors of the Exchequer would have occupied the first half of their speech with complaints of increasing expenditure and proposals for cutting down every penny that might anywhere be saved, with little regard to the objects for which it was being spent. Social reform, they would have said, must wait. Battleships are imposed on us by necessity. Past undertakings have put great burdens upon us. This year the utmost we can do is to meet our liabilities without borrowing. Social progress has waited long. It must wait a little longer yet.

Happily, this is not Mr. George's view. For him the problem is to show that Free Trade Finance is constructive finance, and that its future lies with democracy. It can not only honor all existing obligations. It can go further, and, looking beyond the present year and its needs, can lay down a broad and deep basis of national development. In a Budget replete with new principles, the most original and fruitful of all is the conception of the Development Grant—a conception in which it would seem as though the old idea that Englishmen, having colonised the world, might at length discover their own country, is at length to take tangible shape. The Grant is to begin at the modest figure of £200,000, and is to be applied especially to afforestation, to experimental farming, and to the encouragement of agricultural co-operation and rural transport. But this is avowedly conceived only as a beginning, as the fund is to be swelled automatically by those savings on the estimates or unexpected increments of taxation, hitherto known as the old Sinking Fund, which have hitherto gone automatically to payment of debt. For the first time a definite source of income is set aside to constitute a fund available for the general development of Great Britain.

Nor does Mr. George hesitate to promise further expenditure on social reform. On the contrary he bids us look beyond the twelve months, and begin now to lay up the store out of which we may meet the coming obligations. It is not to be tolerated that all the available income of the country is to be swallowed up in the naval panic. Nothing could be more definite than Mr. George's declaration that this Government—like any other Ministry of the British Crown—will do everything necessary for the real security of the country. What it will not do is to postpone all succor for the poor and helpless to the allaying of unreasoning panic, and to guarding against imaginary dangers. "Dreadnoughts" are provided for, at the rate of a halfpenny apiece on the income-tax, and the "Spectator" is invited to "prepare" for the external dangers which beset its dreams by "paying" for the provision against them. But social reform will go on. The pace will not be what it might have been in a more peaceful atmosphere. But neither will it be arrested. The problems of the aged, of the sick and invalided, and of the unemployed, still press for solution, and the solution will not be indefinitely deferred. For the removal of the pauper disqualification we have, unfortunately, to wait till next year; but we are to have Labor Exchanges, and, what goes much further, Unemployment Insurance, without delay. Much will depend upon the precise character of the scheme put forward by the Government under this head. They do not appear to have been as much influenced as we should have expected by the strong arguments put forward by the Minority Report in favor of the "Ghent system," and the Chancellor has, with singular boldness, foreshadowed a complete scheme of compulsory assurance, organised by the friendly societies. But these are matters of detail. On the acceptance of the principle of insurance as the best thing that can be done under present conditions for the skilled worker, a principle long since urged in these columns, we can only congratulate the Government and the country. That they should have faced the responsibility at this moment of extreme financial stress, is above all to the credit of the Chancellor on whom the burden falls.

Thus on the side of expenditure two great constructive movements are foreshadowed. On the one hand there is the development grant, the nucleus of a progressive democratic organisation of natural resources for the national use. On the other there is the beginning of a system of national insurance, which, on the basis of a minimum provision by the State, will little by little build up a system securing the worker from what is now the terror of the poor man's life—the destitution incidental to unemployment, sickness, invalidity, and old age. On the side of income, how is this to be paid for? By no departure from Free Trade, by no additional burden on industry, and by no overwhelming addition to the load borne by any one form of property. To satisfy these conditions, changes are proposed too numerous and complex to be fully examined on this occasion, but here again some new and vital principles of democratic finance stand out. Three new departures are made, any one of which might in ordinary times be taken to mark an epoch. To begin with, we have for the first time the principle of the surtax, completing in outline the democratisation of the income-tax system. We have always had abatements below a certain income. Mr. Asquith gave us the just distinction of earned and unearned incomes. Mr. Lloyd George adds a surtax on incomes of £5,000 a year and more. The limit of the surtax is 6d. in the £, and, as it will be levied, it means only an additional 2½d. in the pound on an income of £5,000, so that the taxpayer will retain enough to find him in bread and cheese, with perhaps a margin. It is by no means an excessive call upon the wealth of the wealthy. We might even deem it insufficient for the occasion, were it not that by at the same time stiffening the graduation of the Death Duties the Chancellor is imposing an additional burden of more than 4 millions on realised property. Apart from the question of amount, however, it is the new principle which is important, graduation being now conceded in essence, if not precisely in form, all along the line, with the admitted object of drawing on surplus wealth to meet the increasing demands of national defence and social progress. Mr. George's second principle is that of securing a percentage of the monopoly value of licensed property by a readjustment of duties. Of this departure, which was generally anticipated, we need only say for the moment that it is but the resumption by the State of a fragment of a form of wealth which it ought never to have created, or allowed to fall into private hands.

The third principle is one round which controversy has raged, and will rage. The most important point in Mr. George's scheme of land taxation is that he reverts in principle to Mill's original proposal for the taxation of the unearned increment. For a national tax, we believe this to be the sound and most productive policy. It will bring in little for the moment, but it will become year by year a richer source of income, and will aid future Chancellors materially in meeting the ever-growing demand. The separate taxation of site values is left, we take it, for the coming readjustment of local finance, and is in no way excluded by the present proposal, than which in itself nothing could be more just. There remain certain unavoidable new burdens, which, however, in no case fall on industry or the professions. The workman will pay on his tobacco, the City on its transfers, the property owner on his "unearned" income. But this last addition is tempered for the proud father of young children by a remission affecting all incomes up to £500 a year. Of all classes the motorist comes off most easily. He is to be taxed not for the general motor car, but for the improvement of the roads; that is to say, their adaptation to his needs. The scheme of adaptation, Mr. George tells us, has been planned in conjunction with the Automobile Association. We trust we shall find that other Departments of the Government will be able to combine with the Budget a plan for the safety and comfort of the public. But this portion of Mr. George's proposals stands self-contained and so clearly apart from the remainder that it might be omitted as a whole without affecting the rest of the scheme. For that scheme the Chancellor of the Exchequer may fairly call on every democratic force in the nation for sustained and undivided support. He will have united the "interests" against him by a comprehensive and fearless attack. He must unite the enthusiasms and principles behind him. Whatever there is of democratic ardor among our people, whatever feeling there be for national improvement, if there be any compunction for the lot of the poor, and any joy in the building up of a strong, vigorous, and united nation—all such forces, laying aside mutual controversy and nice preferences of detail, must rally in their supreme effort to enforce the will of democracy or write themselves down for ever barren of good.

---

LAND TAXES IN THE BUDGET.

Enthusiastic land reformers whose single revenue policy is based on the assumption that land values alone possess a true ability to pay are perhaps feeling some disappointment at the small proportion of the immediate new revenue provided in the Budget which is to be derived from land. Their proposal of an imposition of a tax of 1d. in the £ on the capital or selling value of the former, was not, indeed, found practicable. In the first place, it might have involved the provision of a novel machinery of valuation, probably demanding a legislative sanction that could not have been obtained. Secondly, what would have been in effect a second tax upon present incomes derived from land would have been difficult to defend, either upon economic or upon equitable grounds. Finally, any indiscriminate new tax upon landownership, falling as it would, not merely on great landlords, but upon large numbers of small investors in ground-rents, would have rallied an immense body of opposition among all classes of the community.

The actual proposals of Mr. Lloyd George appear to us conceived at once with courage and with moderation, and to be directed, not merely to meet immediate exigencies, but to the larger purposes of public policy. The most important of these proposals is based upon a radical distinction between existing and future increments of land value. Wisely recognising the difficulty of distinguishing existing land values from other forms of property, with which, indeed, they are largely commingled, the Chancellor proposes to secure for the public a considerable share—one-fifth—of all further increments of value. All real estate, as we understand it, is to have its capital value registered, and whenever it changes hands, either by an act of sale, or by transmission at the death of its owner, twenty per cent. of the increased value found to attach to it since the valuation or the last transfer will be taken in taxation. There can be little doubt that though the early productivities of this tax must be trivial, as time passes it will ripen into one of the most important sources of progressive revenue.

In the minds of social reformers more immediate interest probably attaches to the tax of ½d. in the £ upon undeveloped land and virtually, though not nominally, upon mining royalties. Although this again will not do all that the ardent land reformer desires to force owners to put their land to the most socially advantageous use, it will go far in this direction. For it will stimulate the owners of ripening land on the outskirts of our towns which at present virtually escapes taxation to bring their land into the market for industrial or domestic use. The indirect result of this increase in the effective supply of town land will be to reduce rent, and by spreading town populations over a wider area to diminish the evils of congestion in our great centres of industry. These proposals do appear to involve the process of a separate valuation of sites and improvements. The tax on increments could evidently be assessed by a simple measurement of the increased value of the estate taken as a whole, with an allowance or deduction for any capital expenditure since the last valuation. But the Chancellor appears to contemplate a valuation of the land separately from the improvements. The tax on mining royalties, though certainly not erring upon the side of severity, may be regarded as a serviceable instalment of a long-demanded public right. Moreover, we presume that the tax on future increments is meant to apply to this form of land values as to others, and that in the development of new mines, the State will share the mining royalties ab initio to the extent of one-fifth. Finally, a 10 per cent. duty upon the reversion of a lease will fortify the incremental tax in the case of lands which, though not passing in ownership, are made the instruments of a fresh and usually a more profitable occupancy. Thus the Duke of Westminster or Lord Derby, coming into an increment of ground rent, say from £100 to £400, for which they have done nothing whatever, will have to restore £60 of it to the community which created the increased value.

Thus are laid the foundations of a sound and vigorous reform affecting in the future the fiscal and the social policy of the country in several very important ways. Though the immediate productivity of the new taxes is estimated at no more than half a million, it is evident that the incremental tax alone, in a country exhibiting rapidly advancing town values, will soon bring a million or more per annum to the coffers of the State. But still more important are the political, social, and industrial aspects of these land proposals, constituting as they do the first plain, practical assertion of the rights of the people to develop and enjoy the resources of their native land, and the first authoritative challenge to the great territorial oligarchy who have hitherto exercised without restraint over large portions of this country the powers which came down to them in law and custom from the time of feudalism. There is no rash handling of thorns, but a firm, far-sighted, and statesmanlike asseveration of the dominance of the commonwealth over the interests of the landlord.

THE FUTURE OF YOUNG TURKEY.

Exactly a fortnight after the counter-revolution in the capital, the Young Turks have realised, with Abdul Hamid's deposition, the whole of the programme which they drew up in Paris fifteen months ago. The swiftness and efficiency of their movements has been equalled by their scrupulous regard for the forms of the Constitution. To each arm and instrument of the nation's will its function was assigned. To the army fell the task of assuring order and of dealing with the still recalcitrant mutineers. Not by a word or an act did generals or officers overstep the limits of their purely military task. To the Sheikh-ul-Islam, an official who is at once the Lord Chancellor of the Sacred Law and the Minister of Cults, fell the traditional duty of giving a decision based on the precedents and principles of the Sheriat. Such decisions are always general. As in the case of Abdul Hamid's two immediate predecessors, the question was put whether certain offences justified the deposition or abdication of a Caliph, and the answer was affirmative. Informed of this general definition of law, the Parliament had only to apply it directly to the prisoner at Yildiz. One may feel that in all this formalism there was something unreal. But for the influence of the Committee of Union and Progress the army might never have moved, and but for the protection of the army the Parliament and the Sheikh-ul-Islam would never have dared to act. But it is none the less only by a scrupulous observance of the letter of a Constitution that its spirit enters eventually into the mind of a people.

It is hardly necessary to inquire minutely into the personal responsibility of Abdul Hamid for the counter-revolution. There is available some evidence of his guilt, despite the censorship which has made our news so fragmentary. The Turkish papers, for example, state that the artillerymen who joined the mutiny declare that before they agreed to move, Prince Burhaneddin, the late Sultan's favorite son, came in person to their barracks and conveyed to them his father's command to revolt. The large sums of money found in the pockets of mutineers came, most probably, from the Palace. No less compromising was the Sultan's action in pardoning not the mutineers alone, but the murderers in their ranks. But even if it were possible to doubt the Sultan's personal participation in the plot, it was unquestionably a conspiracy which reckoned on his complicity after the fact, and repeated in all its details, notably in the Armenian massacres which were its most ghastly feature, the familiar lines of Hamidian strategy. While Abdul Hamid reigned, the temptation to repeat these abominations would always have existed. Nor was the plot, despite its eventual failure, an attempt which wise men could afford to despise. It might have provoked a foreign intervention, and, had the mutineers succeeded in their original design of murdering the Young Turkish leaders, it is doubtful whether the counter-stroke would have been effective, or even feasible. As a measure of security the deposition was an elementary precaution. To affect pity for the fallen despot would be perverted sentimentalism. His character is, indeed, among the most occult studies which psychology could propose to itself. Its root lay, apparently, in an overmastering physical cowardice, an abnormal instinct of self-preservation, which made him afraid of rebels, afraid of able generals or statesmen, and of competent subject races, afraid, above all, of assassins, and even afraid of the dark. Yet he showed, if not courage, at least a singular tenacity and recklessness of purpose, and the man who ordered countless massacres and murders shrank from signing a death sentence, and was solicitous, to a rare degree, about the sufferings of animals. The most charitable and the most probable reading of his mind was that, like others of his House, he was not far from insanity, and that is a reason which makes a contemptuous mercy the proper attitude in those who have now rendered him impotent for evil.

The Young Turks have never been stronger than at this moment, but the problems which confront them are of appalling complexity and delicacy. The logic of events seems to be driving them from the fine but impracticable idealism which at first caused them to refuse office for themselves. They are realising that of the better and more experienced Pashas of the old régime some are untrustworthy and others feeble. They are said to contemplate a Ministry under their noblest and most distinguished leader, Ahmet Riza Bey, whose decision of character would make him a better Grand Vizier than he was a Speaker. But one shudders to think of the feelings even of the better sort of Mohammedans in the Asiatic Provinces if they have to learn that their new Grand Vizier, the man who really overthrew their Caliph, is a Positivist. Of his pure life, his disinterested character, and his high intelligence they will hear nothing; they will only be told that he is a sort of Frankish atheist. Nor is the immediate problem of handling the situation in the conquered capital at all easy, despite the loyalty of the army. The real sentiments of the populace, and even of the flabby mass of the deputies, are very doubtful. The veteran and closely observant correspondent of the "Daily News" describes a city given over to sincere joy at Abdul Hamid's fall; the less experienced correspondent of the "Morning Post" declares that 95 per cent. of the population are really on the side of the deposed despot. It is a fact that in a bye-election in the capital just before the mutiny the Committee had lost ground. It is also a fact that when the Chamber went out to San Stefano to place itself under the protection of the Macedonian army, very few of the numerous clerical deputies went with it. How to handle the inert opportunism of this mass sentiment, how to divine the opinion which is seldom frankly uttered, how to inspire manhood and self-respect into these city crowds called suddenly to self-government—that is a task not for one generation but for two.

More urgent is the problem of how to deal with the guilty conspirators. We are not disturbed by the statement that 10,000 "prisoners" have been made in the process of policing a city given up for two weeks to anarchy. Most of these prisoners are probably merely the potential "hooligans" of Constantinople, the rough Kurdish porters and the fanatical softas (theological students) who might have rioted or pillaged had they not been controlled. They have been detained rather than imprisoned. As for the soldiers and clergy who carried out the cold-blooded slaughter of the 150 Young Turkish officers who are said to have been killed after the mutiny, we know of no ground which should excuse them from exemplary punishment. More difficult is the problem of dealing with the responsible persons who engineered the plot. To terrorise a Parliament by a hired mutiny, to expel certain of its deputies, to slaughter political opponents, and simultaneously to organise a massacre in Asia Minor in which at least 10,000 Christians have been killed—this surely is treason of the cruellest kind. Whether the whole plot was known or approved by all who shared in it we do not know. At best those concerned were engaged in a faction fight; more probably they were the venal tools of a Palace reaction. To inaugurate a reign of terror would be an unpardonable folly, of which the Young Turks would be the last to dream. But if, after a fair trial, the real authors of this conspiracy, whoever they may be, should be sentenced to imprisonment or exile, public opinion in this country will not, we hope, allow itself to be misled. Our own complete immunity for so many generations from civil strife inclines us sometimes to pass facile and inexperienced judgments on those who are forced to regard it as an ever-present danger.

The events of this fortnight have reminded us sharply that in a great part of their Empire the Young Turks are simply a party of intellectuals, imbued with an alien culture, at issue with all the primitive forces of fanaticism and race-hatred. By the high character of their officers they control at least three army corps, the Second and Third in Europe and the Fourth in Asia. Advanced and progressive centres like Salonika and Smyrna are naturally with them. In Europe they have no one to fear save the wilder of the North Albanian clans, which never have been submissive to any rule whatever. In many Asiatic districts, as the telegrams received by the Chamber during the week of uncertainty go to show, they have their alert and well-organised branches. But there are whole provinces and whole army corps in which as yet they have hardly a footing. The populace, the soldiery, and even the officials of Cilicia, in and around Mersina, Adana, and Tarsus, and southward as far as Beyrout itself, have behaved precisely as they would have behaved in the nightmare year of 1895. That Kurds and Arabs in districts yet more remote have changed their ideas is hardly probable. Behind the struggle between Abdul Hamid and the Committee there is latent an antagonism between Europe and Asia which no act of deposition can affect. Far graver than the business of dealing with the mutineers in the capital is the tremendous task of imposing first order and discipline in these Asiatic provinces, and later of making a beginning in the work of enlightenment and education. These crowds which are slaughtering Armenians and burning them by hundreds in their churches are composed of Ottoman citizens, who have chosen deputies, and will again choose them. They are raw material for any unscrupulous clerical faction which has the wit to call them in to oppose the Europeanised young men from Paris. In course of time they can, no doubt, be repressed and coerced. But can they be educated? It is a problem which will try all the tact and the capacity for leadership of the Young Turks. If they really were, as their critics suppose, a denationalised faction, they must miserably fail, and sooner or later disruption would follow failure. We argue better from their success in Macedonia. The soldiers they had to deal with there are of all races and of every stage of culture, neither better nor worse than the average of the Moslem peasantry. The qualities of leadership which enlisted these soldiers for the revolution are not predestined to fail on Asiatic soil. No organisation ever essayed a harder or more glorious task. It deserves, amid the vicissitudes and the temporary failures which certainly lie before it, the utmost patience, the most abundant sympathy, from British public opinion.

THE LAST OF THE TYRANTS.

The conscience of the world was relieved of a sensible burden when Abdul Hamid, with his monstrous regiment of 500 wives, concubines, and negro eunuchs, his chamberlains, cooks, spies, and body servants, and all the apparatus of frippery and fear belonging to Asiatic and medieval monarchy, was bundled out of Yildiz Kiosk and conveyed to Salonika. Thus ends a long obsession of civilised society by a personality which had nothing to do with civilisation except to use its meaner instruments for the purpose of personal tyranny. Mr. Edwin Pears, the last survivor of the band of great English and European journalists who all but overthrew the Hamidian system in the 'seventies, testified in Wednesday's "Daily News" to the feelings which his dethronement excited among the immediate observers of his rule. Under it Constantinople was less like a modern European city than Rome under the immediate descendants of Augustus. A body of 2,000 spies, directly organised and paid by the Palace, at once suppressed and terrorised opinion. Even Europeans were watched at their meals, in the streets, at their business. As for the intelligence and public spirit of the Ottoman and the dependent races of the Empire, it was crushed and demoralised. The best men they contained fled to Europe, there to nurse the seeds of revolution. The worst lived under the Sultan's protection and served his ends, and the scheme of corruption included even Englishmen base enough to take the despot's pay. Statesmen in office, more honest than their fellows, were driven to seek refuge from death or banishment in the foreign Embassies and warships. Once the narrow streets and far-reaching suburbs of the beautiful city of Constantine ran blood, and miserable, shrinking, unresisting Armenians were slaughtered by the thousand. Soldiers in Abdul Hamid's uniform patrolled the streets, and shot all the Armenians they met; Kurdish porters clubbed and knifed them as they stood. Boat loads of escaping wretches were fired at from the shore, and barges floated out into the Sea of Marmora piled up with corpses. All these scenes Christian Europe witnessed and reported without one serious attempt to interfere or to punish. For years Disraeli, a Jew, personally sympathetic, like so many of his race, to the Turks, and indifferent to the special vices of Hamidian Government, shielded its author and turned British sympathies, not to the Turkish people, but to their oppressor. For not only had Abdul Hamid crushed in succession every movement of Turkish nationality that did not win either autonomy or independence, but he had immobilised the intellectual and moral activities of the Mohammedan peoples he ruled. His Ministers, including the ancient and powerful Oriental office of Grand Vizier, became mere heads of departments, mouthpieces of the all-powerful voice from Yildiz. Low favorites, spies, and eunuchs, types of the ruling freedmen in the days of Tiberius and Nero, usurped all the real power that the Sultan himself could not exercise. European commerce and enterprise suffered from Palace corruption, which spoiled even interesting projects like the railway to Mecca, and at least one European Power, we are afraid, traded freely on it. When his methods bore fruit in massacres which made St. Bartholomew look trumpery in comparison, those Powers, singly or in concert, moved in vain. The Armenian horrors, prolonged month after month, coolly carried from vilayet to vilayet, and directly instigated by the Sultan, passed unpunished and almost uncensured, thanks to the policy of Lobanoff and the sympathies of Germany. German influence on Hamidian Turkey culminated in the coercion of Greece by the fleets and diplomatists of Europe, the partial Germanisation of the Turkish army—the bitter fruits of which the Sultan has reaped this week—and the aid and encouragement administered to Edhem Pasha and his troops during the Greek war. In a corner of the Hippodrome, hard by the spot where the turbulent factions of Justinian's time waged their wars, stands, glistening in green and gold, the pompous memorial of the Kaiser's shameful friendship for Abdul Hamid.

But in reality the Cretan expedition and the following Turco-Greek war marked the turn of the tide. Greece, and British sympathisers with Greece, were much reviled in the days when a hundred members of the House of Commons proclaimed their sympathy with the action of Colonel Vassos. Their critics proved to be singularly short-sighted. For shame's sake Europe could not give up the historic ground of Crete to wholesale murder and violation. It was kept by the Concert, and will soon be reunited to Greece. The Greek war was the first military success of Abdul Hamid's reign, and it proved to be the last. Macedonia quickly and inevitably followed, and from Macedonia sprang the seeds of the neo-Turkish movement. Without Greek and Armenian sympathies the Young Turks could have done little, and tolerance of Christian faith and nationality was from the first the note of the Constitutionalists. The Sultan's downfall has indeed found Asia Minor a prey to the fanaticism which this cold and crafty but ignorant nature used as the cement of his "blood bolstered" Empire. But the conception of a national patriotism sprang from the Turkish Constitution as from the French Revolution. Abdul Hamid's purely selfish and personal rule never awoke it.

His fall, and his abject demeanor under it, are a great gain to the Liberal spirit in Europe, an emphatic rebuke to the materialism which, itself clothed in forms of highly centralised rule, found nothing in Hamidianism very widely or deeply removed from its own conceptions of Government. "In the modern world," says Professor Hobhouse, in "Democracy and Reaction," "the deeper movements of social opinion can no longer be isolated; but progress and reaction, by their success or failure, propagate waves of encouragement or disillusionment from nation to nation, and from continent to continent." Liberty is not a mere constitutional formula; it is an unconquerable instinct of the heart, an inevitable goal of the human intelligence, and if for the moment an awakened East seems to have outpaced the West, the events in Constantinople will sink deep into many governing minds, and will inspire more than one popular cause that seemed lost or stationary. This generation has at last seen a twice victorious Revolution, a seemingly unshakable tyranny broken to bits, and turned shamefully out of doors. Such teaching is good for it, as is the affirmation that to such acts and such characters as Abdul Hamid's a certain end is appointed. While he flourished the cynic could well point a finger of scorn at the idealisms of the world. Now that he is cut down and withered, the ground of hope in progress seems at the same time to be sensibly enlarged.

Life and Letters.

THE GAME OF EFFICIENCY.

When Lord Rosebery introduced into this country the game called National Efficiency, made, like other political and philosophic toys, in Germany, he can have had little notion of the vogue it was destined to achieve, or of the fine tinge of ironic humor conveyed by his personal introduction. We need not explain to an English public that in speaking of National Efficiency as a game we have no intention to disparage its seriousness. For it is not either cynicism or paradox to say that not only do we take our games seriously, but that they are the only things which, as a nation, we do take seriously. It first became a serious pastime among journalists, platform politicians, and unsuccessful merchants at Chambers of Commerce. They would speculate or dogmatise, according to their mood, upon the questions what in particular this National Efficiency might mean, and how to get it, and whether we or Germany, or later on Japan, had most of it. When we were first discovering the commercial advance of Germany, we put it down to her better scientific and technical training, and our notion of procuring the requisite competitive efficiency consisted in dreams of British Charlottenburgs endowed by patriotic Jew financiers and sustained by copious draughts of whisky-money. Education got the first call in the game. Then came the Boer War and all the heart and pocket-searching that ensued. Here was England with drained resources and damaged military reputation in charge of a magnificent imperial domain which malicious enemies were eyeing enviously. It was then that the subtle pleasures of national posing began to be cultivated. Our ancient national pride in England's greatness gave place to a brooding self-consciousness, in which dramatic confidence in our "destiny" was punctured by occasional questions about our capacity to fulfil our "mission." Then Mr. Kipling came in and imparted to the game its distinctive character, for it was he who gave sentimental unity to the proper blend of "destiny" and "mission."

It was Mr. Kipling who first raised the full note of "solemn" warning, admonished us of our sins and negligences, and shifted the demand for "efficiency" from the commercial on to the "moral" plane. It was he who discovered that we were a nation of sportsmen and "slackers," besought us to cultivate once more the virtues of an imperial temper, and to substitute the rifle-range for the football posts. It was partly romantic sentimentalism figuring as "dead earnest," partly a complacent repentance that enjoys itself—the "miserable sinners" of the squire's pew on a Sunday. But it was nothing more than an amiable and misty state of mind in the semi-educated classes. If we had serious poets and a people capable of taking them seriously, a chant of national efficiency might indeed have struck home. But everybody had already learned the art of taking poetry as poetry; they all knew in their undermind while they enjoyed the melodious austerity of the "Recessional" that it was only "Kipling."

There was grace and skill and imagination in the appeal of Kipling. There are none of these qualities in the recent drum-thumping. The game of efficiency is now taken over by the scare-preachers of the "Spectator" and the "Observer," who are determined to get us into "a new way of life." What we have to do is to see "the new fact from which there is no escape. Our command of the sea is being challenged by a people with material resources just as great as, if not greater than, our own." What we have, therefore, to do is to "Prepare, prepare, and again prepare." Every nursery is to be a miniature scouting ground, blind man's buff and hide-and-seek are to be "preparatory" play, what time remains for schoolboys after their military exercises must be given to the teaching of "real" history which shall show "the world, not as we would like it to be, but as it is—the world of blood and iron, controlled by men who are not humanitarians or philanthropists, but persons intensely human on the other side of man's nature, persons who do not take what they would call the Sunday-school view of the world, but rather the view that man is still a wild beast, that the race is to the strong and not to the well-intentioned." As they approach maturity, our boys and girls should "get together" into brotherhoods and sisterhoods, and register "a solemn and serious resolve to do their best in the future to prepare themselves for meeting a great national emergency, should it arise, in a calm, vigilant, and self-sacrificing spirit." It is not mere drilling and rifle-shooting that are wanted. The spirit of Savonarola is to be abroad, preaching to every soul preparation against the approaching doom. Whatever your hand finds to do must be done in this spirit of national preparation: "Every man, whether he is tilling the soil, hewing coals, laying bricks, writing books, organising business, or planning some industrial work, great or small, must accustom himself to feel that he is doing it, not for himself or for his family alone, but partly for his country." A laudable sentiment enough at all times; has it any special application now?

To this agitation we apply the term sham-serious, though it is altogether too simple and abrupt for an accurate description. The persons who read with approval and even with emotion these hysterical appeals to "Repent and Prepare" do not really believe what the "Spectator" calls "the new fact": they do not really believe England is in imminent and deadly peril, and they have not the least intention to make any serious personal sacrifice to "save" her. They are, however, willing to play the game of make-believe up to a certain point—that is, up to the point where it ceases to be a game, and calls upon them to face real dangers and incur real sacrifices. As men they will play "Territorials" and "Dreadnoughts" just as long as it doesn't mean too great inroads on their leisure and their purse. If they can get others to serve and pay they will "save" England as long as the editor of the "Spectator" likes. It will not be mere pretence. Every child knows that it must really believe the assumptions of a game, or else there is "no fun in it." "Clarence," the boy-scout, who is to save England, must believe in the enemy he stealthily tracks down. So it must be with the grown-ups whom the "Spectator" summons to a life of "playing Indians." They must agree to "believe" in the reality of the plotting enemy against whose dastardly attack they are preparing, they must "believe" in "the world of blood and iron" and all the rest of the false sentimental hypotheses of the "preparation" game. Nay, they must, in a sense, "really" believe these things, but this "reality" of your belief must itself be sham, and yet they must not consciously recognise its shamness—that feeling lying in the background of their mind as a provision against taking the game too seriously. They are to get their satisfaction out of the thrills of surprise, fear, hate, and exultation which "The New Way of Life" will yield. The scornful and indignant protests against this representation of the appeal are themselves part of the game.

Let us put the issue in a plain question. Does any sane, observant person really suppose that this "revivalist" appeal upon the basis of a few passing misstatements of German shipbuilding will do anything appreciable to induce the well-to-do to prefer a dull, hot, crowded march, carrying arms, to a day's golf with caddies to carry their clubs, or a motor ride at twice the speed-limit? Will it induce the masses to abandon spectatorial football for Spectatorial preparation? Not a bit of it. They understand far too well what their "Daily Mail" is for. Savonarola, indeed! Their Savonarolas preach in the music-halls and in the Yellow Press. Truly a feat of humor to be able to mouth such jargon with a straight face. But not at all a serviceable humor. For national efficiency, after all, is a real thing, and the worst that can be done to it is to besot the national intelligence with idle make-believe directed to repudiating the primary principles of the progress of civilisation, and to inflaming those passions which it is the first aim of all human government to curb. Nor is the play redeemed from its dangerous frivolity by the fact that a good deal of political and commercial "business" is mixed up with it, and that it brings in plenty of "gate-money."

THE SALE OF A SOUL.

THERE is no need to return to John Davidson, for only last week we attempted some estimate of his work, and some expression of our regret at his apparent fate. But a letter from Mr. William Watson in last Monday's "Times" suggests many general thoughts beyond the particular case of the poet who seems to have ended in such profound despair. The letter was prompted by generous sympathy for a distinguished and passionate writer who never attained to the same measure of recognition as Mr. Watson himself. As a personal expression of regret and indignation, the words are what we might expect. They tell of the natural sorrow of one poet for another poet's loss. A touch of the feeling of "Lycidas," "Adonais," and "Thyrsis" is there, though it is only given in a letter to the "Times." But, apart from this personal note, the lament takes the form of three charges against the poet's countrymen, two of which appear to us unfounded and the third dubious.

The first is no great matter. Mr. Watson complains that John Davidson's mysterious departure had but slight interest for the English people. He says that when an utterly insignificant and uninteresting young woman resorted to disappearance in order to escape her creditors, this great nation went into throes of excitement over the trumpery affair; whereas, when the man who had worn out his fiery heart and brain in its service disappeared, the British people remained uninterested and unmoved. For our part, we were rather astonished at the amount of interest taken. When we considered the almost invisible fraction of the people to whom John Davidson's name meant anything at all, it was a surprise to see the signs of public attention at the news of his disappearance. Nearly all the papers "billed" it, nearly all had leading articles on it, all had an account of it and some estimate of the poet. When his death was finally attributed to suicide, all "billed" the news again, one at least had nothing else on its bill, and nearly all published fresh leading articles on the subject. Since Mr. Watson's letter appeared, some have commented on the whole affair once more. These may seem vulgar methods of displaying interest, but, after all, they are the only methods we have. There was no opportunity for a public funeral, and there has been no appeal for assistance. The British people are stupid, no doubt. They have been called so for many generations, and are quite reconciled to the truth, though a little bored with it. Poetry—even the best poetry, and John Davidson's was not of the best—does not enter very largely into the daily life of average Englishmen who work for their living. But, still, we do not see how else the country could have displayed interest or emotion. To us, indeed, as we said, both have been a little surprising in amount.

We grant that the interest was heightened by the mystery. That is mankind's way, and there is no helping it. Our people are not alone in loving the mysterious. It was the mystery that gave us our interest in that "utterly insignificant and uninteresting young woman" who disappeared in short-lived tragedy. When her mystery became amusing, we took all the more interest, for people enjoy laughter more than tears. There again, it is poor old mankind's way, and there is no helping it. Anyone who can make a nation laugh for a fortnight deserves interest at the least, whether it be the Captain of Köpenick or an utterly insignificant young woman. Nor is Mr. Watson's second charge much more justified than what he says about lack of interest. He admits that in his later work John Davidson's thought was often crude, his voice often strained and harsh, but he tells us this was primarily the fault of the "public" and critics who are perpetually demanding from a poet an "output" such as no artist can produce without doing murderous violence to his powers and his artistic conscience. We are far from thinking lightly of poetry and its influence on national life, but the sad fact is that the public makes no such demand. The public urges a poet to no murderous violence against his power. It drives him to no "output" at all. It raises no "more or less insincere clamor for volume after volume," such as Mr. Watson speaks of further on. It may regret that a true poet like Mr. A. E. Housman publishes no more since "A Shropshire Lad"; it may regret that a true poet like Mr. William Watson gives us hardly a page of verse a year. But there is no clamor, no ravenous demand for more. We take what we have got and are thankful. We know that the boats of most poets are very lightly laden before they reach the sea of immortality. We heartily agree with Mr. Watson's own advice:—

> "Time, the extortioner, from richest beauty
> Takes heavy toll and wrings rapacious duty.
> Austere of feature if thou carve thy rhyme,
> Perchance 'twill pay the lesser tax to Time."

But John Davidson neither gave us the richest beauty nor carved his rhyme austere of feature, and, deeply as we regret the tragedy of his end, it is pathetically ludicrous to talk of him as driven to write badly by any demand, any clamor at all for his books. People were quite content to take the best he had written at its true value, and it was a high value; but certainly it was no public call that urged him to volume after volume of verses about imponderable ether, electrons, eddying vortices, atoms, metalloids, and the material of eternity. We need not criticise those volumes now, but if, as Mr. Watson says, they are not to be ranked high, it is absurd to put the blame of their failure on a public demand for more.

People, to be sure, would not go on paying John Davidson enough to live on just for the little work of his they really did admire; and if the poet continued to produce his volumes in the hope of inducing them to pay more, he unhappily failed to induce them. But that brings us to Mr. Watson's third charge, and it is the only one that seriously counts. He says that John Davidson died because he could not make a living, and he implies that the English people was to blame. We need not discuss the particular case, or recall that, however small the poet's pension was, it was more than thousands of his countrymen can ever hope to receive in wages for the support of their families; it was more than has ever been received by many poets and artists, who yet, with the help of strict asceticism, have contrived to accomplish their work. But the charge opens up a wider question, which is one of the tragedies of art. How is it possible for the true artist to live? We may take it for granted that all art is meant for an audience of some sort. It implies communion, and originally its appeal was always direct, like the appeal of rhapsodists, bards, or story-tellers to the circle seated around them. Livelihood then depended on the power of giving immediate pleasure, for if the audience did not enjoy the performance, they walked away. It appears that art was no worse on account of this necessity of pleasing, if we may judge by the fragments that remain, such as the Homeric poems. But with writing and printing, the appeal became different, and the question of livelihood changed too. No longer satisfied with delighting the circle around them, poets looked to posterity for their highest reward. They have often received it from posterity, but meantime, who is to discount posterity's bill so that the poet may go on living?

There are some artists—great artists, too—who need never fear the lack of food. Even Dante, whose writings were unlikely to be lucrative, could say, "I shall not want for bread." Poets like Victor Hugo and Tennyson expressed the feeling and thought of their nations so accurately and with such power to please that there was no need for them to starve, even if they had not been at least as particular about their temporal rewards as most business men. "No man but a blockhead ever wrote except for money," said Dr. Johnson, and he described some other writer as "the richest author that ever grazed the common of literature." There the professional spirit utters its half-ironic but sturdy protest against the languid helplessness of all amateurs. Shakespeare, Scott, and Dickens may have written too much, but probably they would not have written so well as a whole if they had not made money by their writings, and been obliged to make it. Many of the greatest writers have kept the faculty of giving immediate and public delight—the faculty of the story-tellers of the East or the journalists of Europe, who must please their audience at once or die of hunger.

But what of the shy and delicate spirits who have no voice for the present world? What of those who have to create an audience and wait for applause that only their ghosts will hear? We need not tell of Milton with his £5 for "Paradise Lost," or of Wordsworth, who said his poems never kept him in shoestrings, or of Blake, who, in the depth of neglected poverty, could only boast that his books would be printed in heaven and beautifully bound, or of Landor, proud in the knowledge that he would "dine late." Examples new and old are too numerous to be recalled. Spenser, Burns, James Thompson, Francis Thompson, Lionel Johnson—the shades of hungry and ruined genius crowd in upon us from every side. When, as Mr. Watson asks, are these tragedies to cease? To struggle for a living on the sale of a genius that does not sell—that is a recurrent tragedy in the history of modern art, and we do not see any chance of its conclusion. The endowment of genius is almost impossible in youth, and deadly at any age. It is dangerous for genius to be put into any kind of almshouse, no matter how delicately the alms may be concealed. Or if pensions are to be granted and increased, let them be earned by some public service unconnected with the special function for which they are granted—something like Wordsworth's distribution of stamps, or stone-breaking, or cutting wood, so that the spirit may be free. On the public side there is, perhaps, no other way.

But might not the artists do something to save themselves? It was a question that Goethe often dwelt upon. Speaking of his finest and most spontaneous poems, he says:—

> "I felt a peculiar reverence towards them. I felt like a hen to her chickens when first they go chirping about. My earlier pleasure in only publishing them by reading aloud returned, and the thought of exchanging them for money seemed perfectly horrible."

That is from his "Reminiscences," but there is a similar and earlier passage in "Meister":—

> "Genius," he says, "is like virtue; you must love it for its own sake or entirely renounce it, and neither genius nor virtue is ever recognised or rewarded unless practised unseen, like a dangerous secret."

All through his works and conversations we find him again and again calling upon artists, and especially on poets, not to shut themselves up with their art, but to come out into the windy battlefield of the struggle for life. "A man has a poor time of it," he writes, "if he refuses to thrust his hand into the fulness of common existence." And again, he said to Eckermann, "The pressure of business is of great advantage to the soul; when she is disburdened of it, she plays with greater freedom, and enjoys her life." It is impossible to make rules for genius, and we rejoice to find the smallest trace of it anywhere, no matter in what distress or ruin. But, in all admiration and honor, we would ask the men of genius who seek to live by selling their souls, and still get no decent price for them, whether it would not be better to practise their genius unseen, like a dangerous secret, and come out into the windy battlefield of life. For them and for us, we believe it would be happier. And besides, they might then perhaps find something better worth saying.

---

THE ART OF READING POETRY.

A WRITER in these columns recently stated that the poems of Miss Rossetti gave him "the most poignant pleasure he could ever hope to receive from any of the arts or from life itself." This may seem to some of us a little excessive; but there are not wanting those who would make the words their own, say, of Dante Rossetti's "Sister Helen," or the old Border ballads, or Shelley's "Skylark" and "West Wind," or Coleridge's "Christabel." For the true lovers of these things life holds no more "poignant pleasure." One would add there is no pleasure so sane, so beneficent, so unselfish; no such escape from the prison of small personal worries in which so many of us are enclosed, as the escape which poetry gives. On the other hand, it must be admitted that the capacity for feeling this pleasure is the very rarest of endowments. It is not nearly so common as the delight in music or in landscape painting.

Delight in poetry—one cannot too strongly insist—is delight in rhythm. It is the understanding of and feeling for the rhythm of the poem, not merely sympathy with the sentiment it expresses, or the story which it tells. Everything in the poem is subservient to the rhythm; or, at least, only finds its right expression as the rhythm is given its true value. The elocutionist too often rushes in with a complete want of sympathy with rhythm, and a very defective ear for it, and by mouthing and emphasis robs the poem of its proper magic. The cheated and disappointed ear listens in vain for the fairy music with which it knows so well the words are charged. It is curious that, whilst everyone understands what is meant by "an ear for music," "an ear for rhythm" is never even so much as heard of. The present writer, who does not know one tune from another, is often haunted by the lilt and cadence of a verse of poetry to which he can assign no words. It seems to be commonly supposed that all that is necessary for the reading of poetry is to understand the poem intelligently, to emphasise the right words, and to mind the stops. But the difference may be as great between two readers of a poem as it is between two performers of a sonata of Beethoven; one of whom plays all the notes correctly, and thumps and tinkles at the pianos and fortes respectively, and another who gives himself up to the music, who forgets himself and all thought of making effects, and who so feels with the master and divines his thought that his personality is lost in the music which he renders and reflects. We may distinguish these two performers as the Elocutionist and the Rhapsodist.

One feels that it is very difficult to express one's meaning clearly about this. The word "render," still better the word "reflect," probably goes to the root of the matter. It means to "give back," to give again the poem as it lived in the poet's mind, to be the medium which receives his thought, as the untroubled limpid lake amid the hills receives the image of the hillside town, with every tower and tree. Nothing can be more irritating and distressing to the listener than the intrusion, sometimes the violent and exaggerated intrusion, of an alien personality between the poet and himself. The true declaimer of a poem is, of course, the "maker" of it—the making and rendering of poetry is, indeed, one art, the rarest and most lovely art of all. This is the art of the Rhapsodist, for which that of the Elocutionist is a sad and sorry substitute.

Nothing can be truer than the saying that it takes a poet to read poetry. Those who heard the late Lord Tennyson recite his poems describe it as "a kind of glorious chant." One would have given much to have heard him declaim, say, the "Choric Song" of the "Lotus Eaters." One imagines his recital of such lines as > "The full juiced apple, waxing over mellow > Drops in a silent autumn night"; or

> "To watch the long bright river drawing slowly
> Its waters from the purple hill," with the full value given to each syllable, and the whole of the words welded into an indissoluble harmony. To have heard the last chant of the gods "beside their nectar," "looking over wasted lands," must have been like listening to the sea. The last lines of all would have been like the falling of a great calm. Again, one thinks of Mr. Swinburne—alas, no longer with us—as an ideal Rhapsodist. It would have been a great thing to hear him recite "Itylus."

In our own day poets are few, reciters of poetry are many. Those who undertake such recitations should remember that their labor is in vain unless they have themselves something of the poet's knowledge, unless, in some measure, they know his art from the inside. Poetry, indeed, is not so much "art" as "nature." A poem is not a manufacture, but a revelation. Like the poet himself it is born, not made. It is "the chance birth of some evening at an Ionian festival or morning amid the Sabine hills." It can be truly shown to others only by an intuitive sympathy. If this is wanting, no number of mechanical rules can take its place. The Rhapsodist is commonly confused with the Actor, but he is altogether a different person.

It is a commonplace to say that, in supreme poetry, no single word could be changed. There is much, indeed, which can fairly claim to be called poetry, which yet is verbose, wordy, which talks about things rather than shows them to you. There is also the poetry which is the very music of the world. The one younger English poet who can give us poetry of this kind is the author of "A Shropshire Lad." Words are powerless to express the "poignant pleasure" (to quote the text once more) which this little volume gives to its true lovers. In Mr. Housman's lovely verses the words cannot conceivably be changed. Just as certainly there can be but one right way of reading them. The secret is, no doubt, Mr. Housman's, but an immense sympathy might perhaps come near it.

Oliver Wendell Holmes says somewhere that the words of a true poem "have loved one another from the beginning of the world." The saying comes very near to a definition of the secret of rhythm. It is the appreciation of this fact which makes the essential difference between the Elocutionist and the Rhapsodist. To one the words are a heaped-up pile of separate coins or counters; to the other they live and grow together into a lovely whole. To the Elocutionist they are simply a lot of different words, to the Rhapsodist they form a unity. Take the first line of poetry that comes into one's head, as a "rhythm test," say this of Mr. Quiller Couch's:—

"Leaves of the creeper redden and fall" and see how many of those who try to say it show any sense of the subtle relationship and sympathy of the four chief words of the line! But to go back to Mr. Housman, the writer knows of no poetry, ancient or modern, where the words so belong to each other as the "Shropshire Lad." Take, for example, the poem "Bredon Hill."

"In summertime on Bredon,"

—the words sing themselves. Sad as the poem is, it is yet by sheer loveliness of rhythm "a happy noise to hear." One thinks of some elocutionist making a strident declamation of that humming murmur. In this little book the pleasure to be obtained from rhythm may be found in perfection, in an absolute degree. People speak of it as almost unendurably sad; on the writer it never makes this impression; the lovely mastery of English words brings a reconciliation into all its tragedies. Mr. W. B. Yeats, again, in such verse as

"I will arise and go now and go to Innisfree," knows how to make words join hands in some dancing game, and kiss and whisper and call to one another among the trees.

Rhythm is full of subtleties which the ordinary elocutionist seems quite to miss. Take, for example, the curious and charming effect of the last line of every verse in Rossetti's "Staff and Scrip":—

"For him the stream had never welled
In desert tracts malign
So sweet; nor had he ever felt
So faint in the sunshine
Of Palestine."

One can only describe it by saying that the first four lines advance in a troop, and that the fifth line meets and clashes with them, or that a swiftly moving tide suddenly rolls backward in the last line.

Fortunately, elocutionists rarely choose really poetic poems for their experiments, and this is well, because the murder of poetry is to be classed with the cutting down of limes and mulberry trees, and with apostasy, heresy, sorcery, and all the sulphur-colored crimes of a medieval wizard.

---

A SUSSEX HANGER IN SPRING.

Let us at any rate call it a hanger till some learned person who has made hangers a speciality puts us to rights. We have more than a suspicion that this term is too generally used. Gilbert White's hanger ran to the top of a hill, whereas ours is mostly in the hollow, and its highest bank can scarcely be called a hill. Gilbert White's eminence was covered altogether with beech, "the most lovely of all forest trees, whether we consider its smooth rind or bark, its glossy foliage, or graceful, pendulous boughs." But we have never heard the name given colloquially in Surrey or Sussex to a wood of timber trees.

First your rough ground given over to Sylvia bristles with young scrub. The brambles begin to be subdued with shoots of oak, ash, sycamore, and all manner of self-sown trees. The rods attain ten or twelve feet in length, and the beater-up of pheasants forces his way through them with difficulty. The place becomes a hanger. Then your best suited trees smother out the others, the trunks swell and lengthen, but the space for walking becomes more liberal. We have a carpet of dead leaves and lofty architraves carrying bright green. For a hundred years or so it is to be a forest. Then we cut down the trees, and everywhere between them, like magic, for they seem to come from nowhere, up spring the primroses, the anemones, the bluebells. The wild strawberries come there redder, larger, and more luscious than anywhere else. The blackberries of a hundred years ago are reincarnated as blueberries, early, large-lobed, with a rich bloom, generous as garden fruit. Then from the sawn stumps of the timber trees shoot up long, clean rods, that stand in crowded fascicles and spread over the interspaces like the sheaves of wheat growing from plants the hoe's-width apart. The nightingale comes back after an absence of fifty generations; the wood becomes once more a hanger, and still more a hanger than it was before the timber grew.

Our Sussex hanger is in the maturest stage, or shall we say in all the stages at once? The oaks that were too staggy to be worth cutting down are still here. The stools near them have not sprouted, for the tyranny of overhanging leaves in June forbids. But the primroses, anemones, and bluebells can amply develop their beauty before the oakleaves come. We push through the stiff rods of the stool-growth with difficulty. They spread out against us, lock fingers against us, thrash at us, force us aside, so that we are continually walking round half-circles when we aim at diameters. But clearer sky is ahead, and we fight on, to come out with a gasp of wonder into one of those oak-sheltered spaces starred to the brim with white and butter-colored flowers. The flick of the last envious stool-rod has vanished, and ours is the most perfect sabbath peace—in our garden of Eden open to the full warmth of sunshine, the full ecstacy of blue sky, sheltered from whatever wind may be blowing.

A big bumble-bee drones somewhat disconsolately through our flowery kingdom, for it does not appeal to her as a substitute for the sallow blooms that have now fallen. As we lie prone against the trunk we can watch the chiff-chaff at his eternal search of the twigs overhead. No, not eternal, for he stops to utter his knife-sharpening song that fits spring sunshine as no other song does. Two swallows, ample assurance that summer is here, circle high up in the blue; the swinging call of the cuckoo announces that industrious bellman to be quite near; thrush and mavis are, as it were, silenced by the low rattle of the nightingale from such a thicket as the one through which we have just passed. We must face that jungle again for the sake of one glimpse of the shy red bird.

There is a difference that seems almost specific between the close-noded twigs of the grown oak and the long-jointed, smooth, clear-skinned shoots from the old roots that have lost their trunks. The difference will be as marked when the great leaves come on the latter, and it runs even to the galls which are, nevertheless, caused by the same flies that have operated for a hundred generations on the older trees. Here stood a cherry tree two good feet in diameter. Forty vigorous shoots are striving for the succession. Each has opened its red young leaves as early as the other, as though eager to get an all-important week's start in this summer's race. An older tree standing near can afford greater deliberation, and gives us, like a delicious blow in the eye, sprays of white blossom that obliterate every twig.

Some instinct or some stroke of luck makes us very silent in a certain clearing with a streak of heather that proclaims a sanded floor, a mat of dead bracken near by, and little tangles of honeysuckle here and there under the branches that they cannot reach. For there on the bracken lie two vipers sunning their carelessly-flung coils. One is a lithe, young-looking, though full-grown, male, the other a thicker, more sluggish-looking female. He is a plain grey viper; she has a distinctly rosy tinge, both in the black that becomes a sort of deep maroon and in the lighter part of her pattern. They are so near that we can confirm the first impression as to their sex by the relative length of their tails. Then, as our eyes roam a little to see what else may be present, they are caught by a slightly warmer tint in the shadow of one of those honeysuckle tangles. It was but a spot of slightly alien color that caught the eye, which, steadily focussed, wrests other items of the bush's secret. Yes, we have got it at last. We have managed, or shall we say happened to spot in this quiet wood a hare sitting on her form. Hundreds of times we have had them burst out from our very feet, and dozens of other times, no doubt, have passed them by without being aware of their existence. But here is a hare discovered before her bolt, and, within four yards of her, two vipers caught in their siesta. As we look from one to the other, something speaks to the hare, and like a furred tornado she bundles from her seat and bounds away in a scurry of dead leaves. In the same second the place of the vipers is empty. It is as though they had melted into their bed of bracken. Not a stirred twig shows which way they went; there is nothing but a color impression to persuade us that they were really there. The hare has at least left her "house" in the honeysuckle, the roof arched to her back and the floor shaped to fit the long hind-legs that shot her into safety.

The beauties of our hanger are unusually contemporaneous this year. The blackthorn hedge that guards it is a foam of blossoms, as it should have been a month ago. Who has ever seen blackthorn before companioned by bluebells, and opening its buds to the full glory of the primroses? And there goes a bird with the blackness of winter blackthorn and the whiteness of its spring blossoms. Its long-winged hawking flight proclaims it to anyone a flycatcher. We cannot retain such a beauty as the pied flycatcher in our southern wood. It must fare on to one of its restricted haunts, probably as far north as Cumberland. It is all the dearer in our Sussex hanger because its visit is, like the blackthorn blossom, so transient. Then, as we pass through the fairy birches, with their net-like cascades spangled with tiniest green, a puff-throated, black-headed bird flies out, and, perching craningly close to our path, pours out a piping, rattling run of music, the sole song of its repertory, that throws any of the nightingale's hundred fancies into the shade. It is, of course, Ireland's nightingale, the blackcap, here to stay the summer, for our hanger is blessed as the nesting-place of these two princes of song.

Contemporaries.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

The present Government contains many able figures, and at least three specially interesting ones—Sir Edward Grey, Mr. Lloyd George, and Mr. Churchill. For the moment, and for many weeks to come, all eyes will be fixed on the second of these personalities. Mr. Lloyd George is a new man, with a new problem, the financing of social reform on Free Trade lines. As the lives of politicians go, he is at once younger and less highly trained than most of his rivals and contemporaries. He has behind him no prestige of birth or of family history or of a brilliant University career—none of the useful, friendly props which in this most conservative of lands sustain the first trembling essays of its statesmen. He is a fresh type even among our conquerors. He lacks Disraeli's opulent and attractive literary genius; he has no private fortune, like Chamberlain. He belongs to a class almost as near to the people, the actual tillers and workers, as Mr. Burns. And he proceeds from a dependent nationality, not from the central governing race. He is an orator of genuine quality, but up to Thursday night he had only made one speech in the House of Commons that could be called great; a personality of originality and charm, yet owning no large and attached following outside the borders of his own country.

Mr. Lloyd George's success is indeed an effect of pure genius, exercised in an atmosphere peculiarly fitted and prepared to receive it. The British aristocracy can still boast a Balfour, the English middle classes an Asquith. Mr. George is the first remarkable product of Welsh democracy, of a country where the mass of the people can struggle with powerful possessing forces without being thoroughly depressed and impoverished, like the Irish nation, and without losing natural refinement and care for culture, like the English working-men. He is therefore something rare, and even unique, in our statesmanship—middle class without a touch of snobbery, a lawyer without legal preciseness, an idealist and nationalist with the governing instinct and the gift of compromise and management—a man in whose making neither the Church nor "Society" nor the Universities nor the great money-making interests have had any share, but whom none could describe either as a fanatic or an "idealogue." To men thus born and constituted political life in such a community as ours naturally presents itself as something of the adventure that court life was to the young D'Artagnan. The next few months and years of Mr. Lloyd George's life will inevitably reveal whether it has also been conceived as a large and fruitful enterprise.

Mr. George's early struggles in Welsh tithe wars and burial scandals* may seem small and narrow in comparison with the sheltered experiences of our ruling youth. But they hardened him and kept him true, not only to his people, but to a mass of feelings and experiences which are the necessary stuff of British democracy. Much of our modern political tissue is soft; Mr. George's is tough and firm to the point of hardness. It was to his almost unsupported initiative that British Nonconformity owed its first powerful and decisive reappearance on the Parliamentary stage since the generation which knew Bright and Miall and Richard. And, curiously enough, it was through him, a lawyer without a strictly commercial training, that Mr. Chamberlain's ideas of "business" statesmanship first bore useful fruit. On the whole, the member for West Birmingham's tenure of the Board of Trade was as barren as Mr. George's has been fruitful. A more placable and flexible spirit, and a diplomacy quicker in the turn, gave him an advantage over the imperious Radical of the 'eighties. But power over a bargain is, after all, only an illustration of freshness and directness. These are the qualities which our governing classes most lack, and which it is the business of their successors to supply.

* Very interestingly told in "From Village Green to Downing Street" by Hugh Edwards and Spencer Leigh Hughes. George Newnes. 1s.

Mr. George has the reputation of having the nimblest and most resourceful mind in the Cabinet. Thus is democracy, with its essential idea of calling the whole available brain of a nation to its service, justified of her children. Mr. George's subtlety and quick brilliancy of temperament have been put to more than one interesting test. When he had to meet the railway directors of Great Britain, he found them unalterably fixed in the notion that they would never, no never, concede formal recognition of the men's trades unions. Some politicians would have battered at this closed door, and broken their strength against it. This was not Mr. George's way. He had his own plan, and he had imagination enough to see that if he carried it, recognition and peace would both, in effect, be secured. Accordingly, he turned the directors' flank with the quite unexpected proposal of a scheme of arbitration. Before this Napoleonic strategy, their grand army, elaborately drawn up to meet an assault that never came, melted away. Rumor has it that the Admirals found Mr. George a not less skilful antagonist than the railway directors, and an equally persuasive handler of a situation when peace was worth the making.

Mr. George has both the faults and the virtues of the newcomer. Life has given him few chances of acquiring the critical power, the balance and breadth of mind, the wide knowledge of the processes of life and action, which Lord Morley, for example, possesses. He must think problems out in the terms of the hour or not at all. To the slow and the timid, life presents few or no opportunities; to the bold and quick-minded, it presents them every hour. But tried by the standard of fidelity to purpose, the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not fare ill. He has done well for Wales and for British trade, and if he has time and opportunity, he will lay the foundations both of democratic finance and of a large scheme of industrial assurance. An adaptive and fertile mind, receiving readily, and rich also in personal suggestion and expedient, Mr. Lloyd George, like Mr. Churchill, has set an example of accessibility to skilled opinion which even Mr. Chamberlain, the first truly democratic head of an internal department of British Government, never attained. All parties, all sides, are heard to-day at the Exchequer and the Board of Trade as they have not been heard before. The workmen's representatives often criticise this Government; from which of its predecessors have they received so much individual attention, so large and so proper a share in administrative work? Mr. George's mind lacks something of the finish and exactness of the Prime Minister's; its strength lies more in its originality and adroitness, the way in which, gathering up the threads of controversy from a hundred contributors as it goes along, it weaves them into new and attractive patterns. Officials may have shaken heads over the Chancellor's unorthodox ways of work, the "sketchiness" of some of his views, but they have not been able to slight or to brush aside the clear, strong, and not easily cowed intelligence behind them. It remains to be seen to what strength and capacity for large generalisation and construction he will attain when office, and the self-confidence awakened by familiarity with the springs and methods of Government, have matured and enlarged his powers. Rapid worker as he is, the time and toil he has given to the preparation of his Budget compare with the monumental labors which went to the building up of Sir William Harcourt's scheme for the reform of the death duties.

Mr. George has surprised all men by the way in which he has grown up. Everybody knew him to be an orator of fire and highly communicable force, a wit, a master of fighting tactics, an observer of more than the outside of politics, a close, brilliant, and never purposeless debater. Friends and foes recognised the courage which neither difficulties nor perils, nor the superficially imposing forces in English life, could daunt. No quality is more needed for the government of men, and none is rarer. From the lures of idleness and vanity which English society offers to the talented, Mr. George has always been free: a silken net would never restrain so impatient a spirit. It was natural to him to retain the simple habits of the son of a Welsh yeoman, to remain a Welsh Dissenter—which is not at all the same thing as an English one. A still deeper strain of spiritual faithfulness unites him to his early home and to his native land. In the entrance hall of his house in Downing Street hangs, in reminder and testimony of an irredeemable debt, the portrait of the uncle, Calvinist minister and working shoemaker, who brought him up, and with whom he maintains a daily correspondence. Whatever his precise development may be, his future is, by personal taste and choice, owed to the mass of the people, to working and commercial England. He is essentially middle class, with an imaginative bent; he will do the work of the "industrials," and will not lose touch with Labor, either in sympathy or policy. But he will always think of the country as commercial, and here and there he may be tempted to make Government and business run closer together than the Free Trade doctrinaires might approve. Lack of the rich preparation for life which England offers to a handful of her most favored children during their first twenty-five years may sometimes limit his powers, and make Mr. George ask native wit to furnish what knowledge and experience must supply. But here lies the temptation of all adventurous temperaments. Genius is, after all, a rarer gift than the best finished talent; and genius certainly waved her wand over the cradle of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SOLITARY CONFINEMENT.

An Open Letter to the Home Secretary.

By John Galsworthy.

Sir,—In addressing you, I desire to say that I do so with a gratitude and respect that must be shared by those who know how much you have already done for the improvement of our prison system.

I head this letter "Solitary Confinement" because, though the expression has long been officially abandoned in favor of the term "Separate Confinement," it more adequately defines the seclusion undergone by prisoners in closed cells, and distinguishes that system from a practice obtaining in local prisons of setting prisoners to work separately in their cells with open doors (when it is impossible to find them work in association).

Solitary, or closed cell, confinement—that is to say, complete seclusion every day for nearly twenty-three hours out of twenty-four—is now, Sir, as you, but not all men, know, endured by every convict (persons sentenced to penal servitude for three years and over) during the first six months of his or her sentence, and for the first month of their sentence by all prisoners (except juveniles) sentenced to hard labor.

It is the object of this letter to urge on you the complete abandonment of this closed cell confinement, save where it is rendered necessary by the conduct of the convict or prisoner after his arrival in prison.

In order to demonstrate the weakness of the case for its retention, I shall first quote certain paragraphs from the Report of the Departmental Committee, 1895, over which you, Sir, presided. (The italics are my own.)

52. "We do not agree with the view that separate confinement is desirable, on the ground that it enables the prisoner to meditate on his misdeeds. We are, however, disposed to agree that the separate system as a general principle is the right policy. The separate system rests on two considerations only. It is a deterrent, and it is a necessary safeguard against contamination. But we are not of the opinion that association for industrial labor under proper conditions is productive of harm. On the contrary, we believe that the advantages largely outweigh the disadvantages. . . . Subject to this condition" (careful supervision) "and to a proper system of classification,

Colonel Garsia, a prison official of great experience, stated in his evidence that there was no danger whatever in associated work. . .

53. " . . . We think that this limited form of association is desirable for several reasons. (1) It is a welcome relief to most prisoners from the dull and wearying monotony of the constant isolation which forces men back on themselves, and in many cases leads to moral and physical deterioration. (2) It can be made in the nature of a privilege liable to suspension, and would be, therefore, a satisfactory addition to the best kind of available punishment. (3) It materially lessens the difficulty of providing and organising industrial labor in prisons. Prisoners can be taught trades in classes, and they can then work in association under proper and economical supervision in regular workshops or halls provided for the purpose. (4) It is more healthy. It is desirable that cells should be untenanted for some hours in the day, and in any case it is better that work which produces dust should not be carried on in the cells.

55. "In recommending a wider adoption of associated work, we must admit that several competent witnesses expressed disapproval of the principle. . . . But upon cross-examination, it did not appear that they could sustain their objection to associated labor properly supervised, and they seemed to us to have formed their opinion rather because separation has been the accepted rule of the prison system than on any experience of failure of the associated system. . . .

76. "In the consideration of several matters contained in the reference we had to touch upon the practice of confining convicts for nine months'" (now six) "solitary imprisonment either in local or convict prisons. . . . The history of it is interesting and suggestive. It was originated in 1842 by Sir James Graham, then Home Secretary. . . . We shall show how complete a change in the apparent object of the practice has since occurred.

77. " . . . The convict was to undergo eighteen months' solitary imprisonment, but he was to be freely visited by chaplain and prison officials . . . he was to be kept in a state of cheerfulness; hope, energy, resolution, and virtue were to be imparted to him, and he was to be trained to be fully competent to earn his own way and become a respectable member in the penal settlements. . . .

78. "In 1848 it was determined that, eighteen months being too long a period for isolated confinement, a system should be introduced based on a period of separate confinement, followed by a term of associated labor, with a maximum of twelve months. This was reduced by Lord Palmerston in 1853 to nine months. The original intention of Sir J. Graham, which was that this period should be primarily of a reformatory character, appears fifteen years later to have been lost sight of. . . .

79. "It would appear from Sir J. Jebb's evidence in 1863 that the main object of the separate (solitary) confinement had come to be deterrence. . . .

80. "In effect, this is the purpose which it must be regarded as now designed to serve. . . . It is certainly a practical convenience in the sense that the expense of sending convicts immediately after sentence to convict prisons, either singly or in small detachments, is curtailed by the system of gathering prisons. This consideration alone is not sufficient to justify the practice. The argument that it is a necessary discipline for penal servitude, if true, is no argument for sending the convicts to local prisons. We do not regard the system with favor. We see no objection to short periods of detention in local prisons for the purpose of collecting parties for transfer to the convict prisons; but if the system is a good one at all, we think it ought, as far as possible, to be worked out in the convict prisons from first to last. We think it cannot be denied that cases occur in which a nervous condition, agitated by remorse and by a long continuance of the separate system, may be injuriously affected by it. From the evidence before us, we have no reason to believe that such cases are of other than exceptional occurrence. We think it is worth considering whether the severity of the system might not be mitigated by a substantial reduction in the period of separation. . . ."

These, Sir, were the conclusions of your Committee as far back as 1895. I submit that, as a whole, they point to the existence of very grave doubts in the minds of its members as to the wisdom of retaining this system of closed cell confinement at all. Since then great strides have been made in the direction of the classification of prisoners, and of associated labor, and the whole slow trend of thought and effort in regard to prisons has been in the direction of reformation of the prisoner.

The late Sir Edmund Du Cane, one of its chief supporters, has called solitary confinement . . . "an artificial state of existence absolutely opposed to that which Nature points out as the condition of mental, moral, and physical health. . . ." ("The Punishment and Prevention of Crime," p. 158.) Its effect on a highly-strung temperament is thus described by a young woman who had served a long term of penal servitude. . . . "It is like nothing else in the world—it is impossible to describe it; no words can paint its miseries, nothing that I can say would give any idea of the horrors of solitary confinement—it maddens one even to think of it. No one who has not been through it can conceive the awful anguish one endures when shut up in a living tomb, thrown back upon yourself. . . . The overpowering sensation is one of suffocation. You feel you must and can smash the walls, burst open the doors, kill yourself! . . . ."

Compare with this Sir Robert Anderson's description of his sensations (XIXth Century, March, '02), after he had caused himself to be locked up for only a few hours with a political prisoner. "I seemed to be in a pit. There was no want of air, and yet I felt smothered. My nerves would not have long stood the strain of it."

This is the conclusion, from personal experience, of H. B. Montgomery: "The whole of this procedure" (solitary confinement) "is cruel and barbarous, unworthy of a humane or civilised nation. To my knowledge, it drives many men mad, and even when it does not induce lunacy, mentally affects a large proportion of those subjected to it . . ," and "The less a prisoner is thrown in on himself and the more he is encouraged to foster his home ties, the less likely is he to descend into that condition of despair and demoralisation which are such potent factors in driving men to perdition."

These are the words of Colonel Baker, of the Salvation Army, before your Departmental Committee of 1895: "As to convicts on discharge, I should like to say that we find a great number of them incapable of pursuing any ordinary occupation. They are mentally weak and wasted, requiring careful treatment for months after they have been received by us. In several cases they are men who are only fit to be sent off home or to a hospital."

These, after personal experience, are the comments of W.B.N. in his moderate, and stoical, book, "Penal Servitude":—

" . . . but, at the best, the system of 'separate confinement' is a very bad one. It is only solitary confinement slightly improved, and it has some of the worst effects of that terrible punishment. The intention of it, doubtless, is to impress the prisoner with the gravity of his offence against society, and to bring him to a better state of mind. But in some cases, I am convinced, it has quite the opposite result. The solitude and the hopeless monotony, with nothing to think of but the long years of suffering and disgrace ahead, produces nervous irritation approaching, in some cases, to frenzy, and instead of softening the man brings out all the evil there is in him. Under such conditions, the worst companions he could have are his own thoughts. In men of a different temperament, again, it deadens all sensibility, so that they do not care a straw what happens afterwards, but would just as soon become habitual criminals as not. It is this sullen hatred of themselves and of everybody else engendered and fostered during the long, dismal months of separate confinement that makes the most dangerous and troublesome prisoners at a later stage. There are a third class, who, having no criminal instincts, nor any strong instincts at all, merely give way mentally, without any acute distress, and become little better than half-witted by the time their separate confinement is at an end. . . ."

These are the remarks of Professor Prins, Inspector-General of Belgian prisons: "Solitude produces in him (the vacuous-minded, erratic, and animal person who is usually the criminal) no intellectual activity and no searching of conscience; it serves to deepen his mental vacuity and to deliver him over to unnatural indulgence in the one animal appetite of which he cannot be deprived." ("The Criminal." Havelock Ellis, p. 328.)

Beltrani-Scalia, formerly Inspector-General of Prisons in Italy, is of the same opinion, and remarks that "the cellular system looks upon man as a brother of La Trappe." ("The Criminal," p. 329.)

The following passage, taken from Prince Kropotkin's "Memoirs of a Revolutionist," refers to a peasant, confined solitarily in a cell beneath him in the Fortress of Peter and Paul, and with whom he and his neighbor could communicate by knocking. "Soon I began to notice, to my terror, that from time to time his mind wandered. Gradually his thoughts became more and more confused and we two perceived, step by step, day by day, evidences that his reason was failing, until his talk became at last that of a lunatic. Frightful noises and wild cries came next from the lower storey; our neighbor was mad. . . . To witness the destruction of a man's mind under such conditions was terrible."

Finally: This is the judgment of the Rector of St. Marylebone, Dr. W. D. Morrison (after more than ten years' experience as Prison Chaplain): "It tends to have a demoralising effect upon many classes of prisoners."

Such evidence might be multiplied indefinitely.

(To be concluded next week.)

Present-Day Problems.

ORGANISED LABOR AND PRACTICAL POLITICS.

II.

In the history of great changes a most appalling feature is the waste of the best human energy. Such waste is particularly apparent during the English Revolution of 1642, during the French Revolution of 1789, and during the European revolutions of 1848. Compared with the faith and hope, the enthusiasm and the effort they called forth, how little was accomplished!

This waste still continues in the great process of change which marks the struggle of organised labor to win for itself a better place in the world. The Social Democracy of Germany is perhaps the most conspicuous example of it in recent times. I have no intention here of repeating the oft-told tale of the rise of the German Social Democracy. But it is necessary for my purpose to recall two important facts—that it was originated by Lassalle, who in one aspect of his career might be regarded as a brilliant adventurer, and that it soon fell under the influence of Karl Marx, an extreme revolutionist living in exile in England, who was prone to interpret the past by abstract formulas and to impose them on the present and the future. Thus the German Social Democracy was brought up on revolutionary formulas, and the whole matter was put on an entirely false basis. The cause of organised labor was mixed up with a revolutionary Socialism, in which subversive views regarding religion, marriage, the family, and patriotism were advocated in the most violent language. In such a way the heads of the reaction were enabled to come forward as the champions of truth and righteousness and of the vital order of society, while the men who aspired to lead organised labor could be branded as the apostles of anarchy, atheism, and immorality. Nothing more welcome to the reaction could have happened. The wrong-doing of centuries was obscured by controversy on irrelevant matters. It was an entirely false rendering of the situation and a grave calamity for labor to have the main problem thus distorted and turned upside down. Let us take the question of patriotism. After generations of calamity and humiliation it was the ardent and resolute aspiration of the German people during the nineteenth century to restore the national unity and to recover a fitting place in the world. This was a reasonable and honorable ambition, and it has been accomplished. Whatever human errors may have been committed in the doing of it, it was in its essence a profoundly progressive and desirable thing, which the Social Democrats ought to have welcomed. Social Democratic leaders very unwisely and very needlessly placed themselves in opposition to the national idea. The cause of organised labor to-day suffers from the unwisdom of its chiefs. And we may add in passing that they are not the only men who have seriously gone astray in this matter. It may be maintained that some of the worst mistakes in English policy since 1864 have been due to the fact that our statesmen have not understood what German unity and legitimate opportunity for development meant to the German people.

The German Socialist Party has never, as far as I am aware, expressed any fitting regret or penitence for the blunders of its youth. We deplore it the more, as we might wish that the new parties which seek to establish a better social order should show a good example of insight in recognising errors, and of candor in admitting them. In any case it remains certain that the party has by its past action raised many very unnecessary obstacles to the accomplishment of its proper and most urgent tasks. A yawning chasm, largely of its own making, still separates it from much that is healthy and progressive in German life. The German democracy has been fatally divided and weakened. For fifty years German labor has suffered cruel wrong through the mistakes of its leaders. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that they have had a prejudicial effect on the whole course of recent German life and history, and that the only cause which has gained by them is the reaction. This will be all the more evident if we remember that at the last General Election, in 1907, apart from the Anti-Semites, the Conservatives won only eighty-two seats, being about one-fifth of the Reichstag.

Thus the German party carries about with it to-day the burden of a too revolutionary past. But while this is so, we must also recognise that its principles and policy have for a long time been marked by a growing insight and moderation. As regards the German Government, the party has but one rôle—vigilant scrutiny of all its acts, outspoken criticism when necessary, and it is often necessary—uncompromising opposition to its fiscal and military, naval and colonial policy. To such a system they will grant neither men nor money, and therefore refuse to vote for the imperial budgets.

But they deny that their attitude is a purely negative one. They point to a long list of practical measures, chiefly for the better protection of workpeople, which they have promoted, with little success, in the Reichstag. Apart from the Reichstag, they are taking an active part in many departments of the practical work of the country. In the communes they have more than two thousand members. The interests of the working-class are represented by Social Democrats in most of the corporations of the great towns. When the German Social Democracy was originated by Lassalle, he made a fierce onslaught on the co-operative system, which was then growing up in Germany. Now, especially in South Germany, the Party and the co-operative movement appear to be drawing together. In the early stages of revolutionary Socialism there was a tendency to regard mere trade unions as reactionary institutions, which, being too intent on petty details of wages and hours of labor, were really obstacles to the better order. It is now recognised that trade unions represent the more purely economic side of the great movement of organised labor, and have therefore a most important function to perform in harmony with the more purely political movement carried on by the Socialist Parties. In Germany the Socialist Party acts in harmony with the great trade union movement.

The annual meeting of the Party at Nuremberg in 1908 saw the first attempt on a considerable scale to modify the too rigid policy of its leaders. By a minority of 119 against 258 the South German members maintained the right to vote for the budgets of their Governments. While the majority still adhere to the old policy, regard Liberalism as the valet of the reaction, and expect to have no better relations with it, we may anticipate that an increasing minority will take a wider view. The German Social Democracy has a duty to the working people of their country and to all that is genuine and of goodwill in the German democracy outside of the working-class. By reason of its numbers, organisation, and discipline, it holds the foremost place among the labor organisations of the world. It holds a unique place in the labor annals of the world. But its greatness is the greatness of promise rather than of achievement. To a sympathetic observer it appears to have wasted its own strength, as well as that of Liberalism, by excessive devotion to revolutionary formulas for the last thirty years. Is it prepared to imperil the future in the same way?

In the neighboring country of Austria the Socialist movement presents some very interesting features. The working people of Austria had to wage a long and hard struggle for universal suffrage. In order to win it they carried on a strenuous agitation in their Press and at public meetings, by great demonstrations and processions, and by the menace of a general strike. It was at last granted, and the first election on the basis of universal suffrage was held in May, 1907. The Socialists polled nearly one-fourth of the votes, and gained 87 seats out of 516. The Christian Social Party won 96 seats.

It had a pleasant significance that the Socialist leaders showed quite a friendly tone towards the aged Emperor Joseph. But the most notable feature of Austrian Socialism is its solution of the racial question in the Empire. This solution is both simple and effectual, having for basis national autonomy and international federation. The party is an International in miniature. The whole forms one party, with a common programme, a common executive and a common policy. But each nationality—German, Czech, Polish, Italian, &c.—has a very substantial measure of autonomy. On this basis the various nationalities act together in fraternal harmony.

In so doing the working men of Austria have furnished a solution, as simple as it is effectual, for many of the most vexed problems of politics. For the mixed populations that occupy the regions from Bohemia to Salonica there is but one method that is favorable alike to peace and progress—the method of national or local autonomy and federal union. For its successful application there and elsewhere, all that is wanted is the enlightened goodwill to use it.

T. Kirkup.

Letters from Abroad.

ABDUL HAMID'S PLOT AND ITS FAILURE.

To the Editor of THE NATION

Sir,—The military rising of the 13th April not only came upon Europe as a surprise, but was described by Rifaat, until a few weeks ago Turkish Ambassador in London, as falling like a bomb on him and his colleagues. It was a plot of which the secret was well kept. It was bold, inasmuch as it proposed to make the rank and file of the army rise against their officers by appealing to their religious sentiment. It proposed to stimulate this appeal by a lavish distribution of money. To give it a better chance of success, trustworthy emissaries were sent into the interior of the country to stir up strife between Moslem and Christian. At Adana, Marash, Alexandretta, Antioch, and Aleppo simultaneous attacks were made by Turkish and Kurdish fanatics upon Christians. It was hoped that disturbances would ensue which would no doubt bring European ships of war into the Levant and lead the Powers to say that the Constitutional system was a failure, and that the rule of Abdul Hamid, bad though it was, must be supported. The object of the rising being to bring back absolutism, it must be sprung suddenly upon the soldiers before they had time to think about their action. The moment seemed to be favorable. Five Turkish newspapers were attacking the Nationalist section of the Committee of Union and Progress. The troops had seen the Government powerless to repress the large guild of hamals, or porters, unable to prevent general strikes, and the mass of the lower classes regarding liberty as licence. Discipline in their own ranks had become lax. They were told, moreover, by certain softas and a few hodjas that religion was in danger. Men of various occupation had made demonstrations, why should not they? The plot seemed to have a good chance of success, and, to a certain extent, it succeeded. Suddenly 20,000 soldiers rose against their officers. Many of the latter—some say 240—were killed. The deputies scattered, and many of the leaders fled into hiding. Mahmoud Muktar, a trusted member of the Committee of Union and Progress, with a few men at the Seraskierat, held out for a while against the revolted soldiers. "It would have been child's play," he declared during the night of his escape into the house of a British subject while the soldiers were seeking to kill him, "to have put down the revolt" if he had been supported. But he had to flee for his life, and, by the combined aid of the British and German Ambassadors, managed to get on board the steamship "Bayern," and so to the Piraeus and round by land to the investing army.

But it was not a well-thought-out plot. It was ill-organised because there was no military leader who commanded confidence, and it was based upon statements which were certain to be shown almost immediately to be false. The motive power which was counted upon, apart from the bribing of the soldiers, was the influence of religion. It was known that the mollahs, the best educated class of Moslem teachers and the real leaders of Moslem thought, had been alarmed by the violent language of some members of the Committee. To make it appear the work of the mollahs and to raise the cry of "religion in danger," spies under the old régime were employed and found a few young and hot-headed softas, that is, theological students, ready to their hands. The spies wound a white turban round their fezes, and thus passed readily among the soldiers as mollahs. In this way when the demonstration came off it made a great noise, and within two or three hours the army was in possession of the capital. The first move was a surprise, but the second? Abdul Hamid, for all the evidence points to him as the principal author of the plot, had not thought of it. The army had got rid of its best officers. Those who remained were mostly without character. Having gained the rank and file, Abdul Hamid did not know how to use them. He hastened on the very first day to grant an indemnity to the mutineers. He appointed Tewfik as Grand Vizier, and having set his organs in the Press to declare that he had no intention of attacking the constitution his resources were exhausted. It was, from any point of view, a foolish and a stupid plot.

The troops soon found out that the men who had visited them in barracks and who urged them on the 13th to shout for the Sheriat, were mostly impostors disguised as mollahs. The Sheikh-ul-Islam, apparently as staunch in his attachment to liberty as his great predecessor, denounced the impostors, and was supported by the mollahs generally. But the greatest blunder of Abdul Hamid was to overlook Macedonia. The great master of spies knew little of that country before July last. He had apparently not recognised that the revolution was made by Macedonia. He was to be taught within a few days of the demonstration, that Macedonia would protect its work. It has done so during the last week quickly and effectively, and as I write this Monday noon, Abdul Hamid's power has been broken, and he himself is a prisoner in his Palace, awaiting the decision of the Macedonian Army.

All Macedonia rose upon the news of the outbreak. The heads of all the communities in Yanina telegraphed a resolution demanding the proclamation of Reschad Effendi. Monastir, Uskub, and Salonika were of the same mind. The Macedonian army immediately took action. It moved rapidly but cautiously. Its leaders were unaware whether Abdul Hamid had organised a force to resist them. They gathered round the capital in a curve extending from Lake Chekmeji on the Marmora to Ortakuei on the Bosphorus. They sent forward small detachments, which took possession of San Stefano, Daoud Pasha, and the valley of the Sweet Waters. They then drew an iron semi-circle round Yildiz, the arc being the Bosphorus. On Saturday, the 24th, they entered Pera, and diminished the semi-circle. All day they were occupied in fighting the troops in the numerous barracks within a radius of a mile on each side of Yildiz. The first serious object of attack was the artillery barracks at the Taxim, where, after the occupants had shown a white flag, the Macedonians were shot down, on approaching to take possession, by Abdul Hamid's troops. There, and at the still larger barracks of Tashkishla, they encountered the greatest opposition. By Sunday morning they were in possession of both. At four o'clock yesterday the other neighboring barracks at Mateka, Ortakuei, and the great building at Scutari, called the Selimieh, the scene of Florence Nightingale's labors half a century ago, had all been captured. The Sultan had previously informed the troops at Yildiz that defence was useless, and that they must act on their own responsibility, and thereupon, within an hour, the victors of Macedonia were in possession, and Abdul Hamid remained without further power of resistance. The victory has cost probably two hundred lives and about three hundred wounded. Thus the plot failed.

Before concluding, it is worth while clearing some of the misapprehension which appears to exist in England as to the facts. The plot was aimed at constitutional government, and not at any party. From the Committee of Union and Progress two parties were evolved, the Achrars, or Liberals, and the Nationalists. Each is as much devoted to the Constitution as the other. There are no Liberals who wish ill to it. They, indeed, are more conservative than the Nationalists. It is some of the latter who wish to make radical changes of a somewhat violent character, such, for example, as abolishing the privileges of the Christian churches. The mollahs are more in sympathy with the Liberals, because they regard them as more moderate than the Nationalists. In regard to the Ulemas or mollahs also, there has been strange misapprehension in England. Nothing has been more surprising than the way in which they have supported the Constitution. They are not only the leaders of Moslem thought and conservative in habit of mind, but they have convinced themselves that the Constitution is ordained by the teaching of Mahomet, and therefore must be supported. If they raised the cry of "religion in danger," the great mass of the population would take up arms in its defence. But they have been absolutely on the side of the Constitution. The softas, or theological students, have always had a tendency, like University students of most Continental countries, to demonstrate. The mollahs did not see that religion was in danger, but a few softas, very few I believe, thought they did. They were plus royalistes que le roi. The order, said to have been given by the Minister of War, to fire even upon the Ulema, was directed, if it existed, against the impostors who had donned the turban, and any of the softas who were attempting to sow discord in the Army. To suppose that the rising was a religious one is a mistake, which no one in Constantinople would be likely to make after the first demonstrations. It was from the first disliked and disowned by the Ulemas.

Nor is there any reason for supposing that the plot was supported by the Liberals. Kiamil and Ismail Kemal were not likely to sanction a movement which would undo the work of their lives. Granted they are sore at the attempt of the Nationalists to ride roughshod over them, it is yet a far cry from that to plotting for the return of absolutism. The wild statements that they were in the plot are, I believe, without a tittle of evidence.

Few persons have any doubt as to the real author of the plot. The only person who could gain by it was Abdul Hamid. So fixed is that conviction that when on Saturday and Sunday I went about the crowded streets to learn the opinions of men of various classes, of many nationalities, and in many languages, there was but one general sentiment. "The Constitution will never be safe so long as Abdul Hamid is on the throne." The consternation on Friday evening when Shevket's declaration was published and its somewhat delphic terms understood to mean that the retention of the Sultan was decided upon was general. "It is a blunder, an irretrievable mistake; everything will have to be done over again; we must be finished with Abdul Hamid." What I have said represents, in my opinion, the view of all moderate and fair-minded observers who know the facts. There was a tendency in the parties to drift apart. Abdul Hamid has united them. I will not speculate as to his fate. A Turkish newspaper headed its article on Friday with the words, "The last selamlik of Abdul Hamid." Other papers also openly declare for his deposition. It is indeed rare to find anyone who does not agree that this much at least is necessary.—Yours, &c.,

EDWIN PEARS.

Constantinople, April 26th.

Letters to the Editor.

THE DECLARATION OF LONDON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I thank Mr. Arnold Herbert for his kindly reference to old relations between us, and will endeavor to reply in a like spirit to the points he raises in your last issue.

Article 24 of the Declaration of London places foodstuffs among articles which are conditionally contraband.

Article 33 declares that such articles are liable to capture when "destined for the use of the armed forces or of a Government department of the enemy State," whereas by Article 30 absolute contraband is liable when "destined to territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy or the armed forces of the enemy."

It follows that the offence of carrying conditional contraband can arise with respect to foodstuffs only when it can be proved that they are to be used for hostile purposes. It is here that Article 34 comes in. It refers to the proof of the offence, not to its nature. It says that the destination which is essential, that is to say, destination for the armed forces or Government departments of the enemy, shall be presumed "if the goods are consigned to a contractor established in the enemy country who, as a matter of common knowledge, supplies articles of this kind to the enemy."

Mr. Herbert argues that these words may cover the case of "goods consigned to any provision merchant in the enemy country." I venture to maintain that such an interpretation is practically impossible. The thing to be proved is that the cargo is destined for hostile use. Can the proof be that it is on the way to a person who purveys it for peaceful purposes? The offence charged is the carrying of conditional contraband. Can the evidence be what brings home the offence of carrying absolute contraband? If this be so, the difference between the two offences has vanished, and Article 34 has made useless the distinctions and classifications of Articles 22-26, 30-33.

It is, of course, true that the words "to the enemy," if they stood alone, might mean, to the population of the enemy country. But if we follow the rule which says that a document must be construed so as to be consistent with itself, we must take them to mean what all the parties concerned in the recent Naval Conference unite in asserting they were intended to mean, that is to say, to the Government of the enemy country. I can conceive of no other interpretation as possible for Judges charged with the important task of applying the Declaration of London. It, and it alone, makes the chapter on Contraband intelligible and consistent from beginning to end.

Mr. Herbert's fear that an enemy might seize neutral vessels carrying foodstuffs to our ports, in the hope of thereby starving us into submission before the International Prize Court had delivered judgment, is based rather on political than on legal grounds. Such action is conceivable, whatever interpretation is put on Article 34. But the neutrals whose highly lucrative trade was interfered with would have a good deal to say, and it might quite possibly be said out of the mouths of their big guns. Moreover, Great Britain, even with a navy "hard pressed, if not defeated," is a power to be reckoned with, and International Law recognises a resort to reprisals when undoubted rules are wantonly violated by a foe. I doubt whether the suggested course is likely to commend itself to the most unscrupulous belligerent.

I am grateful to Mr. Herbert for obtaining from Sir E. Grey the promise to which he refers; but I remain of my old opinion that "we came out of the Conference in a better legal position than we went into it."—Yours, &c.,

T. J. Lawrence.

Upton Lovel Rectory, Wilts.
April 28th, 1909.

THE DEFECTS OF LIBERAL PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I see several correspondents to your paper give their view as to the causes of Liberal losses at bye-elections, but, in my opinion, they do not mention the principal one, and that is the defective way in which the Tory attack is met. I have worked as a voluntary worker at elections on the Liberal side for the last thirty years in Lancashire, Cheshire, Liverpool, Birkenhead, London, and surrounding constituencies, and it is obvious that the attack as at present delivered by our opponents completely overwhelms the existing system of organisation on the Liberal and Free Trade behalf, and although in the majority of cases the Conservative candidate carefully keeps off Tariff Reform, or if pressed by questions, gives the stereotyped reply, "That he is a follower of Mr. Balfour," yet the constituency is invaded by the paid orators of the Tariff Reform League, who, although extremely ignorant of the subject they speak on, are yet through practice very good judges of which particular phase of the question will best catch their audience. If it is a working-man audience it is higher wages and two jobs for each man. If a farmer audience a tax on flour and the statement that if this were carried out larger quantities of wheat would come in, the village mill would again be working, the farmers would be able to buy their offals cheaper, and they could then afford to keep and hold more stock against a rising market. Again, at Croydon, tax the foreigner to pay for all the "Dreadnoughts" you require; so it goes on.

On the other hand, the Free Trader is at a great disadvantage because he has to go into facts and figures to show the advantages of the existing system.

Now, if two men go down, both strangers to the electors, it is obvious that the man whose promises are only limited by his imagination has a great advantage in bidding for votes at the street corner and in the market places. It is canvassing in the bulk, and the candidate is not pledged in any way to the statements made to catch votes on his behalf.

The class of man he addresses does not, as a rule, attend the regular meetings, and the distribution of literature is, in my opinion, of little use. My experience leads me to believe that only the partisans on either side read it. I am firmly convinced that the only way to stop the rot setting in is to have a much more capable type of agent, a political enthusiast who will form local committees, and meet them week by week, find out any local speakers and see that they are well supplied with figures and facts, and encourage them to speak locally, attend the street corner meetings, question the Tariff Reform speakers, and keep them somewhere near the truth. The workman who is so coached is invaluable, he carries the local sympathy of his audience, and at his work he is continually canvassing without really being aware of it.

This is quite easy of accomplishment. In the recent bye-election here, in this polling district, the Tariff Reformers held two meetings, but owing to the persistent way in which they were questioned and set right, they did us more good than we could have possibly done ourselves. I am honorary secretary for this polling district, and have a committee of forty—thirty-eight workmen and two belonging to the middle class. Most of them are now well able to hold their own with the paid speakers on the tariff platform. Another point: get as many Liberals as possible to subscribe towards the local party funds. The workman who subscribes one shilling a year will work much harder than the man who does not. He has got his money on! and he will try hard to get a run for it. All this may not be organisation, but it is, in my view, the only effective way of meeting the present situation. The appointment of election agent and sub-agents for various departments, meetings, vehicles, &c., may be very necessary, and the office work may be as near perfect as possible, but the other side is throwing all its energies to canvassing in the bulk in the open air, and however good your election agent, if this attack cannot be met, and if he has not the material at hand to meet it with, I am very much afraid that Mid-Devon, Peckham, Newcastle, and Croydon are only the preliminary to the day of disaster.

The agents, when spoken to, generally put the blame on Head Office, Home Counties, Central, or elsewhere, but I have met a very large number of agents, and the men at the top, and personally I should not hesitate one minute in locating the weakness.—Yours, &c.,

W. M. T.

April 27th, 1909.

THE UNFORTUNATE ARGYLL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In the review of my book, "A Scots Earl in Covenanting Times," by Mr. Andrew Lang, in your issue of the 17th inst., there are two seriously inaccurate statements which are calculated to produce a false impression of the contents of the volume in question. My critic deplores the bad taste of Lord Lorne in watching from the window of Moray House the progress of Montrose to prison and to the gibbet; and he says that I try to explain the statements away. I do nothing of the kind. I speak of Lorne's presence in Moray House, and say: "One regrets to read of the procession being witnessed from the balcony and of the cart in which the prisoner sat being delayed for a few moments before the door." In a note I assert that there is no evidence to prove that orders had been given (by Argyll or Lorne) for the cart to stop. Apart from this comment my narrative of the incident corresponds exactly with that ordinarily given of it. I neither attempt to deny the facts nor to defend Lorne in the matter of taste.

The second inaccuracy to which I draw attention is in the following sentence: "The father (Argyll) fatally committed himself by his dealings with Monk, while the son turned out for 'The Young Pretender,' as it pleases Mr. Willcock to style Charles II." I do not give Charles II. any such absurd designation. Probably Mr. Lang's error arises from a hasty reading of the following sentence on p. 38 of my book: "Some who have formed an unfavorable estimate of the Marquess of Argyll have compared his conduct to that of such men as Lord Lovat a hundred years later, who adhered to the Hanoverian Government while he sent his son out to assist the Young Pretender." I think that it is due to the author of a book considered worthy of such a long notice in The Nation that his critic should read the volume with some measure of care, and also should credit the writer with as much knowledge of history as would keep him from confusing Charles II. with the Young Pretender.

Perhaps I may be allowed to reply to the statement that I should have entered into a discussion of the question of debts due to Argyll by the Macleans of Mull. These matters were considered and adjudicated by the law courts of the time. I presume that they would have the facts before them. It was sufficient for my purpose to refer to their decisions and decrees; and it would have been foolish at this distance of time to attempt with the aid of some ex parte statements which may still exist to discuss the justice of those decisions.—Yours, &c.,

John Willcock.

Lerwick,
April 23rd, 1909.

THE SALVATION ARMY'S SOCIAL WORK.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—In view of the misleading nature of some of the statements in your recent article "The Poor Law Commission and Voluntary Agencies," by Social Reformer, I trust that you will permit me to reply to some of his misrepresentations concerning the Salvation Army. I will not enter into the question of whether the Royal Commission was right in its decisions regarding the co-operation of voluntary and State agencies. Though I cannot accept Social Reformer's views on the subject, it is at least a question which admits of more than one opinion. However great an authority on the Poor Law Social Reformer may be, he is lamentably ignorant concerning the Salvation Army and its methods.

In his article Social Reformer says: "General Booth and his coadjutors have perfected their organisation, and in one respect the result is mystifying by reason of their silent lips when a controversy rages round some such institution, for example, as the settlement in Hanbury Street, Whitechapel, for destitute joiners and carpenters." What does Social Reformer mean by "silent lips"? One can only suppose that he speaks thus from ignorance, but it is surprising that he writes in this way when he has evidently never taken the trouble to inquire after the truth.

In 1907 and 1908 certain charges of sweating were made against the officers of the Hanbury Street factory. Social Reformer's statement that the Army maintained "silent lips" during this time is altogether incorrect.

I have before me, at the moment of writing, six cuttings from the "War Cry," dealing at great length with these charges. I have also a pamphlet issued from the Headquarters of the Salvation Army disproving the accusations with such success that the members of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, who first made the charges, have at last expressed their "appreciation" of the Army's object in conducting the factory. Publicity was given to a letter from General Booth to Mr. W. C. Steadman, M.P., the well-known Trade Unionist. In addition to this, a demonstration was held last August on four consecutive nights at Regent Hall, Oxford Street, at which the produce of the factory was on view, and at which not only the officers but also the men—who were supposedly sweated and ill-used—defended the Army's methods, and showed how devoid of foundation the charges were. General Booth was also interviewed by the "Daily Chronicle."

Will Social Reformer maintain, in the face of these facts, that he was justified in making such a statement?

Commissioner Sturgess, who is responsible for the Hanbury Street factory, the Bermondsey settlement, and other departments of the Men's Social Work, flatly denies that the Truck Act is eluded in spirit or in letter at any of the institutions, as Social Reformer alleges.

As to the men at Bermondsey having to work for a mere pittance, Social Reformer does not appear to realise that both the Hanbury Street factory and the Bermondsey settlement are "Industrial Hospitals." Neither of them is designed to supply work for capable workmen who could claim the Union rate of wage. They are for the purpose of assisting, and rescuing from moral and physical ruin, men who have, from some cause, fallen out of the running and cannot find employment on any terms. The condition of the applicants has been well described by Commissioner Sturgess, who said: "Two-thirds of the men who enter are maimed by drink, either in character, body, or mind. My Trade Unionist friends demand that these should be paid for their labor according to their scale, irrespective of their moral and physical condition. Let me say, however serious it may sound in some people's ears, it is not wages these men are in need of most. Some would even be better without a sixpence, until such time as they are morally strong enough to spend it outside an ale-shop. They need, in a word, remaking. As it is, their greatest temptation is to spend the grant they receive in the public-house, and our greatest task is to prevent them doing so. . . . But they do not all come under that classification. Ill-health, inefficiency, partial knowledge of their craft, and sheer poverty—in some instances absolute hunger—drive them to us."

A brief extract from the report by Mr. W. T. Stead of an interview which he had with General Booth may help Social Reformer to understand the situation.

> "The Trade Unionists don't contend, do they, that these poor derelicts whom you have picked out of the depths, whom no one will employ, and who come to you in despair to keep them from starvation, are to be regarded as capable workmen, and paid as such,"
>
> "That seems to be their idea," said General Booth, "but it does not seem to me quite reasonable."
>
> "Stark, staring lunacy," said I. "It is equivalent to maintaining that damaged goods or second-hand goods should be sold at the market price of new goods in first-class condition."
>
> "That is about it," said the General. "Damaged labor, like damaged goods, is a drug in the market. It is the most difficult thing in the world to find a market for it. I make a market, and by giving these people a subsistence wage I get a good many of them on their feet, and enable them to go out and sell their labor at Trade Union rates. But if I did not intervene they would have to go to the workhouse or starve."

The above extracts serve to show how utterly foolish it is to talk of these men as though they are capable workmen.

It is to be hoped that all who harbor suspicions of this branch of the social work will obtain further information. They might, for instance, write to the International Headquarters, at 101, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., for the pamphlet entitled "A Calumny Exposed," which deals thoroughly with all sides of the question.

Social Reformer says that the Salvation Army refuses to "supply the data on which alone the public can estimate its moral and material value to the State." If he refers to the Balance Sheets and general statistics, his statement is untrue. The Balance Sheets of both the Spiritual and Social work are regularly issued every year. The statistics of the whole of the Army's work throughout the world are frequently published. They enable one to see what is being done in fifty-four different countries and colonies in which the Army operates.

A little further on, Social Reformer asks: "Were they (the Royal Commissioners) aware that the leader of this society has again and again refused an inquiry into the serious charges that have been made against it on the ground of sweating, underselling, and defective management?" General Booth and his officers have been particularly active in refuting these charges. The Trade Unionists, who formulated the charges, were fully and frankly answered on all points. I have already referred to General Booth's letter to Mr. Steadman. The General received a deputation of Trade Unionists, and facts were laid before them. Most careful investigations were made for the benefit of the members of the deputation, who personally visited the Social Headquarters and saw the books of the institution. The Trade Unionists have now abandoned their former attitude.

—Yours, &c.,

RONALD H. KIDD.

21, Downside Crescent, Hampstead, N.W.
April 26th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am obliged to you for the permission to read before its appearance in your columns the reply of Mr. Ronald H. Kidd to my article "The Poor Law Commission and Voluntary Agencies." The reply possesses a characteristic which can only be clearly discerned by those who have carefully studied and followed the methods of Salvation Army controversialists. With all desire to be scrupulously fair, permit me to pass this uncommon observation upon the letter: While I do not question that, physically, Mr. Kidd is the writer, the actual author or inspirer of it must be one of the adepts at evasiveness connected in some way with the Salvation Army. If I am mistaken, my apology will be ample, but the features of the letter are so peculiarly those of the Salvation Army that I feel justified in beginning my reply to it with this comment.

The letter itself purports, with an amplitude of apparently overwhelming quotations from Salvation Army journals and Salvation Army officers—all ex parte evidence—to establish the following propositions:—

> The charge of sweating against the Salvation Army has been disproved; General Booth has already and fully answered this charge; the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress have withdrawn its objections to the system of remuneration or wages paid to the carpenters and joiners employed at the Hanbury Street shop—otherwise named an "elevator"; and that the conditions of the Truck Act are not violated, as they state, at that place.

By far the most serious point raised by Mr. Kidd is that which refers to the Parliamentary Committee. Now, has that Committee or has it not withdrawn its objection to Hanbury Street? Mr. Kidd clearly suggests that it has. I say that it has not, and for proof of this I turn to the following extract of the letter written by Mr. Kidd, viz.:—

> "I have," says Mr. Kidd, "also a pamphlet issued from the Headquarters of the Salvation Army disproving the accusations with such success that the members of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, who first made the charges, have at last expressed their 'appreciation' of the Army's object in conducting the factory. Publicity was given to a letter from General Booth to Mr. W. C. Steadman, M.P., the well-known Trade Unionist."

The italics are mine, for this reason: The "object" of Hanbury Street is not and never has been in dispute. General Booth and his men are sincere. Their object is deserving of all respect. What is strongly resented are the methods carried on in fulfilment of that "object." And the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress stands to-day exactly where it did when the subject was first brought under its notice. Mr. Steadman's name is mentioned. Let Mr. Kidd ask that gentleman if I am correct or not. The Parliamentary Committee still demand an inquiry, still denounce the system of organised sweating that obtains at the Hanbury Street shop, and still intend to agitate for an investigation at the Trade Union Congress. But Mr. Kidd reads his "War Cry" with the assurance of one who believes in the infallibility of that remarkable organ, whose argumentative powers consist in an amazing ability to answer specific charges by general statements.

As for the Truck Act, I maintain that if the social officials withdrew the humiliating document which inmates have to sign, which brands them as destitute and requires from them an obedience which, I maintain, they possess no human or Divine right to exact, they would be prosecuted for violating that Act. Skilled men do skilled work at this elevator. The very Year Book of the Salvation Army advertises the fact, and yet they are paid for their skilled labor in doles of food and "grants" that vary from 6d. to 5s. per week! We are told, of course, that this and similar places are "hospitals," where "cures" are affected on the morally depraved. But does any man in his reason believe that these "cures" are brought about by carpentry and small grants of money? No—the good they do is the tribute to the goodness and humanity of the officers who superintend these places, a fact which, to the credit of the organisation as a whole, is best illustrated, I think, in its intrinsically religious operations.

If the charges had been disproved, how is it that the agitation for an inquiry continues? Why does General Booth object to men of the stamp of Mr. Steadman, whom he now extols, assisted by his own nominees, going into the affairs?

I refrain, however, from trespassing further upon your space. I have pointed out sufficient, I hope, to support again the main purpose of my article—that it will be a dangerous departure when the State tries to employ such agencies as these, unless, of course, a system of audit and inspection accompanies the arrangement and is such as to safeguard the public interest.—Yours, &c.,

SOCIAL REFORMER.

P.S.—The reason why I have not exposed and refuted Mr. Kidd's other statements is one of regard for your space.

April 27th, 1909.

THE OBJECT OF GERMAN EXPANSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Either there is a serious danger of war with Germany or there is not. Reading between the lines the Government takes the former view, while THE NATION labors to show that no such danger exists. Is not "the wish the father to the thought"?

As one who was in Germany during the darkest days of the Boer war and who was always treated with the utmost courtesy by all sections of the German people, I say that there is no dislike of the individual Englishman, no misunderstanding to be overcome by greater common intercourse: no sense of injury or of jealousy to be counteracted by deputations of workmen for specific purposes, but the whole population realises the need of expansion, and the fact that Britain and her Empire stand right across the line of German aggrandisement. A war with Britain would be purely a matter of business. Germany has fought three wars of aggression within recent years, and from a material point of view they have been triumphantly successful; but this success has made Germany the most materialistic State the world has ever known; whereas in France, obsessed as she is by fear of her neighbor, manufactures and industries refuse to expand, and, as "The Statist" unceasingly points out, the most thrifty nation in the world refuses to utilise her enormous savings at home.

The Monro doctrine seems to have closed her out of South America, but consider wealthy Holland and her splendid Colonial Empire and our international responsibilities. It seems to me that those who write for THE NATION understand the statesmanship which would have provoked a war with France in 1875, and which would sacrifice men wholesale for an adequate material quid pro quo as little as Bismarck could have understood the objections of THE NATION to our entente with Russia.

Let the writer of "The Growth of International Law" look at the matter psychologically, and, in the light of Baron Aerenthal's action and Germany's cynical support, cease his arguments as to international treaties. The land on the globe is limited and occupied, and German expansion, which will be along the line of least resistance, must be at the expense of some other nation.

The one great factor which makes for peace is, of course, the tremendous risk of war and the uncertainty of success; but Germany's risk is less than ours; for we can only fight her on the sea; and the prize of victory is so dazzling. The first and foremost duty of a British Prime Minister is to make sure that no German Chancellor shall ever be able to say to his Emperor—not, as Bismarck did in 1870, that victory is a foregone conclusion, but even that the chances are in Germany's favor.

The Government policy I understand and admire and support; that of the Society of Friends I understand; but what is that of THE NATION?—Yours, &c.,

A YORKSHIRE RADICAL.

Yorkshire, N.R.
April 26th, 1909.

[We demur to our correspondent's statement that the Government think that there is serious danger of war with Germany.—ED., NATION.]

THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Will you allow me space to call attention to a further and serious defect in the Small Holdings Act, which might easily be remedied by a short Act this Session?

It is eminently desirable, if not absolutely essential to the rural revival, that men should be allowed to carry on their trades in connection with the cultivation of the land. Nothing is more to be regretted than the way the small handicraftsmen are being driven from the villages, and nothing is more pitiable than the plight of those that remain. Wholesale machine manufacture with its corollary of overcrowded towns, production for profit with its attendant evils of slums and unemployment have already deteriorated the moral and physical fibre of the people and brought about an unprecedented degradation of workmanship throughout the whole civilised world. Yet, in spite of the well-known fact that it is only where the petty trades are allied to Agriculture that they are at all prosperous, the terms of the Small Holdings Act make it possible for County Councils to prohibit a small holder from utilising even the smallest portion of his land for the erection of a workshop in which to make boots or even to shoe horses! Is it not extraordinary? The East Sussex County Council in particular is using its powers to prevent this being done and is refusing land on this ground. In one case at least this is resulting in the young men of the family deciding to go abroad, and yet the Board of Agriculture has not said a word!

The whole administration of the Act is a miserable failure, causing every sort of injustice to working people and bringing the general administration of the law and the Government into contempt.

The only hope is that the people will now combine, as we have done here, for their protection against the indifference of County Councils and the avarice of landlords.—Yours, &c.,

A. E. R. Gill,
Secretary of the Keymer and District Land Club.

Soper's Ditchling,
April 24th, 1909.

"THE GROWTH OF INTERNATIONAL LAW."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have read your most timely and interesting article on the above subject which appeared in your issue of the 24th inst. with great pleasure and interest. It is a grand and inspiring thing to know that, when great journals with traditions like the "Spectator" and the "Saturday Review" appear to despair of the arrival of the golden age, The Nation still holds on and points the way upwards and onwards to a somewhat timorous and doubting present-day humanity. If one will only look about there are evidences of encouragement to be found on all sides. I have recently returned from Rome, where a movement is now in progress having for its ultimate object the creation of a European Tribunal with powers more or less limited as to scope, but, at the same time, definite and binding, which it is hoped will exercise the function of a supreme constabulary, and be able to use an international army and navy supplied by the contributing parts for the enforcement of its will upon the rest of Europe. It is proposed with this object in view to hold an International Congress in Rome next month to be followed annually by similar congresses, and I have had the honor to be asked to join the Committee which is engaged in making some of the preliminary arrangements.

The Congress will be divided into three sections, Political, Economical, and Judicial, and will, doubtless, pass some good resolutions, and come to some excellent decisions. All this has happened before and nothing further has come of it. The goal to aim at then must surely be the creation of a European Federal Parliament or Tribunal which will put a stop to aggression, and possess power to adjudicate upon questions of International Law. Until some such tribunal has been created as an alternative to the law of force it is, to my mind, useless and futile to talk and write about general disarmament or even a limitation of armaments.

A correspondent of yours, "Facta non Verba," in your issue of the 17th ult., suggests the Peace and Arbitration Conference at The Hague as an alternative to the ruinous competition in armaments. It seems to me that The Hague Conference is not clothed with sufficient powers, and is much too slow and cumbersome in action to be really useful and effective. What is wanted is a supreme body or Federal Parliament with power to act. Let us imagine for a moment when such a body would prove useful. Take the question of the misgovernment in the Congo. All civilised Powers are agreed as to the abuses and misgovernment, but the difficulty is to get a stop put to these abuses. Then there is the Macedonian question and the present anarchy in Turkey. All these questions could be discussed and promptly settled by an International Tribunal as compared with the long-drawn-out agony and barbaric method at present in vogue. Adverse critics say that such a tribunal would eventually be dominated by some aggressive Power or group of Powers. This, of course, is possible, but the history and experience of all deliberative assemblies goes to prove that such a state of affairs is most unlikely to take place for any length of time. In any case free speech and discussion are bound to advance the interests of truth and justice and lead to their eventual triumph in the end.—Yours, &c.,

D. M. Mason.

April 27th, 1909.

THE PAPACY AND JOAN OF ARC.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The writer of the interesting article on Joan of Arc in your last issue, while applauding the present action of the Church, speaks of its "inconsistency" in once having condemned the Maid, and in now proclaiming her virtues heroic. He "can only regret that the discovery was not made sooner"—than after five centuries. He appears entirely to forget—for throughout an article in which this inconsistency is referred to more than once, he makes no mention of them—two important facts. One is, that the Church did not condemn Joan of Arc. The tribunal by which Joan was condemned, that of the notorious Cauchon, the tool of Bedford, was not a valid ecclesiastical court, but a tribunal fabricated ad hoc, about as constitutional as the Commission that sentenced Charles I. Joan protested against it, and vainly asked to be tried by the regular ecclesiastical authority. "I appeal to the Pope," was her repeated cry during the interrogatories. The other fact is, that not five centuries, but twenty-five years after her death the Church vindicated the Maid. When at last an interval of decency in the politics of the miserable French Court permitted an appeal to regular authority, Pope Calixtus III. issued a Commission to examine the cause of Joan. The Commission examined the records of the Cauchon trial and took evidence itself from Joan's neighbors, friends, and many witnesses of her exploits. It is to this inquiry, indeed, that we owe most of the evidence which remains extant as to the character of the Maid. The judgment of the Pope through his Commission was given on June 7th, 1456. It was announced in a solemn assembly at Rouen by the Archbishop in the name of the Sovereign Pontiff. It was proclaimed in the Cathedral and in the Church of St. Ouen, and also in the market place where Joan was burnt. It repudiated and completely reversed the judgment of Cauchon's tribunal, declaring that the trial and two sentences passed against Joan were "full of cozenage, iniquity, inconsequences, and manifest errors in fact, as well as in law." The whole was declared to be "null, non-existent, and without value or effect," and Joan and her relatives were pronounced not to have "contracted or incurred any stigma of infamy."

What the Church has delayed five centuries about is not this vindication, but decreeing Joan's beatification. But the Church moves slowly in these matters. Proceedings for the investigation of Joan's claims were begun generations ago; they were advanced considerably under Pius IX.; and they have only reached their final stage—two Popes later—under Pius X. Is there not, after all, something significant in the period at which this process comes to maturity—something impressive in the fate which decrees that at this moment in the spiritual life of Europe the pure and sublime figure of the French peasant girl who once saved her country in time of degeneracy and corruption should be held up before the eyes of the world for conspicuous reverence?—Yours, &c.,

G.

April 27th, 1909.

CONCERNING OUR FRIVOLOUS STAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In a criticism of "The Earth" which appeared in your last issue under the initials H. W. M., I read that "dramatic critics" (as well as managers and the Lord Chamberlain) "combine to keep the stage frivolous, immoral, and stupid." I agree if by that you mean that the office of the Lord Chamberlain as vested in a stage censorship is immoral; but must demur to your contention about dramatic criticism, so far as I personally am concerned.

And I would say that our stage is stupid and frivolous precisely because it is not immoral enough, i.e., that it has not the power, as possessed by the Halls, to be immoral, to be serious, or to take interest in serious plays such as "Waste," "Monna Vanna," "In the Lower Depths," &c.; and this because of our immoral nursery stage censorship which is the reason why powerful French plays, such as "Samson," are put on our stage "en papillote," as it were, depleted of all native strength and vitality. Surely, too, it is rather hard on the critic to accuse him of keeping the stage "frivolous." What can he do if our playwrights will serve the public with "pap" and taty-diddy? I assure you, sir, the critic often suffers agonies at the dramatic playlets of our "leading" dramatists. But the cause of the evil lies with the public who, ever since the bogey of Puritanism, has come to regard the theatre as a mere place for entertainment and will not use its brains.—Yours, &c.,

Savile Club, AUSTIN HARRISON.
April 27th, 1909.

LONDON UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Shindler's letter calls, I think, for some comment. His original position, if it means anything important at all, was that "independent examiners" are an advantage to education, and he rejected as impossible the idea of allowing professors to examine their own pupils. But his views, or his expression of them, have changed in a manner which, if he was a pupil of mine at Leiden, would make me consider the necessity his being ploughed on the ground of general confusion of thought. He first of all claimed that there was a general consensus of opinion that independent examiners ought to be employed. When I pointed out that this was untrue in fact, he called my view "childishly simple." When I urged that mine was the practically unanimous view of the Dutch, he suggested that our motive in Holland is to obscure the deficiencies of our teaching. And he introduced this unpleasant accusation by expressing the view that the Dutch are much better educated than the English!

It seems to me that Mr. Shindler is an example of the confused suspicion with which some people regard the profession of teaching. I know nothing personally of the majority of my London colleagues; but I do not believe that they are any exception to the rule that the staff of a great University is in the main composed of capable and trustworthy teachers, who wish to do the best in their power for their pupils, for society as a whole, and for the science which they serve. Such remarks as those with which he closed his last letter are insulting to an honorable profession, and unworthy of the club from which he writes.

The simple question is this: It is a matter of debate whether independent examination is a better method than examination by teachers. Mr. Shindler thinks it is. I think it is not. Mr. Shindler's system is, on the whole, the English system—mine is the Dutch. Mr. Shindler believes that the young Dutchman is better educated than the young Englishmen. I submit that, if he be right on this point, it is probably due to some difference between English and Dutch systems, not to some point on which they are alike, and such a difference is to be found in the method of examination. I do not claim this as demonstration, but as a prima facie argument, which is not to be met by calling it "childishly simple" in one letter and suggesting that it is a cover for deficiency in the next, by only showing there is some difference which explains the facts.—Yours, &c., KIRSOPP LAKE.

Leiden University,
April 24th, 1909.

SWINBURNE AND THE SEA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One cannot think without emotion that the sea which has thrown its mantle over so many men of genius now keeps for ever within the sound of its waves him who of all others felt its ardent and mysterious spell. Swinburne was, indeed, the poet of the sea. He saw in its immense and perpetual movement a strange commentary on the eager hurrying of life. It seemed to hold within its depths all human passions and desires, and to cast them back at last, futile and unanswered, as though with prophetic and mournful weariness. For it typified to him the meaning of destiny. It had all the eloquent and sundering power of fate. What man has voiced more profoundly the beautiful, relentless, and secretive spirit of the sea?—Yours, &c,.

RICHARD H. P. CURLE.

5, Clement's Inn, W.C.
April 20th, 1909.

Poetry.

ODE IN APRIL.

APRIL'S feet are heard
In the doorways of the world;
At her sound
Sings the bird,
And the ground
Is daisy-pearled.
Again, again
She is coming, coming
With her showers
Of bright rain
To gem
Her diadem,
Strewing sweet
At her feet
Honied flowers
And the humming
Of brown bees
Over them:
And the trees
Are ringing
With the singing
Of the thrushes,
And the brushwood flushes
Out of grief
Into leaf;
And from her,
As she passes
With her bosom
Full of blossom,
She is shedding
An aroma
On the grasses
In her treading:
And light clouds waft her
With bright sun after,
With pleasure
Beyond measure,
And laughter,
And din,
For the sweet buds are shooting,
And the sweet birds fluting,
And young lovers luting
To welcome her in.

O my beloved, is it nothing to you
That life is trembling into love to-day?
Does not a strange new music blossom through you,
While green earth and blue sky keep holiday,
Weaving such harmonies as lovers may?—
O my beloved, is it nothing to you?

See, my beloved, see the April moon,
A slip of silver peeping through the boughs!
Fast as they bud, she blooms; and very soon,
As they with odor, she with light shall rouse
The lovely earth out of its winter swoon,—
See, my beloved, see the April moon!

Up! my beloved, there are better things
Than the chill maidenhood of earliest spring;
Nature, that wakes in snowdrop blossomings,
Has richer gifts in store, which she shall fling
Freely to all who welcome her coming,—
Up! my beloved, there are better things!

Rose of my adoration, O immense
Flaming, mysterious, million-petalled rose!
The tapestries of your magnificence
Are fluttered by a wind of God, which blows
Whither and whence and how no mortal knows—
O wind of God, laden with frankincense!

As fly the warblers singing oversea,
So must the pretty thoughts fly to your heart,
To sing in it and nest in it and be
Of all your loveliness the loveliest part,
Happy and musical beyond all art—
O pilgrims frail across the fairy sea!

R. C. K. ENSOR.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

As we announced a couple of weeks ago M. Anatole France's next literary work is to be a course of lectures on Rabelais. The subject has filled his mind for some time, and a letter sent him by the late Professor York Powell, on behalf of the Oxford Rabelaisian Society, shows that M. France's rank in the world of Rabelaisians has been recognised by this country. We are able to print the letter which was to have appeared in the preface to "L'Ile des Pingouins," but was omitted at the final revision of the proofs:

Pour qu'on ne doute pas que je suis membre honoraire de l'Académie Rabelais, je publie ici mon diplôme.

29 novembre 1893.

Christ Church, Oxford (England)

Au créateur de l'Abbé Jérôme Coignard, hæc feliciter.

Monsieur,

Nous avons ici une petite Société de professeurs et autres, en l'honneur de Rabelais. Il n'y a pas longtemps, nous avons décidé de vous offrir un fauteuil honoraire dans cette Société, et, si vous voulez bien accepter cet honneur, le seul que nous puissions vous proposer, car la Société n'existe que pour la propagation des vraies lumières pantagruéliques, nous nous estimerions bien heureux.

Nous avons lu la Rôtisserie, et, surtout, les Opinions de Monsieur Jérôme Coignard, avec grand plaisir, car c'était facile à voir qu'il régnait dans ces deux livres le bon sens et l'esprit de Mâitre François, notre patron. Ces qualités, accompagnées d'une charité évangélique, sont assez rares, comme vous admettrez facilement, de nos jours. Aussi nous avons voulu vous remercier d'en avoir fait preuve dans ces deux œuvres, et nous n'avons pu trouver mieux que de vous soumettre la proposition avant-dite. J'aurais voulu le faire dans des termes mieux choisis et plus idiomatiques, mais le bon vouloir y est, toutefois, et l'ami de l'abbé Jérôme comprendra que la plus belle fille du monde ne peut donner que ce qu'elle a.

Dans l'espérance de recevoir votre consentement, et en vous priant d'agréer nos sentiments bien respectueux, j'ai l'honneur de me souscrire, Pour la Société:

Frédéric YORK POWELL,

A Monsieur, Christ Church, Oxford.

Monsieur Anatole France.

L'original est sur papier vergé, sans filigrane.

* * *

WE are glad to hear that the English translation of M. France's works which Mr. John Lane is issuing will not be confined to fiction, and that the first volume of "La Vie Littéraire" will be published in the early autumn. "La Vie Littéraire" originally appeared in the form of weekly articles in the "Temps," and contains some of M. France's most characteristic work. The preface to the first volume is the nearest approach to a manifesto that he has ever put forth. It gives his views on criticism and defends the purely personal and subjective stand-point. "Criticism like philosophy and history," he declares in a paragraph that has become famous, "is a sort of romance that falls within the province of circumspect and curious spirits. And, rightly taken, all romance is an autobiography. The good critic is he who narrates the adventures of his own soul among masterpieces."

* * *

THE six-shilling novel which has weathered a number of storms during the past few years, is at last in serious danger. Two movements in the publishing world threaten its existence. We understand that one enterprising firm of publishers are about to issue new novels at two shillings or half-a-crown. It is difficult to see how this price can give a profit to both author and publisher, but, if the policy succeeds, the six-shilling novel will certainly be driven out of the market. On the other hand, a movement energetically led by Mr. Eveleigh Nash seeks to raise the price of novels to half-a-guinea. Mr. Nash's plan is meeting with a good deal of support, and is likely to have a far-reaching effect on literary production. The trouble, of course, with novels is that too many of them are published, so that works of real merit are drowned in the flood of inferior stuff. This has long been recognised both by publishers and authors, but of late the trouble has been so acute that the present system cannot continue. Mr. Nash points out that the old three-volume novel was an excellent sifter. The more expensive form made publishers more critical in deciding about a manuscript, and a novel which failed in a small library edition was not reprinted. The same function would be performed if novels were issued in the first place at half-a-guinea, and then in cheaper form if there was a sufficient demand. In the meantime several publishers are declining all contracts until the matter is settled.

* * *

TOWARDS the end of the month Mr. Andrew Melrose will publish "English Literature in the Nineteenth Century: An Essay in Criticism," by Mr. Laurie Magnus. The volume, which is dedicated by permission to Mr. George Meredith, attempts to trace the governing forces that influenced the different epochs of nineteenth century literature. It is divided into three books, the first dealing with the period from 1784 to 1832, the second being called "The Transit through 1832," and the third "The Victorian Age." Mr. Magnus belongs to the small band of publishers who are also authors. He has written an excellent "Primer of Wordsworth," and two useful volumes called "How to Read English Literature."

* * *

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE hope to publish shortly the second volume of the late Professor Pfleiderer's great work on "Primitive Christianity." The first volume, which appeared about two years ago, was, in the main, devoted to an examination and appreciation of the personality and writings of the apostle Paul. The late Dr. Pfleiderer was an acknowledged master in this field, and his conception of the life and place of Paul in primitive Christianity represents the most matured results of recent scholarship. The coming volume is an appreciation of the historical books of the New Testament, more especially of the first three Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles. We have recently had a good deal of first-class work on this subject from the pens of Wellhausen, Harnack, and Loisy. But no students can afford to neglect the inquiries of Pfleiderer. The volume closes with an illuminating account of the preaching of Jesus and of the faith of the first disciples.

* * *

THE current "Quarterly Review" is a centenary number and contains the first instalment of a history of the periodical which has played so distinguished a part in English politics and literature. This year is rich in centenaries, and the opening article in the "Quarterly" is called "The Centenary of Tennyson," and is written by M. Emile Faguet. M. Faguet takes a very different line from that of Taine, whom he declares to have been "très dur pour Tennyson." Tennyson, according to M. Faguet, is "comme le rendez-vous en un seul homme de tous les genres de poésie qui avaient brillé dans la génération précédente. . . . . Il a eu une sensibilité romantique trouvant la perfection classique pour s'exprimer." The Centenary of Darwin is treated under three headings, "Evolution and the Church," "Evolutionary Ethics," and "Evolution of Truth," the last being a sympathetic account of Pragmatism, reaching the conclusion that "of the current notions of Truth the absolutist notion is devoid of all real meaning, while the humanist notion is contrived to supply its deficiency." It is, perhaps, significant that the current number of the "Edinburgh Review" should have an article in which Pragmatist views are dealt with in a severe fashion. Other articles in the "Quarterly" are "The Essentials of Great Poetry," by the Poet Laureate, "Ovid and Shakespeare's Sonnets," by Mr. Sidney Lee, "A Century of English Music," by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, "The Meaning of Modernism," by Professor Inge, and "English Party Government," by Professor Dicey. We offer our congratulations to Mr. John Murray on the hundredth birthday of the great review with which his house has been so honorably connected.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Russian Army and the Japanese War." By General Kuropatkin. Translated by Captain A. B. Lindsay. Edited by Major E. D. Swinton. (Murray. 2 vols. 28s. net.)

"Dante in English Literature, from Chaucer to Cary." By Paget Toynbee. (Methuen. 2 vols. 21s. net.)

"The Origins of Christianity." By the late Charles Bigg. Edited by T. B. Strong. (Clarendon Press. 12s. 6d. net.)

"A History of German Literature." By Calvin Thomas. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"Samuel Pepys." By Percy Lubbock. Literary Lives Series. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

"Walks in Paris." By Georges Cain. Translated by Alfred Allinson. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Infamous John Friend." By Mrs. R. S. Garnett. (Duckworth. 6s.)

"Le Théâtre libre: Essai critique, historique, et documentaire." Par Adolphe Thalasso. (Paris: Mercure de France. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE TEACHING OF THE SPIRIT.*

The modern world, it is often said, sits loose to religion. The statement, put in this way, is not borne out by facts: seldom, if ever, has the general attitude of the world to religion been so interested, so expectant, so sympathetic as now. What is true is that the modern world sits loose to religious formula and observance; and it would be difficult to over-estimate the significance of this fact. The momentous change in virtue of which, in the second century of our era, Christianity from a religion of the spirit became a religion of the letter was, if not justified, brought about and accounted for by the transformation of the little company of believers into a mixed multitude. The Cenacle became the Church; and the charismatic consciousness of the former vanished, as childhood is lost in youth: letter took the place of spirit, dogma of prophecy, law of grace. Now, it seems, this secondary Christianity is breaking down. That this is so is due to more than one cause: here, however, one only need be mentioned; that it rests on a reading of history which is no longer possible. Belief and observance, it is safe to say, will be retained by those who see them in their true perspective—by those, that is, who could with least loss dispense with them. For the average or natural man, the psychic of St. Paul, to meet whose needs they were introduced, they are losing significance: the foundation has been cut away, and the superstructure falls. The only hope, it seems, is in the increase of spiritual as opposed to literal or external religion; Christianity must be propagated as a spirit, not taught as a creed. The Churches have been too quick, perhaps, to assume that this is impossible; they have forgotten "that one of the main approaches to the meaning of religion is through the nature of the soul of man."

More than any other body of Christians the Society of Friends has borne witness to this truth. Its limitations have emphasised this testimony. Originating as a protest against the hard formalism of a spiritually hard and formal age, its missionary period was shortlived; when the Spirit breathed over the dead bones of Christendom the uniqueness of the Quaker position disappeared. The Society survived as a shelter for certain interior souls of sensitive fibre, and as a reminder to the Church and the world at large of that which is the essential thing in religion, the kingdom of God within. In England this standpoint was represented by the late Miss Caroline E. Stephen, whose "Quaker Strongholds" and "Light Arising" struck a note that went home to many; in America it has no abler spokesman than the author of "Studies in Mystical Religion."

By mysticism he understands "the type of religion which puts the emphasis on immediate awareness of relation with God, on direct and intimate consciousness of the Divine Presence. It is religion in its most acute, intense, and living stage." The mystic, in other words, conceives religion not as a Church, a creed, or a rite, but as experience. He is "a thorough-going empiricist"; he takes his religion at first hand. Only so does it deserve the name of religion. Experience must be experienced; like any other vital act, from thought to digestion, it cannot be done for us; it must be our own. From another point of view, mysticism is "a protest in favor of the entire personality. It says that men can experience, and live, and feel, and do much more than they can formulate." Here it is opposed to rationalism; it seeks for truth, not with one specialised faculty, but with the whole man. That its connection with abnormal states of consciousness is non-essential cannot be too strongly emphasised. Such states are exceptional and open to misconstruction. The mystical faculty, though it varies in degree, is universal. "Something of this sort is familiar to the sanest and most matter-of-fact person among us"—and normal—it is only the sophist who does not recognise that man is more than a brain. This recognition, so far from being a denial, is a vindication of the function of the understanding in life and knowledge. "The intellectual abstractive element," says Baron von Hügel, "is, if neither minimised in the life of the soul, nor allowed to be its sole element or its last, a sobering, purifying, mortifying, vivifying bath and fire."

An individual experience is valid only for its subject: to be universally valid it, too, must be universal. In its rudimentary form the experience that lies at the root of mysticism is so: it may be misread, the analysis of consciousness may be faulty, but it is there. And, if it be objected that this is not conclusive, that our nature may be in a conspiracy to deceive us, the answer is that we cannot get outside it; truth comes, and must come, to us more humano, in human sort. And "the universe backs the experiment. Such experiences minister to life, construct personality, and conduce to the increased power of the race." If this be pragmatism, we need not quarrel with the name As Mr. Jones puts it, with studied moderation:—

> "While these inward mystical experiences cannot be pushed to the extreme of being turned into compelling ontological proofs, they nevertheless do afford a very weighty ground for believing that there is a More of Consciousness continuous with our own—a co-consciousness with which our own is bound up, and that constructive influences do come into us from beyond ourselves. We must not take fright at the word auto-suggestion. It is only a word, a phrase, which explains nothing. We have not eliminated God when we conclude, as we must do, that the physical universe has evolved. 'Evolution' is only a fresh word for describing the method of making a universe. And when we have named the great spiritual crises which carry men up to the new levels of life and power and service, 'auto-suggestive experiences,' we have only substituted one word for another. We called them 'new births'; we call them 'auto-suggestions.' The fact remains on our hands, and the fact is a momentous one."

The subjective element in consciousness even of this sort is beyond question. There are no "pure experiences." Omne receptum secundum modum recipientis recipitu is a sound axiom; the liquid takes shape from the vase. Hence theologians distinguish private from public revelations; the former, they argue, are valid only for the recipient. And the Divine Light never descends unclothed. Where the medieval Christian saw in ecstasy the Host or the Virgin, the believer of to-day sees, with St. Paul, the Saviour; the Sufi, perhaps, will see the Prophet; the Buddhist, Buddha; the accent falls on the substance not the form.

> "It is this conformation of mysticism to the type of religion out of which it springs, and the fact that it is always embedded in the life of a social group that gives it its sanity and safeguard from vagaries and caprices. Religion and morality are the consummate gains of the travail of the ages, and no person can cut loose from the spiritual group-life in which he is rooted without serious loss. To sever one's roots in history and in the slowly-gathered content of religious faith, 'to build all inward,' and to have no light but what comes 'pure' by the inward way, is to suffer shrinkage and to run the tremendous risk of ending in moral and spiritual bankruptcy. The religion of first-hand experience is not a substitute for Christianity; it is Christianity alive and vocal in personal experience and in individual love."

Never in the most legal age was this free spirit wholly absent from Christendom; its fire glowed under its embers; a touch, and it kindled into flame. Mr. Jones traces it in a series of historical studies from the Montanist prophets to the seventeenth century precursors of Quakerism; the chapters on the Church Fathers, on John the Scot, and on St. Francis in particular being models of scholarly and sympathetic treatment. The reader who comes fresh to the subject will notice that mysticism is older than Christianity, its historical development in the Church being to a great extent an inheritance from later Greek philosophy. Its roots lie, indeed, in no external teaching, but in the inner manifestation of God in the heart. We can no more get away from it than from our shadows. Unseen, unheard, "the Hound of Heaven" pursues us; we are haunted by the divine. The very men who did most to fasten the bondage of the letter upon religion—Tertullian, Athanasius, Augustine—break forth into the song of the Spirit: there were two selves in them lying side by side unreconciled. Nor is this all: the hardiest paradox of the New Theology may be paralleled in medieval mystics such as Eckhart and Henry Suso; the continuity of the larger, more spiritual teaching is beyond doubt.

The bearing of this on modern problems is obvious. The Church of to-day is no longer in the upper chamber: like that of the post-Apostolic age, it has come down into an unconverted or half-converted world—a world of men whose mouths must be held with bit and bridle; for whom law and formula are necessary—and this in a time when law and formula have broken down. Nor can their rehabilitation in their original form be looked for; the past enters into the future, but as past does not return. It is possible to cut the Gordian knot by simple acquiescence in their loss. To do this, however, means a breach with the past of Christendom, the adoption, if not of an individual, at least of a sectarian standpoint, and the abandonment of the worldwide mission of the Christian Church. To the older Churches this way is not open: and what seems their weakness may in the long run be an element of strength. Short cuts are to be distrusted: the premature Monism of the mystics (to take an example to the point) was a hindrance to the development of the idea which it was an attempt to represent. Monism is the goal: but the intermediate steps must be taken; the time of ultimates is not yet. So with the fabric of historical Christianity. It is of time, not of eternity; but the work that lies before the Church of to-day is to spiritualise it, to give it significance and life. Here the Mystics are our teachers; they assure us of the need, the possibility, and the fruitfulness of the work. "There is an interior freedom which may grow side by side with an allegiance fostered by birth and custom, by prejudice and piety." This may and should be ours; it is the secret of sane and ordered progress in Church and State.

* "Studies in Mystical Religion." By Rufus M. Jones, M.A., D.Litt. Haverford College, U.S.A. Macmillan. 12s. net.

CAUSES OF DEFEAT.*

It is in keeping with the irony of Kuropatkin's fate that his name should be most prominently connected with the overwhelming defeats of the Russian armies in Manchuria. Out of the nineteen months of the war he was in supreme command for only four and a half—from the end of October, 1904, to the middle of March, 1905. At the beginning of the campaign he had to submit his judgment to the disastrous counsels of Alexeieff; at the end he was superseded by Linievitch, whom he seems to have found no difficulty in serving with honorable fidelity. Yet when we recall the disasters of that land campaign, we think at once of Kuropatkin as commander-in-chief, though in many of the most essential questions of strategy, such as the relief of Port Arthur, he was overborne by decisions he could neither approve nor set aside.

Equally ironic was his position in regard to the political and military aspects of war with Japan. He had made a careful study of Russia's relation to other countries. For five years before the campaign began he had been her Minister of War. He had visited Japan in the previous summer and seen her energy and perfection of organisation with his own eyes. From history he had learnt the immense sacrifices that Russia had made in the last two centuries to extend her power to the Baltic, the Black Sea, the Caspian, the Caucasus, and over the Polish frontiers. He regarded as Russia's task for the coming century, first, a complete incorporation of Finland; secondly, an approach to the Indian Ocean, by way of the Persian Gulf; and, thirdly, an approach to the Pacific. But all these ends he hoped could be gained by peaceful means. Finland was to be reconciled by favors and improved conditions; there was to be an agreement with England about Persia, and no more talk of invading India, which he regarded as a useless and troublesome possession; and there was to be a similar agreement with Japan, founded on non-intervention in Korea.

In the meantime Russia was to devote all her attention to two necessities only; the advancement of her poor and uneducated population, and the security of her western frontier, where she lies fully exposed to attack from Germany and Austria. He showed that this was strategically the country's vulnerable point, chiefly owing to the large number of railways by which the German Powers can rapidly crowd troops upon the frontier, whereas the Russian railways are few and bad.

> "For the first years of the present century, therefore," he said in his final report as War Minister, "the attention of the War Department should be confined to strengthening our position on that side, and not diverted to aggressive enterprises elsewhere."

Russia was to remain strictly on the defensive, consolidating her strength and improving her government. He strongly advised the withdrawal from Manchuria, in accordance with the treaty with China. He supposed all was arranged for withdrawal when he went to the Far East in 1903. He had the Tsar's word for it that there was to be no war with Japan. He is not the last who has found the Tsar's word a broken reed to trust to.

When he returned all was changed. We cannot here re-examine the hideous scandal of Bezobrazoff and the Yalu timber concession in which the Imperial family was so deeply involved. Without Kuropatkin's knowledge, Alexeieff was appointed Viceroy, the troops were retained in Manchuria, and, in the hope of filling the pockets of a few Grand Dukes and Dowagers, the country was allowed to drift into one of the most murderous and disastrous wars in history. From the outset Kuropatkin was thus hampered by disbelief in the whole policy of the war. He was too much of a statesman to act as a mere soldier carrying on the policy of others without question. When war was unavoidable, he did his best, but his heart was never in the work, and probably he stood alone in estimating the risk at its true danger, though he admits that even he undervalued the moral strength of Japan.

And besides disbelief in his own cause, he was confronted in Manchuria by almost every phase of military weakness. The generals were divided in opinion, and so touchy of their dignity that they refused to carry out orders. The chaotic army depended for supplies and reinforcements on a single line of railway nearly 6,000 miles long. The men, accustomed to the immense Russian plains, could hardly move in hilly country. There was a perpetual waste of hands for transport, cooking, and guarding communications, so that a regiment was fortunate if sixty per cent. of its number carried rifles. The unhappy peasants who had been converted into soldiers were so stupid and uneducated that they could not be trusted to act alone, like the Japanese, but had to be massed together like sheep. Owing to the same want of education, the non-commissioned officers were useless and the cavalry constantly failed to bring correct intelligence. As uniforms are used for the police and all manner of civilian officials in Russia, they inspire no respect, and the soldiers themselves are disgusted by being employed in putting down civilian disorders and having to shoot their relatives and fellow-citizens. The Press correspondents spread discouragement by remaining in the rear and accusing officers at the front of mistakes of which they knew nothing. Finally, there was at Harbin the usual base for debauchery where officers who preferred drink, cards, or women to the hardships of a campaign could find the sort of thing they liked. Harbin was the Mount Nelson of the war.

In spite of all this, Kuropatkin maintains throughout the book that, if only the Treaty of Portsmouth had not been concluded, Russia would have come out victorious in the end. He points to many historic parallels—to the wars with Charles XII., Napoleon, the Turks, and others—to prove that Russia has a way of winning after many years of defeat. As he expresses it, Russia was unable to defeat Japan, "in the time allotted for the war." Just when the allotted time was over, Kuropatkin was ready to begin:—

> "By September, 1905," he writes, "we were at last able to collect an army 1,000,000 strong, ready in every respect to commence a second campaign, with troops and material of a nature to guarantee success. We had received machine-guns, howitzers, shells, small-arm ammunition, field railways, wireless telegraphy, and technical stores of all sorts, and the senior officers were mostly fresh. The War Department had, with the co-operation of other departments, successfully accomplished a most colossal task."

It is lamentable to be ready at the end instead of at the beginning. We can imagine with what feelings Kuropatkin heard of the peace just when victory was within his grasp. He thinks the Japanese were worn out. They had lost 135,000 dead by wounds and sickness. Far more than double that number had been put out of action, and the loss in officers was especially heavy. Japan was filling the ranks with old men and boys. Evidently she was nearly exhausted. But then, she had been ready at the beginning, and that makes such a difference.

* "The Russian Army and the Japanese War." By General Kuropatkin. Translated by Captain A. B. Lindsay. Edited by Major E. D. Swinton. John Murray. 2 vols. 28s. net. It is the last volume of the four that Kuropatkin wrote on the war, with part of the third added.

In our opinion the difference went far deeper than a question of readiness. Time after time Kuropatkin himself shows where the real difference lay. It lay in the contrast between a happy-hearted, honorably treated, freedom-loving people, who were fighting for the existence of a country to which their whole hearts were devoted, and a depressed and cruelly misused people, who knew nothing of freedom, had no pride in their country, and cared nothing for the causes of a war in which defeat or victory made no difference to themselves, provided they could only get home with life. Kuropatkin expresses the truth exactly:—

> "At that time," he says, "when the war was neither popular with, nor understood by, our nation, the whole manhood of Japan was responding with unanimous enthusiasm to the call to arms. There were instances of mothers committing suicide when their sons were rejected for the army on medical grounds. A call for volunteers for a forlorn hope produced hundreds ready to face certain death. While many officers and men had their funeral rites performed before leaving for the front, to show their intention of dying for their country, those who were taken prisoners at the commencement of operations committed suicide."

And again:—

> "The principal thing which gave success to the Japanese was their high moral tone. It made victory seem worth any sacrifice, and led directly to that determination to win which characterised all ranks, from Commander-in-Chief to private soldier. One thing is certain: if the whole army had not been saturated with patriotism, if it had not felt the friendly support of the nation behind it, if it had not realised the supreme importance of the struggle, the endeavours of its leaders would have been in vain."

Contrast with that spirit the indifference, the apathy, of the Russian troops with regard to a war waged for Grand Ducal timber concessions and the advantage of their other oppressors. Kuropatkin is continually speaking of their unwillingness to go to the front, their lack of military spirit, their readiness in listening to revolutionists who showed them the absurdity of the war. There was no enthusiasm, no "moral exaltation" in any ranks. As to the reservists, called up from their homes, they were always thinking of their families, and it was almost impossible to get them into action. Under the excuse of looking after the wounded, thousands fell to the rear. Brave as Russians are, nothing would induce them to risk their lives in a war of no interest to themselves. Beneath Kuropatkin's words we can read the truth in the minds of these peasants:—

> "They did not understand the reason for the war, and far from being urged on by their country to deeds of gallantry, they were fed with seditious proclamations, advising them to kill their officers instead of fighting. During the retreat from Mukden several units retired in disorder, and many men were met who had thrown away their rifles. One of these was heard by my staff to ask: 'Where is the road to Russia?' On being told he was a cowardly cur, he answered: 'Why should I have to fight? I've got six children to support.'"

That is a spirit we may hope to see grow among the working people of all nations. It is not the spirit of cowardly curs, but of reasonable beings who will absolutely refuse to go out killing or being killed unless they fully understand the reason and recognise their cause as one for which a man must needs give his life and all. Where that cause exists and is acclaimed by the whole nation, as it was in Japan, the readiness will be present too. But no amount of armament or technical preparation can compensate for the lack of that devotion which binds together all classes in a free nation maintaining the honor of their freedom to the utmost extremity of war.

---

LONDON BY THE SEA.*

Mr. Melville has done the public a service by this volume on Brighton. It is the best book we know on the subject, and tells within a moderate compass much that will enhance the enjoyment of a week-end in "London By the Sea." Mr. Melville, however, does unwisely in his disparagement of the Brighton of to-day. It is sheer affectation to describe present-day Brighton as "the cockneys' Paradise" and "the Mecca of the stockbroker and the chorus-girl." Why should not the cockney enjoy Brighton exactly as he did in the eighteenth century? It is not his fault that there are more of him. Why should we wax ecstatic over the Prince Regent and his vulgar friends, and sneer at the stock-broker or the chorus-girl?

It is interesting to follow Mr. Melrose in his story of the modest Brighthelmstone—a decayed fishing village of the seventeenth century. He tells of its sudden rise in the eighteenth century, when Dr. Richard Russell advocated sea-water for certain diseases, and sent visitors to the sea instead of to Bath or Tunbridge Wells. In those days there were but four hundred families in the place. Defoe was the first writer of importance to visit it, and Doctor Johnson appeared there in 1769. Ten years later came Fanny Burney. Gibbon also was among the visitors in these days, but it was Prince George who made Brighton an important watering-place, who wasted money in abundance upon his Palace—the Pavilion—the architectural infamy of which was severely abused by writers so opposite in their dispositions as Cobbett and Sir Walter Scott. Mr. Melville quotes Sidney Smith, who said, in reference to the countless small domes of the Pavilion, that "one would think St. Paul's Cathedral had come to Brighton and pupped." We have a very good account of Brighton under the Regency, when George was there with Mrs. Fitzherbert and many less worthy friends, so loud, so noisy, and so ill-bred, that one wonders that our author can think for a moment that the Brighton of that day was really preferable to the Brighton of this. Mr. Melville tells the story from Creevy, of Sheridan meeting Warren Hastings at the Pavilion. Creevey declares that he heard Sheridan assure the great proconsul that "any part he had taken against him was purely political, and that no one had a greater respect for him than himself." Hastings, we are told, listened courteously, and then remarked drily, that "it would be a great consolation to him in his declining days if Mr. Sheridan would make that sentence more public," whereupon, Creevey adds, Sheridan retreated nonplussed. Mr. Melville ought to know his eighteenth century better than to serve up this calumny once again. Whatever be Sheridan's faults, he was no toady. He never lacked moral courage, and when Creevey suggested this stultification of one of the most brilliant passages in Sheridan's life, Creevey obviously lied. Incidentally, we are reminded that Charles and Mary Lamb spent some quiet days in Brighton in 1817. There is a good chapter upon the Brighton Road. Public vehicles to the number of sixty, in 1811—thirty going each way—and countless private vehicles, were ever on the way. The glories of that road were suddenly terminated by the arrival of the railway in 1843, to be revived by the coming of the motor car in the opening years of the present century.

Brighton had grown so strong in the days of George the Fourth that the neglect of later monarchs affected it but little. Queen Victoria preferred the Isle of Wight. But Brighton grew. It was a favorite, though not a first favorite, with Charles Dickens, who placed more than one of his scenes there. Thackeray, we know, sang its praises more than once, and declared that "a day at Brighton was the best of doctors." He wrote one of the parts of "Vanity Fair" at "The Old Ship" Inn, and he borrowed the name of his wicked nobleman from the Steyne at Brighton. Altogether, we have found considerable pleasure in Mr. Melville's volume, not so much for anything new that it contains, as in the fact that it recalls so many interesting memories.

* "Brighton: Its History, Its Follies, and Its Fashions." By Lewis Melville. With portraits, caricatures, views, &c. Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d.

---

UNCLE GREGORY.*

In "Uncle Gregory" Mr. Sandeman has worked out with fresh and frank cleverness an idea that Mr. Henry James would have spun into a web of disconcerting threads and endless implications. The narrator, Robin Rowley, an attaché at Petersburgh, is summoned back to England to confer with his cousins, Dick and Vera French, on the administration of the Rowley Trust. Uncle Gregory, a colossal figure in his day, has left to his hapless relatives the staggering duty of carrying out the fulfilment of his immense social and philanthropic schemes and the whole range of his multifarious public activities. The spirit of Rowleyism stands for the Victorian Age, and the sum of money set apart for the purposes of the Rowley Trust—for all the philanthropic, educational, and scientific institutions and endowments, for the testator's half-hatched social projects, and for further schemes of the same nature—is enormous. The late Gregory Rowley, a director of a great banking house, railway magnate, and financialist, was extraordinarily able, strong-willed, and efficient from his youth, a leading character in public life, and the possessor of a "big personality; morally as well as physically a man of enormous mass and momentum." But, above all this, he was "a supremely forcible and consistent example of moral principle. Before everything and beyond everything else he was good. He proclaimed good, and did good, and enforced good, and endowed good, everywhere and continually. And not only is the responsibility of the Rowley Trust left on the aching shoulders of his relatives, but they are also empowered to construct a complete Life out of his prodigious correspondence, his diaries and manuscripts, and his many publications, and they are also directed to carry on the Manor and the Museum with all their activities, traditions, and associations." The two central projects of the Trust are, first, the promotion of research, and, secondly, the foundation and endowment of a new denomination! The trustees by the will are given a free hand in the execution of these philanthropic projects, and the whole neighborhood, including the town, the villages within a few miles radius of the Manor, and the Model Institute, are to be kept, as formerly, under the spell of the late Uncle Gregory's superhuman will and contagious moral optimism. But the question for Robin Rowley, as he speculates on the incredible life work of his philanthropic relative is: Was there ever a real Uncle Gregory at all? What was he—as a private man?

* "Uncle Gregory." By G. Sandeman. Heinemann. 6s.

> "It is not chiefly their own fault that their philanthropy leads them away from the love of man, and their philosophy leads them away from wisdom, and their religion away from every Christian virtue, and their politics away from the welfare of their country. It was something of this kind that made it so difficult to deal with Uncle Gregory. He was genuine all through, but it seemed impossible to make a picture that should be lovable. There seemed to be no reserve, no mystery, no twilight about him, so extravagantly had he expressed himself in word and deed; so voluminous, precise, and elaborate was his exterior. It would seem as though a photograph, with all its crude detail, would show him more truly than a picture could do; often, for a moment, one came to the conclusion that there was no real Uncle Gregory at all.
>
> "But then one would swing round immediately to the opposite conclusion, that it was impossible to imagine anyone being really just what Mr. Rowley was publicly. It was inconceivable that he did not think and feel, more and otherwise, than as he spoke and acted. No one—I found myself saying it again and again—no one could possibly be such an ass. I thought of his speeches, for instance, when he went around opening his Mechanics' Institutes, and his new wings to hospitals, and his university class-rooms and laboratories, and when he was receiving the freedom of cities; I thought of his books and pamphlets on duty and public spirit and thrift and progress, and the responsibilities of wealth, and the marvellous instincts of the little bees; and concluded that it was simply inconceivable that anyone could actually and inwardly live among these lamentable platitudes and fallacies. These publicities surely could not reach all the way down. Somewhere, below the Philanthropist and the Thinker, and the Statesman, with all their absurd provincialism and wrong-headedness, there must surely be a real Uncle Gregory. . . .
>
> "See how queer the characteristic Victorian conception is to us; how absolute as the noon it was to them! He lived all his life (only think what it must have felt like!) actually laying stone after stone of the enduring walls of a kind of New Jerusalem; he never dreamed, none of them dreamed, that their masonry was not fundamental, sempiternal. He lived in a wild confusion of the wild ideas of the English Enlightenment; he lived in the immediate expectation of universal peace, comfort and happiness, of a golden millenary age that was to come about through the extension of the franchise, compulsory education, free trade, improved drainage, and especially through unlimited competition. Progress, Thrift, Self-Help, Invention, Science, the Universal Diffusion of Knowledge—these were his watchwords; on these he composed innumerable pamphlets; to these he dedicated innumerable Mechanics' Institutes as fast as he could found them. For nearly half a century he served these ideals as a Whig Member of Parliament, and once even held minor office for a few months. He was England's most uncompromising apostle of progress—progress to a consummation supposed to be obtainable; nay, it was supposed to be just at hand. What a dream it all was!"

The narrator, Robin Rowley, who represents the new generation's reaction against Uncle Gregory and his works, has been appointed, in the will, as a kind of informal referee, or supreme adviser, to the Trust. And when he meets Jack French and Cousin Vera, who "had been reared in the Manor from infancy for a virginal minister of the cult; Aunt Josephine, and others long dead, had taught her baby fingers to trim the sacred lamp," he advises them solemnly that the only possible solution is "to chuck the whole game." "Don't let the old man devastate your whole life. Year after year you will both be bound up more and more inextricably with his preposterous trusts. You will be poisoned more and more by his damnable way of thinking; you will be burdened more and more by his enormous memory. . . . Otherwise you will only be his clerks to the end of time." And, to his unprejudiced eye, Jack French, "a sportsman and a gentleman," shows a great change for the worse in his appearance, after only six months of shouldering the Trust. Instead of his old fresh and confident air, he now seems worn, harassed, and depressed. Vera, too, in place of the old charming vivacity, seems "a little wan and pinched, a trifle hard, metallic, voluble, and noisy. . . . She had been occupying herself with ideas outside of the range of her actual, vital experience; and that is for woman or for man, for young or for old, mere poison." And the domestic situation is, indeed, highly complicated. Vera appears to be living up to the Rowley Trust "for the sake of Jack's notion of her piety and her fidelity, just as he seemed to be living up to him for the sake of her supposed interest in the old man, and yet both of them held him in a deep abomination, and neither could ever say so." Uncle Gregory is buried, but the system and the set of principles he is identified with—"I always aim, I always have aimed, at the Highest and Best"—permeate, not merely the Manor, but the whole neighborhood. The new statue of the philanthropist in the great hall, astoundingly like him in the flesh, "with the broad, unlined, placid brow; the large bony face; the shaven upper lip firmly pressed on the lower in a perfectly straight line," is "a thing from which you couldn't turn your eyes." And Higgins, the old butler, sums up the paralysing effect on the nerves of this atmosphere of "exasperating Olympian benevolence," by his remark, "It's a fine statue, very commanding; suits the 'all nicely. If I may say so, Mr. Rowley, sir, it makes me feel as if he was here with us again, a-watchin' us and a-directin' of us more than ever." The deeper the narrator goes into the whole situation the less hope does he see for the luckless executors of the Trust. They have inherited a kingdom, and "every place, every hour, every occasion is saturated with a profound, intangible, organised, living something that was Uncle Gregory." And you can't bury a kingdom. You can only abdicate and run away, and Jack and Vera, hypnotised by the Trust, are like rabbits before the boa-constrictor.

In the second half of the novel, which solves, more or less, the fascinating secret of Uncle Gregory's personality, the author enters gaily into a subtle exposition of the effect the Trust has in destroying the confidence of the members of the Rowley family in one another. Aunt Josephine comes on the scene with her views of how the provisions of the Trust should not be carried out; Sir Roland Potter, F.R.S., D.C.L., "a great scientific swell, one of the old gentleman's great correspondents," contributes his private views, and the air grows electric when after Jack and Vera's quarrel, the narrator, Robin, learns that he has been from the beginning the great stumbling-block! that by his position of "general adviser and informal referee," he has been, to the other relatives, all along a kind of nightmare. Fresh shocks are administered when it turns out that as regards the Life of the deceased there are some things that ought never to be known. They might be easily misunderstood—for example, dear Gregory's business methods. He was in advance of his time! for, as Aunt Josephine puts it, "just after they had taken over our bank, it was only by paying an immense sum that Gregory prevailed on them not to prosecute." The involved personal relations of the Rowley family and the general atmosphere of tension and stress are capitally in-

Mr. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

KUROPATKIN'S SUPPRESSED MEMOIRS

ENTITLED

THE RUSSIAN ARMY AND THE JAPANESE WAR.
With Maps and Illustrations. 2 vols., demy 8vo. 28s. net.

". . . . We doubt if a more virile or sincere document was ever put before the public, and it says little for the official wisdom of General Kuropatkin's fellow-countrymen that such a record should have been suppressed in the land of its origin. In England, at any rate, the latent honesty and abundant good feeling of these measured criticisms will be valued at their proper worth."
—Daily Telegraph.

THE LIFE OF
MAJOR-GENERAL SIR JOHN ARDAGH.
By his Wife, SUSAN COUNTESS OF MALMESBURY (LADY ARDAGH). With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

THE BANCROFTS.
Recollections of Sixty Years. By Sir SQUIRE and LADY BANCROFT. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

SIX OXFORD THINKERS:
GIBBON, NEWMAN, FROUDE, CHURCH, MORLEY, PATER. By ALGERNON CECIL, M.A. (Oxon), of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

ESSAYS OF POETS AND POETRY.
Ancient and Modern. By T. HERBERT WARREN, Vice-Chancellor of Oxford and President of Magdelan. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

HORACE A. VACHELL'S NEW NOVEL.
AN IMPENDING SWORD.
By the Author of "Brothers," "The Hill." 2s. 6d. net.

NOW READY. CENTENARY NUMBER.
THE QUARTERLY REVIEW,
APRIL, 1909, 6s.

1. THE CENTENARY OF TENNYSON. By EMILE FAGUET, of the Académie Francaise.
2. THE CENTENARY OF DARWIN.
   I. EVOLUTION AND THE CHURCH.
   II. EVOLUTIONARY ETHICS. By Prof. SORLEY.
   III. PRAGMATISM: THE EVOLUTION OF TRUTH. By H. V. KNOX.
3. THE ESSENTIALS OF GREAT POETRY. By ALFRED AUSTIN, Poet Laureate.
4. THE REMAINS OF ANCIENT PAINTING. By H. STUART JONES. Illustrated.
5. OVID AND SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS. By SIDNEY LEE.
6. EARTHQUAKES AND THEIR CAUSES. By C. DAVISON, F.G.S.
7. A CENTURY OF ENGLISH MUSIC. By J. A. FULLER MAITLAND.
8. INNOCENT THE GREAT. By W. BARRY, D.D.
9. THE REFORM OF THE POOR-LAW.
10. THE MEANING OF MODERNISM. By Prof. INGE.
11. MR. LOWELL ON ENGLISH PARTY GOVERNMENT. By Prof. DICEY.
12. THE MEMOIRS OF MADAME DE BOIGNE. By P. F. WILLERT.
13. THE NEAR EASTERN QUESTION.
   I. AUSTRIA-HUNGARY. By A. R. COLQUHOUN.
   II. THE TURKISH EMPIRE. By G. F. ABBOTT.
14. LORD MORLEY AND INDIAN REFORM.
15. UNION IN SOUTH AFRICA.
16. THE CENTENARY OF THE "QUARTERLY REVIEW." Illustrated.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

The May BOOK MONTHLY is Now Ready. Sixpence Net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. What People are Saying and Doing about Books, with Pages of Portraits.
WOMAN'S WAYS. What She Likes and Dislikes in Books.—By Alex. J. Philip.
AN EXPOSURE METER. To Test the Quality of a Writer's Literary Ware.—By A. Clephan Palmer.
LOVE AND LETTERS. Books as Helps to the Courtship of the Carlyles.
"BAEDEKER," Guide, Philosopher, and Friend.—His Story.
A LONDON LETTER. About a Literary Pilgrim in the Scots Highlands.
LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.
THE GENERAL READER. Snap-shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.
NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.
BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of April.
THE PERIODICALS. Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London, E.C.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF LIBERTY

By E. F. B. FELL

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The aim of the book is to point out that the essence of Socialism consists in the complete mergence of the individual in the whole, and in the denial of the "a priori" or natural rights of the Person. Political right and wrong thus ceases to be based on the moral nature of the Person, and becomes a question of speculations as to the Good of the Whole. Thus viewed, it is held that Socialism exists in its essence in many forms.

"We find some interesting comments on prominent schools of political thought; there is much acute criticism of the controversies that have arisen over the Socialist's political ideal; and certain kinds or classes of Individualism are subjected to severe examination."—ATHENÆUM.

"This book should be read by all Christian Socialists, for the author bases his plea on the Christian doctrine of Personality; they will find in its pages much fresh and virile criticism of a growing opportunism and sentimentality in public affairs."
—ECONOMIC REVIEW.

"A really philosophic attempt to examine the moral and social theories implied in the Socialist movement. Mr. Fell has written a stimulating book on a difficult subject, and his theme is worked out carefully and well."—MORNING LEADER.

"Altogether, this book is one that thoughtful men will delight in reading."—DUNDEE COURIER.

"Mr. Fell deals with the questions at issue in an elaborate and careful manner, and the book is an interesting contribution to a subject of no little perplexity."—SCOTSMAN.

"This is an unpretentious book, comparatively small in compass but remarkably big in conception and character, for Mr. Fell, in sounding the depths of political ideas, reaches the heights of a transcendental political philosophy. It is undoubtedly a valuable contribution to the social and political literature of the day."
—LIVERPOOL COURIER.

"A brilliant, original, and suggestive book."
—BIRMINGHAM POST.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

2 New Volumes in the FABIAN SOCIALIST SERIES

The most Authoritative Library of Socialist Thought, by the Fabian Society.

No. 6. SOCIALISM AND NATIONAL MINIMUM.
By Mrs. SIDNEY WEBB, Miss HUTCHINS, and the Fabian Society.
6d. net, postage 1d., or ¼-cloth, gilt top, 1s. net, postage 2d.

No. 7. THE WASTAGE OF CHILD LIFE. By Dr. J. JOHNSTON.
6d. net, postage 1d., or ¼-cloth, gilt top, 1s. net, postage 2d.

Already issued—1. Socialism and Religion; 2. Socialism and Agriculture; 3. Socialism and Individualism; 4. The Basis and Policy of Socialism; 5. The Commonsense of Municipal Trading. 6d. and 1s. each net, postages 1d. and 2d. each.

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, Fleet Street, E.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

6/- FOR 2/- POST FREE

2,800 "VICTORIAN" EDITION OF THE
TEACHERS' PRAYER BOOK:
Being the Book of Common Prayer, with Introductions, Analysis, Notes, and a Commentary upon the Psalter, By the Right Rev. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., D.C.L., and a Glossary by the Rev. A. L. MAYHEW, M.A. 16mo, Bourgeois, Large Type Edition. Cloth boards, red edges, 6s. for 2s.; 6 for 10s. 9d.
THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'
BOOKSELLERS.
NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER,"

will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

dicated; though we cannot help complaining of the smart trick the author plays on us when the narrator "vacillates," shifts his critical attitude, and seems to be turning into a chip of the old block. The issues are growing unconscionably confused when everything is, providentially, straightened out by a fire! Aunt Josephine has been pottering round, in the family's absence, and the fire which she "discovers" reduces the Manor, the Museum, the materials for the Life, and even the provisions of the Rowley Trust to ashes! The quiet family lawyer, Mr. Morton, does the rest, and whittles down the will to a tithe of its former proportions. "We must look at the Trust broadly, and interpret it, I am of opinion, with a great deal of latitude. I really don't think we are bound to carry out its provisions as they stand . . . . but be content with some foundation or endowment to bear Mr. Rowley's name in perpetuity." Jack and Vera are thus saved. And while everyone returns to sanity the station-master delivers the verdict of posterity on Uncle Gregory: "'E was a good man, was the late gentleman, sir; but there's no denying 'e was a miasma on the neighborhood."

Apart from the brilliance and subtlety of the novel, in the figure of Uncle Gregory Mr. Sandeman has constructed a telling satire on the ethical outlook of the Victorian age. He might, indeed, have gone deeper had he shown us in a flash that it was the bankruptcy of the old system and the chaos of the new that brought Uncle Gregory "a-watchin' and a-directin' of us," with his watch-words of Progress, Thrift, Self-Help, Invention, Science, and the Universal Diffusion of Knowledge, to birth. The insight and wit shown, however, are admirable, and one lays down the novel with the feeling that the generation of the fathers must always seem remote and distasteful to the sons, for each generation is like a crop which weakens or exhausts the soil, for the time being, of certain of its chemical constituents.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE first of two volumes on "The National Gallery" (T. C. & E. C. Jack, 10s. 6d. net), deals with the Italian, Flemish, and German schools represented in the collection, and includes 52 plates in color. The latter, considered from the purely technical standpoint, are certainly one of the finest achievements in art reproduction that have appeared in recent years; they are, furthermore, distinguished by careful and catholic selection, and are calculated to give an excellent idea of the artistic wealth the Gallery contains. The color plates issued by the Arundel Society and by commercial firms of more recent origin have set a high standard for work of this kind, and it is greatly to the credit of the present publishers that, within the limits of a half-guinea volume, they have produced something comparable with the best. The joint authors of the text are Messrs. P. G. Konody, M. W. Brockwell, and F. W. Lippmann. It consists of a popular account, not merely of the pictures and whence they were acquired, but of the schools they represent. Margaritone's "Virgin and Child, with Lives of the Saints," the earliest Italian picture we can boast, is the starting-point for a painstaking survey of Italian and Venetian art, from the beginning of the thirteenth century to the end of the sixteenth. Since the Italian schools are the most adequately represented of any in the Gallery, it is not surprising that quite three-quarters of this volume are devoted to their discussion. Regarding matters of authenticity, and so forth, there has been, and still is, so much debate and dispute among modern critics that it is very difficult to steer a perfectly safe course between the conflicting opinions. Such questions, for instance, as what part to ascribe to Antonio Pollaiuolo and what to his brother Piero in the painting of their joint work, the "St. Sebastian," or whether our version of Leonardo's "Virgin of the Rocks" is as genuine as that in the Louvre, depend so much upon personal vision and feeling, that, given the requisite powers of discrimination, one critic's judgment is as good as another's. All, therefore, that the writer of a concise history can do, is to avoid juggling with facts, or stating opinions as facts; and this principle has been observed in the guarded and well-constructed account before us. When we come to the Flemish and German schools, we are reminded, directly and incidentally, of what the National Gallery is deficient in. We have not a single work belonging to the Early Dutch School, though we are so rich in paintings of Dutch seventeenth-century masters; and the great French masters of the corresponding period, who derived so much from the Flemish example, are similarly unrepresented. In regard to German art, too, it was not until after the middle of the last century that this was thought worthy of attention by the authorities, the result being that to-day, though we can pride ourselves on one masterpiece of Holbein's, the examples of German painting in our possession are, on the whole, meagre and unsatisfactory. This volume is a finely planned piece of book-making, and if its successor reaches the same standard of excellence, the complete work, dealing as it does with an institution of which we have every right to be proud, will occupy an important place in our popular literature of art.

* * *

THERE is much that is offensive and more that is foolish in Dr. Leo Sera's "On the Tracks of Life" (Lane, 7s. 6d. net) which Mr. J. M. Kennedy has translated from the Italian, and for which Dr. Oscar Levy has written an unconsciously amusing introduction. The purport of the book may be judged from its sub-title, "The Immorality of Morality," and though both Dr. Sera and Dr. Levy endeavor to appear as terrible persons belonging to "a new Jesuitical Order" formed of "a superior class of men" drawn from all countries, they are unlikely to make even the most ingenuous reader's flesh creep. We are given nothing more than the stock arguments against accepted moral standards which are familiar to readers of Nietzsche. Indeed the work is little better than an amalgam of the more extravagant views of Nietzsche and Stendhal, especially on the relations of the sexes, together with some crude philosophising. Dr. Sera is pedantic and dull, qualities alien from the true Nietzschean spirit. Hegel said that the penalty which a great man inflicts upon the world is to force it to explain him. Dr. Sera's book belongs to the class which, in attempting to explain a great man, go a long way towards making him appear ridiculous. Nietzsche has already suffered greatly at the hands of his less intelligent admirers, and we would remind Dr. Sera and Dr. Levy of Zarathustra's remark about certain writers, "A sensation of voluptuousness and a sensation of tedium: these have as yet been their best contemplation."

* * *

"PASSING English of the Victorian Era: A Dictionary of Heterodox English, Slang, and Phrase," by Mr. J. Redding Ware (Routledge, 7s. 6d.), contains a collection of words and phrases that have either drifted out of use since 1870, or have not yet attained to the dignity of mention in dictionaries of the English language proper. Many locutions of the former sort become obscure very soon after their appearance, and Mr. Ware's book gives a flood of diverse information. Dipping into it at random, we find such entries as, "Chump: Equivalent to Juggins. A youth (as a rule) who is in any way cheated of his money—especially by the so-called gentler sex." The preceding entry has explained the use and derivation of "chump" meaning the head. The book is one of some philological importance, though intended to amuse rather than to instruct. The author begins his preface by hoping that "there are errors on every page," and ends with a desire that "he may be found amusing, if neither erudite nor useful." He succeeds in the latter wish, while as to the former, we may note at least one error. We have never seen the word "Carlylese" used as equivalent to "benevolent despotism; Tory democracy." It is employed to describe a style and diction like Carlyle's.

* * *

WE remember Mrs. Rodolph Stawell's "Motor Tours in Wales" as a book that combined a good deal of useful information to motorists with a fair amount of literary imagination. The same authoress has now produced a volume, entitled "Motor Tours in Yorkshire" (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s. net), which has very much the same qualities. The itinerary embraces a zig-zag route from Skipton to Middleton, including such places of interest in the West Riding as Bolton, Fountains, and Jervaulx; the North-East coast is explored from Yarm to Filey; and three sides of the East Riding are covered by the journey from Scarborough

NOW READY.

With Photogravure Portrait. Price 12s. Net.

MANSFIELD

COLLEGE ESSAYS

PRESENTED TO THE REV. ANDREW MARTIN FAIRBAIRN, D.D., ON THE OCCASION OF HIS SEVENTIETH BIRTHDAY. WITH A BIBLIOGRAPHY.

Contributed by:—

Rev. C. S. Horne, M.A.
Rev. W. B. Selbie, M.A.
Prof. J. V. Bartlet, M.A., D.D.
Prof. H. T. Andrews, B.A.
Prof. A. S. Peake, M.A., D.D.
Prof. G. B. Gray, D.D., D.Litt.
Rev. W. Reason, M.,
Prof. E. Anwyl, M.A.
Rev. Prin. A. E. Garvie, D.D.
Rev. D. MacFadyen, M.A.
Rev. G. W. Thatcher, M.A., B.D.
Rev. R. S. Franks, MA., B.Litt.
Rev. A. N. Rowland, M.A.
Prof. H. W. Robinson, M.A.
Prof. Thos. Rees, M.A.
Rev. F. Lenwood, M.A.
Rev. T. M. Watt, M.A.
Prof. A. Souter, M. D.Litt.
Rev. R. K. Evans, M.A.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, WARWICK SQ., LONDON, E.C.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
It costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

The Daily News

is now printed simultaneously in London and Manchester.

This means that Liberals all England over are able to get the representative Liberal organ every morning at the same time as their local daily.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

London Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.
Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)
Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.
A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2 COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.
Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

GLAISHER'S REMAINDER BOOK CATALOGUE
For December (No. 362)

Is NOW READY, and will be forwarded on application. It comprises a specially attractive selection of Publishers' Remainders, including many good bargains.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
Booksellers,
285, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING
Rowntree's

"Warms and Cheers"

Try it!—
"One taste is worth a chapter of talk."

to Helmsley, thence to York, Pontefract, Selby, Beverley, and Hull. The total number of places visited is too great to allow of detailed treatment of any one of them, but there are pleasant appreciations of York and Beverley, written in a fresh style, and the historical interest of the whole area is expounded persuasively enough. Perhaps the least satisfactory part of the book is that which deals with the coast towns and villages; these appear to have been done in a hurry and with a too great reliance on guide-book history. We notice, too, an error in nomenclature; the village of East Row, near Whitby, is referred to as "New Row." However, the photographic illustrations are of high quality throughout, and the text will not present any less attraction to the average motoring reader because it does not allow him to forget the motor.

* * *

In "Fair Women at Fontainebleau" (Nash, 15s. net), the writer who signs herself "Frank Hamel" has hit upon a good idea, though she hardly works it out with sufficient skill. There is a formidable list of authorities at the beginning which the author has probably read, but out of which she has not drawn either the charm that belonged to the Palace of Fontainebleau or the spirit of the times she treats. To describe the palace and to people it with the dead and gone beauties who, by right or by favor, reigned there, would not be an easy task, even if it hardly requires "the minuteness of a Dangeau or a De Luynes, the insight and imagination of a Bassompierre and a Saint-Simon, and as many words as are contained in their combined works." The table of contents will probably prevent many people from looking farther into the book, for the labels which "Frank Hamel" adds to the names of her heroines smack of the "Harmsworth Brand" rather than of serious biography. Lest the reader should fail to recognise Madame de Montespan and Madame de Maintenon, we find them labelled "Passion and Piety," while the Demoiselles de Nesle and Madame de Pompadour are alliteratively introduced as "Four Sisters and a Siren." The book itself is of the nature which these labels lead us to expect.

* * *

America sends us one of the best of nature chats in "Insect Stories," by Vernon L. Kellogg (Bell, 5s. net). It tells of how the Professor and Mary investigated the life-histories of many interesting creatures, a very good arrangement because it allows of rather more imagination than a professor alone could indulge in and gives science more readily assimilated than the Professor is wont to give his sophomores. Dragon-flies, ant-lions, locusts, and the inhabitants of a simple but effective observation bee-hive give up their delightful secrets and one of the best sections is that which raises admiration at the great variety of galls with which seemingly identical flies decorate the trees. It is a wonderfully well-designed and ably executed book, and we hope Professor Kellogg will give us others.

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning, April 23. | Price Friday morning, April 30. |
|---|---|---|
| Consols 2½ per cent. ... ... ... | 85 1/16 | ... 85 |
| French 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 97 | ... 97 |
| German 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 85 | ... 85 |
| Russian Fives ... ... ... ... | 100⅞ | ... 102 |
| Turkish Unified ... ... ... ... | 92¼ | ... 92½ |

Considering the nearness of the Budget and of the new taxation, markets have been remarkably firm all the week. I write before the City has had time to digest, or even to consider, Mr. Lloyd George's proposals, and I do not pretend to say what effect they are likely to have on prices; but on the eve of the Budget statement gilt-edged stocks rose, and, despite the grumblings and the jeremiads of City men, the general tone is cheerful. For this there are two main reasons—the victory of the Young Turks and the cheapness of money. The first need not be insisted on, but it is pleasant to find the Stock Exchange so anxious for the triumph of Liberal principles in Turkey. As to the second, cheap money, there seems to be no doubt that we are in for a spell of very low rates, and the present level of ½ to 1½ per cent. for loan money, and 1¼ per cent. for three months' bills, is quite likely to continue through the summer. The effect on the stock markets is unmistakable, and speculative sections especially are more animated than they have been for a month or more. Kaffirs are great favorites for the moment, and prices are firm all through the market, but perhaps the most striking rise of the week is in Mexican Railway stock, which has been extraordinarily buoyant. The small amount of the second preference stock and the uncertainty of its dividend both help to make it a great gambling counter, and in the last few days the bulls have been having it all their own way on the strength of a decrease in working expenses for March. Since last Friday the price has risen by 8 points and is now at 69½, a very sharp movement which may cause disappointment later on. Another curious movement is in London General ordinary, which, for the last three weeks, has been jumping up and down in the most erratic way. Three weeks ago it was dropping sharply till it fell to nearly 20; then it rose in seven days to 34½, and now it is down to about 32. Of course, the market in these days is a very narrow one, and not many sales are needed to cause a slump. It is impossible just yet to give any account of City opinion on the Budget. Probably it will not be very unpopular.

The New German and Prussian Loans.

The startling issue which is to take place in all the great cities of Germany—Berlin, Hamburg, Frankfurt, Munich, Cologne, Leipzig, &c.—of £16,000,000 for the Empire of Germany, and £24,000,000 for the kingdom of Prussia—should be an eye-opener to the deluded British public. After the huge borrowing of last year and the incessant talk of German Professors about financial reform the German Government has to make another enormous addition to the debt to pay its ordinary services, civil, military, and naval. Nor is this by any means the full year's borrowing for Germany, though the 24 millions will probably see Prussia through. There is a deficit in last year's estimates of no less than nine millions, and the gap between the Empire's expenditure and revenue for the coming year will be nearer thirty than twenty millions unless the Government curtails its expenditure or the Reichstag passes some of the proposed taxes. Italy has just issued a 3½ per cent. loan at 102. Yet Germany has to pay the same price for a 4 per cent. loan! German and Spanish Fours are now pretty much at the same figure. The situation is really most extraordinary; and financiers are beginning to wonder how much longer the German naval programme can be financed. Its acceleration is more likely to lead to ruin and bankruptcy than to threaten its neighbors. Germany is borrowing year by year more in time of peace than Great Britain found it necessary to borrow year by year during the Crimean war. Half the German Imperial loan and half the Prussian loan are 4 per cents. issued at 102 and irredeemable until 1918, while the other half will be 3½ per cents. at 95½. Thus by a single transaction an additional charge of about £1,600,000 is laid upon the present and future taxpayers of Germany and Prussia. The other States of Germany are also borrowing heavily, and the latest statistics of unemployment show that it is now worse than ever in Germany, whereas here in England things are gradually mending. Between 1880 and 1908 the German Imperial debt rose in consequence of deficits on ordinary and extraordinary expenditure from 13 to 212 millions sterling. It is hardly possible that this process can continue indefinitely without some severe crisis.

Lucellum.

The first appointments to professorships in the new Queen's University of Belfast will be made in the near future. Five chairs are to be filled, together with nine readerships or lectureships, including one in Celtic language and literature, the subject which has, of late, been so hotly debated in Ireland.

THE LEGAL
Insurance Company, LTD.

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell,
The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane,
The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Chairman - J. FIELD BEALE, Solicitor.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion.

Write for particulars. HENRY M. LOW, General Manager

THIS IS THE TIME OF YEAR WHEN

Liver troubles

ARE MORE PREVALENT.

If the Liver is weak, the change from Summer to Autumn, renders it incapable of performing its duties, and the result is, an accumulation of bile in the blood which causes depression, irritability, and may develop into Dropsy.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets

STRENGTHEN WHERE THEY RELIEVE

will quickly and positively cure all Liver disorders, When the valuable curative and tonic properties they contain, are absorbed into the system, the circulation carries them direct to the Liver, where they stimulate this organ to perform its duties naturally, and strengthen it to maintain health action. MERIT'S LIVERETS are prepared as prescribed by an eminent Physician, from purely vegetable ingredients. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists and Stores, or if unable to obtain, send direct to

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name "MERIT'S LIVERETS." and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Spurious imitations will not cure you.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£18 18s. NORWEGIAN and NORTH CAPE CRUISE.

£11 11s. NORWEGIAN FJORDS CRUISES.

Sailings:—June 26, July 17, July 31.

£18 18s. BALTIC CRUISE, August 14.

Full particulars from the Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, N.W.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY OF BELFAST.

THE Belfast Commissioners under the Irish Universities Act, 1908, will proceed at an early date to appoint Professorships in the following subjects:—

MODERN HISTORY.
ECONOMICS.
BOTANY.
FRENCH LANGUAGE AND ROMANCE PHILOLOGY.
JURISPRUDENCE AND ROMAN LAW.

and to Readerships or Lectureships in the following subjects:—

ARCHÆOLOGY AND ANCIENT HISTORY.
ENGLISH LANGUAGE.
CELTIC LANGUAGES AND LITERATURE.
MORAL PHILOSOPHY AND HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY.
LOGIC AND SCHOLASTIC PHILOSOPHY.
PHYSICS.
ORGANIC CHEMISTRY.
BIO-CHEMISTRY.
GEOLOGY AND MINERALOGY.

Information as to salary and other terms of these appointments may be obtained from

ARTHUR JAFFE,
Secretary to the Commissioners.

(N.B. Canvassing of individual Commissioners will be a disqualification).

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

CRAIGMOUNT, EDINBURGH.

Private Boarding and Day School for Girls.

THE Principals, the Misses Gossip, are assisted by highly-qualified residents, English and Foreign Mistresses and visiting Professors. The aim of the school is a sound education, special attention being given to the study of English Literature, Modern Languages, and Music. The Gymnasium is fitted with Swedish apparatus and the school has its own Swimming Bath. The situation of the school is bracing and very healthy, and the grounds give abundant scope for games. Prospectus on application to the Principals.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Moulton and other Scholarships in July.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,

STAFFORDSHIRE.

Splendid record in Health, Work, and Games.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

(The Royal Naval School.)

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large Playing-fields, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath; Chemical and Physical Laboratories; Cadet Corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarships Hertford and Merton College; Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c.
NEXT TERM, April 28th. Apply Headmaster: Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauser, Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.

Six Scholarships (£60 and under) will be offered on June 16th. Examination at Giggleswick, in London, or at Preparatory Schools. Particulars from Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle Yorkshire.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

MALVERN COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATIONS, JUNE 1st 2nd, and 3rd, one of £37, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Boys) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in Examination. Council Nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well but fail to obtain a Scholarship.—For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

MILL HILL SCHOOL, LONDON, N.W.

The NEXT EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS will be held on JULY 8th, and the two following days. Applications should be made at once to the Bursar.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Will be Ready Shortly, and will be sent free, on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,

Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN." Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line
52 ,, ... ... 6d. ,,

ENGLISH REVIEW

MAY NUMBER NOW READY.

No. VI. CONTENTS. PRICE 2s. 6d.

Modern Poetry—

"ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE"

T. STURGE MOORE

DOLLIE RADFORD OSMAN EDWARDS

NORMAN DOUGLAS - The Sirens

FYODOR DOSTOËVSKY An Honest Thief

JOSEPH CONRAD - Some Reminiscences (part ii—vi)

W. H. HUDSON - - Goldfinches at Ryme Intrinsica

P. WYNDHAM LEWIS The "Pole"

PERCEVAL GIBBON - Afrikander Memories

BARON IGNATZ VON ASCHENDROF - The Nature of a Crime (ii)

GERTRUDE BONE - An Experience

STEPHEN REYNOLDS The Holy Mountain (ii)

CRITICAL ATTITUDES.

LESSER STATES AND GREAT NATIONS.

THE DRAMA OF THE MONTH.

TURKEY. By H. W. N. Brailsford.

THE RISE OF THE PAN-POLISH PARTY. By G. W.

GREECE. By W. H. B. Lynch.

And an Article by

PRESIDENT TAFT

ENTITLED—

"An Answer to the Panama Canal Critics."

DUCKWORTH & CO., HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

ENGLISH REVIEW

A MOST FASCINATING WORK—BETTER THAN FICTION.

ROYAL LOVERS AND MISTRESSES

The Romance of Crowned and Uncrowned Kings and Queens of Europe.

By Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT.

Author of "The Curse of the Romanoffs," &c. Illustrated, demy 8vo, cloth, 16s. net.

Though Not a Novel—though Not a Romance—

THE BARONESS ORCZY'S New Book

THE OLD MAN IN THE CORNER

is NOT Short Stories.

THE BARONESS ORCZY'S New Book

THE OLD MAN IN THE CORNER

IS ABSOLUTELY

SOMETHING NEW

IN DETECTIVE FICTION.

6s. THIRD LARGE EDITION NOW READY. 6s.

"A REALLY CHARMING STORY" By the Author of "The Loafer," "A Suburban Scandal," &c.

ONLY APRIL

ONLY APRIL

6s. By GURNER GILLMAN. 6s.

A PLEASING HISTORICAL ROMANCE

By a New Writer.

BEAUTY RETIRE

6s. By DORA MELLOR. 6s.

A BRILLIANT WORK

By the Author of "Vincenzo's Vendetta."

DELUSION

6s. By JOSEPH PRAGUE. 6s.

OTHER FICTION STILL IN DEMAND.

| | |
|---|---|
| HENRY OF NAVARRE (6th Edition) | May Wynne. |
| THE SIN OF THE DUCHESS ... | Houghton Townley. |
| OUT OF THE SHADOWS ... ... | Capt. Henry Curties. |
| LITTLE FRANCE... ... ... ... | Cyrus Brady. |
| UNDERGROUND ... ... ... ... | John K. Leys. |
| BRANDED ... ... ... ... ... | Gerald Biss. |
| A SON OF DESOLATION ... ... | M. Y. Halidom. |

ALL AT SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

GREENING AND CO., LTD., 91, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 6.] SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1½d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

Diary of the Week ... ... 181

Politics and Affairs:—
The Attack on the Budget ... 184
Some Principles of the Budget 185
The Alternative to the Budget 186
The New Order in Egypt ... 187

Life and Letters:—
To the Memory of Thomas Paine ... ... ... ... 189
In Retreat ... ... ... ... 190
Poetic Diction in England ... 191

Short Studies:—
Robina and Marriage. By Jerome K. Jerome ... ... 192

Solitary Confinement. An open Letter to the Home Secretary, II. By John Galsworthy ... ... ... ... 194

The Drama:—
The "Harmsworth Brand" again. By H. W. M. ... ... 195

Art:—
Pictures at the Royal Academy 196

Letters from Abroad:—
The End of the Bülow Bloc? By Ed. Bernstein ... ... 198

Communications:—
The Passing of the Six-shilling Back. By a Literary Agent 199

Letters to the Editor.—
"The Mills of God." By Professor L. T. Hobhouse... ... 200
M. Loisy's Inaugural Lecture. By R. E. D. ... ... ... 200
Concerning our Frivolous Stage. By William Poel ... ... 201

PAGE

A Question of Ideals. By Immo S. Allen ... ... ... ... 201
The Small Holdings Act. By Montague Fordham ... ... 201
"The Defects of the Liberal Propaganda." By W. R. Snow 202
Deer and the Cruelty to Animals Act. By G. G. Greenwood, M.P. ... ... ... 202
The Anglican Church and Nonconformists. By Charles J. Magrath ... ... ... 202
Adult Suffrage. By B. Blagg... 202

Poetry:—
The Town without a Market. James Elroy Flecker ... ... 204

Reviews:—
The Socialised Millionaire ... 204
Art and Sport ... ... ... 206
A First-hand Novel ... ... 208

Books in Brief:—
The Nineteenth Century and After ... ... ... ... 210
The Contemporary Review ... 210
My Restless Life ... ... ... 212

The Week in the City. By Lucellum ... ... ... ... 212

Supplement:—
The Ancient Greek Historians. By Professor Gilbert Murray 219
Spanish Literature. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham ... 220
The Murder of Sir Thomas Overbury... ... ... ... 221
Quidquid agunt homines ... 222
A "Friend" of Rossetti ... ... 224
A Budget of Novels ... ... 224

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Budget has already become not only the chief topic of debate and party battle, but almost the only political subject. On the whole its prospects have a thoroughly healthy appearance. The Labor Party is united and enthusiastic in support. No dissent of any consequence is revealed in the Ministerial ranks, some very rich men, like Sir John Brunner and Mr. Lever, being firmest in their friendliness. On the other hand some of the great interests affected, like the brewers and the distillers, have turned from preachments of ruin to practical devices not only for getting out of their taxes but for squeezing handsome profits from them. Agriculture, which gains markedly under the Budget, is favorable, and a Tory Chamber of Agriculture has declined to pass a censuring resolution. Tory criticism generally divides itself between complaints of the crushing burdens on the rich and attempts to show that they will fall on the poor. It concentrates mainly on the taxation of land and licences. The real concern is the almost insuperable obstacle to a Protectionist tariff which the Chancellor's scheme of developing revenue sets up. More dangerous is the opposition of the tobacco trade, which asserts that the new tax will kill the business in cheap cigars, and here there may be modifications. Meanwhile, the prices of Consols, of gilt-edge securities, and even of brewery shares have risen since the character of the Budget was made known.

* * *

The one point of machinery to which serious objection seems to be taken is that the old Sinking Fund (which in the hurry of writing last week we accidentally confused with the new Sinking Fund) is not the proper basis for the development fund. Such a basis would make the fund depend on accidental errors or deliberate miscalculations in estimates, while it might be impounded by the Tories for doles to landlords. This contention Mr. Lloyd George meets by promising to place the Fund under strict Parliamentary control. We greatly hope, however, that it will be by no means abandoned, for it is the chief guarantee against the waste of the new revenues on armaments or half-corrupt grants, and for the maintenance of social reform.

* * *

Mr. Balfour's criticism, delivered on Monday, fell far short of a root and branch attack. As Mr. Lloyd George pointed out, it said nothing of the increase of 2d. on income tax, passed over the super-tax with a mild word, omitted the motor tax, and refrained from attacking the estate duties. Mr. Balfour's main points were an objection to the abolition of the old Sinking Fund, a criticism of the property taxes as likely to encourage evasion, coupled with the declaration that the community suffered from having not too many rich men, but too many poor men, a statement that unearned increment could not be applied merely to land, and a violent rhetorical denunciation of the licence duties. He quoted figures showing that the new duties would more than wipe out the dividend which Whitbread's brewery paid last year to their ordinary shareholders. This part of the Government's scheme was vindictive—you could almost hear the "swish of the scorpions" applied to the brewers' backs. Generally speaking, the confiscatory character of the Budget gave a shock to "confidence and credit."

* * *

The two chief replies to this criticism were supplied by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister. Mr. Lloyd George's contribution was a model of dexterity. He pointed out that Ireland was asked in this Budget for two per cent. less than her general contribution to taxation, and that she ought to remember her share in old age pensions. He hinted at the usefulness of the Development Fund in reviving local transport, and at a further relief of rates, pointed out that German Conservatism favored an increment tax on land, and that our own Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes, of which the present King was the President, proposed to tax undeveloped land near the towns, and concluded that the Budget would bring no privation to any home, however humble, and no injustice to any industry, however powerful.

* * *

The Prime Minister's defence was broad in conception and attractive in form. He chaffed Mr. Chaplin very amusingly over his claim that the idea of a Development Fund was his own, and had been stolen from him, just as Sir Robert Peel was said to have caught the Whigs bathing and stolen their clothes. If Mr. George had taken Mr. Chaplin's clothes, said the Prime Minister, playing on the physical contrast between the two men, could there be a better case for a Development Grant? He pointed out that both parties had taken common ground on Old Age Pensions and the Navy Estimates—the items which were the starting points of the Budget scheme. After all, the Government, having passed Old Age Pensions, were practically asking for the same sum which the Tories asked some years ago without Old Age Pensions. It was childish to talk of driving capital from the country. Where was it to fly to, considering that all the nations, met with the double demand for armaments and social reform, were prepared to tax it? He strongly challenged the Opposition on their alternative, which could only be a scheme of taxation including meat, corn, and dairy produce—that is to say, on the necessaries of life. On that ground the Government would always be prepared to meet them. Up to Wednesday the House had carried preliminary resolutions by majorities varying from 132 to 161. On the motion for the closure of the debate on the tea duty resolution, the Government's majority sank to 107, owing to an unwise combination of some members of the Labor Party with the Nationalists. The Budget is perfectly safe if it is vigilantly and strongly defended at every point by all its friends and the Government's tactics generally accepted. But these conditions are essential.

* * *

We observe that the "Times," dismissing with some contumely its colleagues of the "Observer," advises the Unionist party to aim at mending the Budget rather than "joining in the nonsense talked in some quarters about the intervention of the House of Lords." Nonsense indeed it is, and Lord Ridley's profession of it does not lessen its absurdity. The constitutional point, though it is interwoven with the story of the fight for English liberties, can be simply stated by reference to two authorities on the Constitution among many. May states it in his "History," and more elaborately in his "Practice of Parliament." "The Lords have no voice in questions of expenditure, save that of a formal assent to the Appropriation Acts. They are excluded from it by the spirit and by the forms of the Constitution. Not less exclusive has been the right of the Commons to grant taxes for meeting the public expenditure." To this we may add Lord Courtney in "The Working Constitution of the United Kingdom." "The exclusive and conclusive authority of the House of Commons over expenditure has long been practically established in the United Kingdom." This exclusive and conclusive "power" destroys, in fact and in theory, the power of the Lords to amend Money Bills. It leaves them a purely nominal and quite unreal power to reject them and take the consequences of setting the State in an uproar. "The power," says Lord Courtney, "is not dead. It cannot be called living."

* * *

Lord Morley's great Indian Reform Bill, with Clause 3, has gone through with a compromise, which, we are afraid, strengthens the veto of the Lords on Liberal legislation. Bengal is to have its Executive Council without obstacles. In any other province the Governor-General's proclamation is to lie on the table of both Houses for sixty days, and will have effect if neither House stops it. Thus the Lords retain the power of disturbing Indian, as they do British, politics. This is rather a heavy price to pay for an uncontested Councils Bill.

* * *

Three bye-elections have taken place during the week. On Saturday Mr. William O'Brien's old seat in Cork was filled by a representative of his views of Irish Nationalist policy, Mr. Maurice Healy, brother of Mr. "Tim" Healy, and not far behind him in ability. Mr. Redmond's candidate was defeated by 1,159 votes. The Attercliffe division yielded a surprise. There were four candidates, two Tories, waging deadly war with each other, a Liberal, and a Labor man. The last received just enough votes—3,531—to elect him, the next candidate, Mr. King Farlow, a Tory, obtaining 3,380. The Liberal, Mr. Lambert, came third with 3,175, and the independent Tory last with 2,803. Thus the election fell to the recipient of the largest of a series of minority votes, though Free Trade views were in a clear majority of 523. This is one of the best local cases for proportional representation. Stratford-on-Avon also yielded a mixed and rather complicated result. Captain Kincaid-Smith, the dissident "Liberal," who tried to fight the election on forced national service, found only 479 voters favorable to the views of Lord Roberts and Lord Milner. Mr. Balfour refused to have anything to do with him, and gave his undivided influence to the Tory, Mr. Foster, who won by the overwhelming majority of 2,627 over his Liberal opponent, Mr. Joseph Martin, the Canadian statesman. The seat was always a Tory stronghold till Captain Kincaid-Smith captured it in 1906 for an equivocal form of Liberalism.

* * *

The completion of the restoration in Turkey is going on rapidly. On Sunday the unreliable marine battalion in Constantinople was arrested and broken up, and on Monday the first executions took place, thirteen mutineers of the Salonika Chasseurs being hanged. Commissions have been sent to Asia Minor to punish those responsible for the Armenian massacres. On Wednesday Tewfik Pasha resigned, and Hilmi returned to his post as Grand Vizier. There seems to have been some division in the Committee of Union and Progress as to whether its members should take office, but at least one of the new Ministers belongs to the Committee. It is noteworthy that a new Sheikh-ul-Islam has been appointed. The Chamber is busy revising the Constitution. The amendments before it aim at making the Sultan take an oath to the Constitution in the presence of Parliament, abolishing the Censorship, establishing the fullest responsibility to Parliament of the Cabinet, making the Senate largely the choice of the Chamber, and declaring illegal associations hostile to "the unity and integrity of the State." Messages from Austrian sources suggest that the relations between the new Sultan and the Constitutionalists are not happy, but there seems no evidence of this. Mahommed V.'s rescript on his accession was liberal enough, and he has made a good impression by renouncing one-fifth of the Civil List, or £5,000 a month. The inventory at Yildiz is said to have led to the discovery of £1,000,000, a sum which should help somewhat to relieve the financial situation.

* * *

Wednesday was the Shah's birthday and the Shah issued a rescript announcing that, as a Constitutional régime was alone capable of restoring order, elections would shortly be held under a new electoral law, and a Parliament would meet in Teheran on July 19th. This means the granting of a Constitution, not the restoration of the Constitution. The Nationalists apparently are both sceptical and unsatisfied, but the British and Russian Governments seem to regard the step as the acceptance of the advice lately pressed by them on the Shah. The electoral law under the original Constitution was highly Conservative, and unless the new franchise practically puts nomination into the Shah's hands it is not likely greatly to affect the character of a Persian Parliament. The real trouble with the mejliss was the struggle between Shah and Parliament for the control of the Executive, and the Shah's latest rescript throws no light on this problem. Sir Edward Grey, in answer to questions, said, on Tuesday, that the Russian troops were sent to Tabriz solely to protect foreigners, and will retire as soon as order is secured and foreigners out of danger.

* * *

The First of May passed in perfect quiet in Paris and throughout the Provinces, but the quarrel between the Government and the postal servants has been reopened. The postal servants think that the Cabinet has not kept its word; in particular they look upon the retention of M. Simyan, the Under Secretary, as a breach of faith. Some protests appear to have been made, and as a result the Government has suspended 54 postal employees, and ordered them to appear before a disciplinary court. These measures are hailed as an assertion of Governmental authority. The postal servants, however, are greatly agitated, and have a renewal of the strike under serious consideration. It is quite possible that if they decided to take this step the railway workers would co-operate with them. The railway servants, including those in Government employment, have been holding a Congress, at which the general strike has been approved. The Cabinet seems to be rather anxious. It hopes that its sharp action may reduce the postal officials to subordination, but it is making preparations to supply an emergency service of telegraphists and letter carriers.

* * *

The second Session of the South African Convention began on Monday for the consideration of the amendments to the draft constitution adopted by the various legislatures. The Transvaal has no change to recommend, but Natal and the Cape are responsible for eleven amendments each. Natal wants, among other things, that no State's representation in the Union Parliament should be less than in the first Assembly, and that the provincial executives should not be elected by proportional representation on a non-party basis. The Cape wants the judicial provisions altered slightly, but the most contentious of its demands are that the thinly settled country districts should have more members and not be subjected to proportional representation, and that Dutch should have a more assured status as a language. An attempt is being made by the Progressives to revive in this connection the racial cry of British and Boer, and we are being told that if the Cape persists in its amendments the Union is wrecked. Doubtless there is more cry than wool about these protestations.

* * *

The finance reform muddle in Germany is as great as ever. The Conservatives and the Centre have both pronounced against death or legacy duties as a source of direct taxation, and suggested a tax on unearned increment in the value of land and stocks. The Government sticks to its legacy duty proposal, and though it is prepared to accept a tax on increment in the case of land, it will not look at a similar impost in the case of stocks. The Liberals and Radicals, on the other hand, will not accept a tax on unearned increment, and insist on legacy or death duties. The bloc is thus pretty badly split, and Radicals and Liberals have the mortification of seeing the Clericals working back into their old official position. Apparently, however, no group or probable combination in the Reichstag is quite strong enough to force through its own scheme. To make the confusion greater, all parties have combined to increase the deficit by adding—against the strong protests of the Government—a million pounds to the salaries of officials, an arrangement which, if carried through, will involve the Prussian Government in the like expenditure. The natural way out of the deadlock would be a dissolution, but that might almost double the number of Socialist members.

* * *

The Government are showing an administrative activity and a care for the public interest to which even their opponents bear witness. They are arranging a meeting in the summer for the discussion of Imperial Defence, a new bye-product of the system of formal Imperial Conferences. Mr. Churchill announced on Thursday that a Departmental Committee would be appointed to consider the question of railway amalgamation. And the Prime Minister stated on Thursday, in reply to a question by Mr. Lehmann, that it had been decided to take the subject of aerial navigation out of the rather muddled and haphazard control of the Navy and the Army, and transfer it to the National Physical Laboratory at Teddington. This body is to be assisted by a strong Committee of scientists and specialists, headed by Lord Rayleigh, and is to be adequately financed. The time has come, we suppose, to follow the lead of Germany and France, and see whether aerial navies are really going to send ocean navies to the bottom of the sea, or to the scrap heap. But we doubt whether the National Physical Laboratory is really equipped for practical scientific research. It has been a rather costly failure hitherto.

* * *

"The meeting of the British and Italian Sovereigns in the classic Bay of Baiæ" (writes our Rome correspondent), "and the meeting of President Fallières and the Duke of Genoa at Villefranche, together with the conferring of the Collar of the Annunziata on the President of the French Republic, are considered here to be symptoms of a radical change in Italian foreign policy. Nearly thirty years of participation in the Triple Alliance has clearly demonstrated to the Italian Government and people that the treaty with the Central Empires is entirely to the advantage of Berlin and Vienna, while Italian interests, as the recent annexation of Bosnia and Herzogovina demonstrated, are not only neglected, but suffer grievous injury. The Triplice will have to be renewed or abandoned within two years from now. The great majority of the country is opposed to a policy which sets Italy in conflict with her traditional friendship with Great Britain, and with her feeling for a closer understanding with the neighboring Republic, to which the Italians are bound by historical, racial, and linguistic ties, and, above all, by her liberal and progressive principles. Politicians and simple observers without distinction of party are unanimous on one point—that the continuance of Italy in the Triplice is impossible if Germany maintains an anti-English attitude."

* * *

We draw attention to the powerful indictment of the system of solitary confinement which Mr. John Galsworthy concludes in our present issue. The moral effect of this punishment is by general consent deplorable. It always weakens mental and moral fibre; and in a number of cases leads directly to lunacy. We strongly hope that Mr. Gladstone will take the matter into earnest consideration, and that at the least the system will be largely mitigated during his term of office.

* * *

We shall publish next week an article by Dr. Hastings Rashdall on Lord Curzon's proposals for reforms at Oxford.

Politics and Affairs.

THE ATTACK ON THE BUDGET.

THE "directing" and enjoying classes of the civilised world do not at the moment present an edifying spectacle. We do not like to see either this country or any other laboring under heavy deficits, but we must remember that it is our governors and their well-to-do supporters who are largely responsible for them. How are they footing the bill they have run up? In the United States, under the specious guise of relieving the burdens of the consumer, they have evolved, as the result of a caucus of all the interests gathered to bleed and oppress the general public, a scheme of taxation which raises the average rates of duties on imported goods from 44·16 to 45·72 per cent. of their value. In Germany, one class of these interests, the agrarian landlords, called upon to find less than one-fifth of a deficit of 25 millions from estate duties never rising above 3 per cent. on the largest holdings, have broken up the bloc on which the German Government rests and have left Prince Bülow to choose between surrender and a great Socialist victory at the polls. In Great Britain the tactics have been less sensational, but not more dignified. From our Tories, as from similar parties in Germany and elsewhere, and not from any organised body of workmen, has come the cry for a fresh scale of expenditure on naval defence. From this same party also proceeded the original proposal of old age pensions. The Budget makes provision for these two public ends. In making it, it increases the proportion of revenue accruing from direct taxation from about 39·63 per cent. of the whole to about 41·63 per cent., and decreases the proportion of indirect levies from about 43·19 per cent. to about 42·7 per cent. Thus it somewhat adds to the burden which falls on realised wealth and large comfortable fortunes, and somewhat relieves that which falls on labor and industry. How has this moderate demand on public spirit and patriotic feeling been received? Some individual criticisms have been comic enough. Mr. Ashley, a Conservative Member of Parliament, who married the daughter of one of the richest men in England, withdraws a subscription to a local fund on behalf of poor children, "owing to the very heavy increased taxation which the present Budget proposes to impose." Others, according to Mr. Balfour, are likely to take either themselves, or their capital, or both, to some undiscovered country where rich men are not taxed. Others, again, threaten to dismiss their laborers and servants. According to Lord Ridley one evil of the Budget is that it penalises the thrifty millionaire. He has made a "rough calculation" that a "millionaire henceforth will, with death duties and income tax added together, pay a total tax amounting to 5s. in the £, and that, of course, discourages saving." To this pathetic figure of the millionaire, thrown, against all his moral instincts, on reckless expenditure, we have to add the brewing and liquor-distilling interests, which, having thoughtfully supplied Mr. Balfour with figures showing the total loss of a year's profits in a celebrated concern on the new scales of licence duties, have in the twinkling of an eye transferred the entire burden to the public, combined with a handsome, not to say extortionate, profit for themselves on articles which have largely escaped the fresh taxes! Thus the new licence duties amount to a fresh tax of threepence a barrel on beer. The large brewers are raising their price to the retailer to six or seven shillings a barrel—twenty-four or twenty-eight times the cost of the tax, while the distillers are proposing an extra profit of 2s. 11d. on each gallon of spirits, because of the increased tax of 3s. 9d. a gallon. We have yet to record the working out of this plan of spoliation, and to discover whether, as the brewing interest was presumably charging the top price for its goods before this Budget was heard of, and as on the whole the consumption of alcohol is going down, it now possesses any fresh power of raising that price permanently.

This unpleasant blend of panic and rapacity is, we suppose, part of the "preparation" for a life of patriotic devotion to which the "Spectator" has summoned the leaders of the British people. But, indeed, there is no proof that any one of the taxes, though now and then their united incidence may cause a little temporary difficulty, even approaches the level of the taxable capacity of our wealthy classes. The gross income brought into account by the Inland Revenue Department for the past year, a time of depression, exceeded the enormous sum of one thousand millions, an increase of 31 per cent. in ten years, as against an increase of only 15 per cent. in our taxation. In other words, we have in five years added a sum of about 120 millions to our national income under this head alone. Mr. Lloyd George's additions to the income tax represent a rise of less than one per cent. in the proportion this impost bears to the total taxation of the year. Or take the estate duties. Estate duty was last year paid on £271,500,000, which, though the year was not a great one for this class of revenue, included nine fortunes of a million and upwards. The evidence supplied by the growth of luxury in the capital and in the personal habits of the wealthy—the multiplication of sumptuous theatres, music-halls, palace-hotels and restaurants, the rapid change from horse to motor carriage—amply supports this statistical proof.

If, therefore, it is absurd to speak of the Budget as an instrument likely to drive capital out of the country, it is still more ridiculous to describe it as "plundering the middle classes." If there is one class more than another which it spares, it is the great mass of citizens who stand between the manual worker and the ranks of the leisured and the endowed. They fare, indeed, better than the workman, who, in our view, is too heavily hit by a large addition to an ungraduated tobacco tax. Save in the very highest grades the professional man entirely escapes. If his income is all earned, it may reach £2,000 and yet pay an income tax of only ninepence in the £, and his contribution to "Dreadnoughts" and old age pensions will depend solely on his accomplishments as a smoker and spirit drinker. If he is a father of four children and earns only £200, he contributes under the new system not one farthing to the income tax. If he makes £300 a year, and has six children, he contributes only £3, and even if he has none his contribution is merely at the rate of a fraction over fourpence in the £. The small unearned incomes are, no doubt, subject to the full rate of 1s. 2d., and we much hope that the Chancellor will open a door of relief. But here also the scheme of abatements comes in, and largely reduces the actual percentages paid. While, therefore, no British trade but the luxury trades of liquor and tobacco suffers under this Budget, and the greatest of British trades, that of agriculture, receives a number of handsome benefits, while the workman is relieved of all further strain on his stock of necessaries, the intellectual "proletariat," excepting the most wealthy and most successful members of the class, is unhampered. And the reduction of our debt goes smoothly on, while Protectionist Germany, weltering in a financial chaos, is compelled to issue heavy loans at four per cent. What other country in the world is standing the strain of the new scale of public expenditure on such easy terms, combining so slight an interference with its productive industrial forces with so large a measure of forbearance to the creators of its wealth?

The Budget, therefore, is essentially a just instrument, and by no means lays itself open to Lord Hugh Cecil's sneer that it is a kind of vindictive human "rehearsal of the Day of Judgment," arbitrarily declaring this class of wealth to be evil and that to be good. Some of its largest innovations are conspicuously free from a vindictive element. Is it merely "vindictive" to set up a scheme of taxation which promotes cheap and healthy settlement on the borders of our towns, in place of overcrowding in the centre? Are death duties vindictive? Or the attempt to reserve for the community future land values which its general activities create? Under it no man can lose any fruit of labor or organisation; the State will merely aim at detecting and applying forms of wealth which cannot be traced to individual effort at all. The new scale of licence duties belongs to the same category of attempts to take public wealth for public purposes. It constitutes a fair rent for special monopolist privileges, without which the liquor trade could not exist for a month. It is not "vindictive" to press lightly on labor and industry, and let wealth pay something of the real toll which it owes to the State that gives it absolute security of possession, that multiplies its enjoyments, and hourly expands its powers of increase. Therefore we Liberals need not be afraid of thinking and saying that this Budget contains a sound "moral" element. Pace Lord Hugh Cecil, it is good morals as well as good finance and high statesmanship to make wealth pay according to its ability, to keep labor—which probably pays an average income-tax of about 2s. in the £—immune from assaults on its necessary food and clothing, and industry all but unharassed. These are the blessings that only Free Trade and democratic finance combined can supply, and the mingled violence and incoherence of the attacks on the Budget show that some at least of its enemies know that it safeguards the nation against the downright plunder of Protection, and qualifies the selfish dominance of wealth, while it enables the State to take a long look forward into the future, and to equip itself for the tasks that time will bring.

SOME PRINCIPLES OF THE BUDGET.

The press and platforms of the Opposition vary their attack upon the Budget to fit their public. The working man is told that he must pay the whole of the increased taxes upon spirits, beer, and tobacco, and a swift conspiracy of the trades dealing in these articles has set an object-lesson by raising to quite disproportionate extent the price of their stocks which are not called upon to pay the enhanced duties. Besides this "practical" argument, Lord Lansdowne, deriding the notion that this is a Poor Man's Budget, enunciates the novel doctrine that "all taxation ultimately affects, and probably affects most severely, the people who are least able to bear it."

But these strictures upon the Budget as a new oppression of the poor do not prevent the middle-class journal from denouncing it as a burden peculiarly devised for its long-suffering clientèle, though perhaps nineteen-twentieths of its readers are almost untouched by it, while among Society and in the seats of the mighty it is briefly summarised as plundering the rich. Where does the truth lie? The gathering of all these imputations would seem to afford a somewhat striking testimony to the even distribution of the new burdens. But, as we indicated in our first approach last week, the main purport and the supreme merit of Mr. George's proposals is that they shift the relative strain of taxation on to the classes with most ability to pay. Though some share of the new revenue will probably be found by the working and the lower-middle classes, it is the manifest intention of the Government that the rich should pay most of it, and pay they will. It is not "sheer Socialism," and there is nothing vindictive about the proposal. The owners of large properties and high incomes, of land values and liquor values, the products of privilege or natural scarcity, must necessarily find the bulk of the required revenue, for there is no other course from which it can be got without inflicting obvious and grievous injury on industry and the efficiency of labor. Two impregnable principles dictate this national finance. The first is that in imposing direct taxation, unearned incomes and property are to be preferred to earned; the second, that wherever it is desirable to retain indirect taxation, whether in the interests of revenue or public order, luxuries and superfluities are to be preferred to necessaries as objects of taxation.

These two principles afford a triumphant defence of this democratic Budget. Mr. Balfour, indeed, in his opening speech, conceded the main doctrine of the equity of graduation in taxing property, and made it manifest that the brunt of the attack was to be directed against the "iniquity" of selecting land and licences for special severity of treatment, and the injury inflicted upon trade and industry in general by the accumulated pressure of so many new burdens. Upon this latter point a grave misunderstanding arises. Large though the volume of the fresh taxation is, amounting to some fourteen millions, it inflicts no intolerable hardship upon a nation with such vast and growing resources as Great Britain. Even if the entire body of the new revenue were defrayed from the incomes of well-to-do persons with upwards of £2,000 per annum, it would not even seriously encroach upon the luxuries of these owners of three hundred millions per annum. There may no doubt be hard cases to which consideration should be given in the further adjustment of the new taxes. But the notion that wholesale retrenchments will be imposed upon the wealthy classes is destitute of any reasonable foundation, and can be supported by no better arguments than those of Mr. Pretyman, who piled up a piteous tale of ruin on the absurd supposition that an estate yielding a net realised income of £1,000 per annum would be taxed on a capital basis of £100,000.

It is amazing to hear critics of the Budget expressing so much genuine indignation at the injustice of selecting the owners of licences and land for special punishment. Surely, say some opponents of the Budget, there are many other forms of equally "unearned increment" in high dividends on capital, great rewards of lucky enterprise, large rents of professional ability. Why tax land and licences and leave these scathless? Well, if Mr. George's Budget contained no other taxes than those on land and licences, there might be some force in this contention. But this is not the case. Careful nets are spread for these other unearned or needlessly high incomes in the shape of further graduation of estate duties and of income tax. Though they cannot be quite in the same class as the wholly unearned incomes arising from rents of land and liquor monopolies, such unearned elements as they may contain are cautiously but not unprofitably tapped through the more general suckers of direct taxation.

Some of Mr. George's opponents are mournfully apprehensive that owing to evasions and the difficulties of collection his super-tax and higher death duties may not bring in the full revenue which is ascribed to them. Others are sure that the Budget will react so disastrously upon the credit of the country as to impair industry, reduce all values and incomes, and so lower the taxable corpus of the nation. But two assumptions—in our judgment both false—underlie these dismal forebodings. The first is that the raising of the new revenue by the proposed methods will, in fact, impair either the efficiency of labor or the productivity of the land, capital, and ability, which co-operate with labor to produce wealth. We believe there is no warrant for such a supposition, either as regards the sum extracted from the long purses of the rich, or as regards the small share which the workers may be called upon to pay out of the enhanced price of their luxuries, assuming that the liquor and tobacco rings find it really profitable to maintain their "bluff" of raising prices, an assumption which we gravely doubt.

The second assumption is that the whole body of the new revenue is to be expended unproductively in ways fraught with no gain to the efficiency of the people and the productivity of their country. But if that important sketch of social constructive policy which Mr. George put forth be taken, as it ought, for an integral part of his financial proposal, no such conclusion is warranted. This great Budget, in its plan for securing a large contribution for the development of afforestation and other improvements of the material fabric of our national life, lays the foundation for a truly constructive finance, which in the future may fructify in innumerable ways for the advantage of the nation.

---

THE ALTERNATIVE TO THE BUDGET.

The flames of Tariff Reform indignation against the intolerable burdens imposed by the Budget received a douche of cold water in the debates at the hands of the Prime Minister and the Attorney-General. The payment of the bill is never the most attractive part of the entertainment, but it has to be done. Now in this case the public bill has been run up by the agreement of both parties. The bulk of the Opposition accept Old Age Pensions, and we have no doubt that their acceptance is perfectly honest and sincere. They were for years advocates of the pension system, and many votes accrued to them thereby. But they would not or could not find the money. Now the Liberal Government have introduced the pension system, with Unionist acquiescence, and not only with their acquiescence, but with their applause, and not only with applause, but with not a few incitements to go further. We are glad, for our part, that our opponents agree with us, but the conclusion is clear that they must be prepared to pay the bill. So much for one item in the additional sixteen millions that have to be found. With regard to the second item the same reasoning applies, if anything with greater force. The Unionist not merely agrees to the additional four "Dreadnoughts," but he proclaims his want of eight with all the power of his lungs. His only complaint on this head is that we are not spending more. Clearly, then, if the Opposition were in power to-day the deficit to be faced would be, not less than sixteen millions, but more. They cannot complain of the absolute magnitude of the new burden. They would have to impose one equal or greater themselves. How, then, would they do it? Here lies the point of contention, and to it Liberal speakers will have to address themselves during the campaign.

At no single point, to begin with, will Mr. Lloyd George's Budget touch a necessity of life. Neither bread nor tea nor sugar, neither meat nor dairy produce nor fruit will cost the consumer a penny the more in spite of all the new weight of taxation that has to be borne. What is the alternative proposal here? Mr. Chamberlain proposed a duty on all kinds of foreign corn except maize, on all meat except bacon, on butter, on eggs, and on cheese. The duties were, in the first instance, no doubt, to be comparatively light. According to a useful little volume, called "Tariff Makers: Their Aims and Methods," issued by the Cobden Club, the proceeds of the duties proposed by the Tariff Commission would amount in the first instance to about twelve millions. Let us see what this involves. In the case of necessaries of life, and where the proportion imported is large, there is little doubt that a duty raises the prices not only of foreign but of home-grown food by its whole amount. The whole twelve millions would, therefore, fall upon the consumer. But this is only the beginning. The same increase of price would accrue to all home-grown food, and this is estimated very roughly, but not, we think, immoderately, by the Cobden Club as equal in amount to that which we import. The total burden imposed on the food of the country would be twenty-four millions, the great bulk of which would fall upon the working classes. We should probably be within the mark in saying that if Mr. Austen Chamberlain were to carry through the proposals of his party in place of those of Mr. Lloyd George, the working classes would pay in the increased price of food alone a sum equal to the whole burden now to be borne by the entire community. On the other hand, the Exchequer would receive from these taxes less than half of the amount which they would cost the people. It is estimated that $1\frac{1}{4}$ million would be deducted by way of preference to the Colonies, leaving to the Exchequer $10\frac{1}{4}$ millions out of the twenty-four which the taxes would cost the nation. It must be added that Mr. Joseph Chamberlain at the outset of his campaign proposed to balance matters so far as food was concerned by remissions on tea and sugar and cocoa. The balance was not a fair one, but let that pass. We have to point out that, taking Liberal finance as a whole, it has carried out a large part of Mr. Chamberlain's proposed deductions while meeting increased expenditure and without imposing countervailing food taxes. It has remitted a penny on tea, and half the sugar duty, without being driven to the compensating 6s. a cwt. on corn. It has balanced food remissions not against more burdensome duties on the poor, but on most desirable abatements of the superfluities of the rich.

But food is not the only, though it is the greatest, point in question. With the single and quite legitimate exception of petrol, Mr. George places no burden on any article of use in industry. How would the Tariff Reform Budget compare here? We have seen that their food taxes would leave them with five millions to find, and cheerfully would they set out to find them, by taxing what they are pleased to call manufactured goods. But of the goods lumped together as "manufactured," a large proportion are in reality used as materials or appliances in further industrial processes, and so far as all these are concerned, the Tariff Reformer is on the horns of a dilemma. Either he must tax materials and thereby increase cost of production, narrow down the margin for wages and profits, and hamper the manufacturer in face of foreign competition. Or he must keep on cutting down his list and reducing the taxable remainder till it comes to a very slender proportion of the actual national import. In this case two of the results which he promises himself dwindle away. He does very little to "protect" the manufacturers as a whole, and he gets little revenue. On the whole he prefers the former haven, and we find him boldly advocating, for example, a tariff of five per cent. on pig-iron, $6\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. on bars, and 10 per cent. on iron sheets. Now this tax simply means that every British industry using iron and steel will be burdened to the extent measured by the duty, and so far as such duties are generalised every manufacturer will find his expenses raised in greater or less degree. He may not know what he is paying or whom or why, but pay he will, and the workman and the consumer will suffer along with him. In part he will put off his burden on to them. In part he will find that as prices rise consumption falls off, and production must be curtailed, and this means in the end that the area of employment is narrowed and the sum of national weath less. To do justice to Mr. George's Budget two alternatives should, we suggest, be set forth, in figures as clear and concrete as possible, taken from the published proposals of the Tariff Commission. The public would then be able to judge which is the more fitting source of additional revenue—whether it is better to bleed the active industry of the country or to draw judiciously from the widening reservoirs of the economic surplus.

---

THE NEW ORDER IN EGYPT.

It is the commonplace of history that subject races are rarely so discontented as at the moment when their fortunes are beginning to mend. The Egyptians are no exception to the rule, and it is round this text that the second of Sir Eldon Gorst's annual reports has been written. In one perfunctory sentence, indeed, he suddenly pulls himself up to remark that there has been no "change of policy" since Lord Cromer's departure. But every page of this report, every tone of the new voice, and nearly every act in this record belies the inevitable ritual of official piety which was satisfied by the penning of this sentence. The old polemics against the Egyptian character and the Mohammedan religion, the sneers at men so foolish as to wish to govern themselves, have vanished. In their place we have a laborious and evidently sincere attempt to convince the Egyptians that Sir Eldon Gorst is really working for the end of national freedom which they themselves profess. The evidences of this intention which he accumulates are numerous and striking. A Ministry of able men, some of them reputed to possess a certain independence and self-respect, has taken the place of a Cabinet of puppets, who were content to draw salaries as the humble registrars of the decisions of their English advisers. The importation of English officials and teachers which had reached its maximum towards the close of Lord Cromer's reign has notably diminished. Egyptians are receiving higher posts, and they are also less "inspected" and less "advised" than of old. The Khedive, whom Lord Cromer treated with studied brutality, is now used with respect and encouraged to play a certain modest rôle. Better still, Sir Eldon Gorst is evidently trying to encourage the consultative Legislative Council to use such rights as it possesses and to deliberate in public. The old attitude towards criticism or suggestion, whether from native or European quarters, was one of contemptuous indifference. Sir Eldon Gorst clearly has an open and sympathetic mind. Several scandals of long standing have been or are about to be remedied, notably the cruel abuse of child labor in the cotton ginneries, and the imprisonment of the Dervish captives at Damietta. No less important is the gradual reversal of Lord Cromer's policy of anglicising education, and the slow but steady effort to build up in the schools and in the new University a sure basis for a native Arabic culture. Very quietly, perhaps too quietly, a new order has opened under new men.

Yet the change of tone, spirit, and policy, which is to an English observer so patent, has made as yet but little impression on the Egyptians themselves. A brusque system of personal rule and a constant use of espionage have given way to an open-minded and well-mannered leadership, respectful towards native ideals, benevolent towards native culture, anxious to conciliate sane opinion, and striving clearly rather towards Anglo-Egyptian co-operation than towards an English bureaucratic despotism. Yet native opinion has rarely been more hostile. The violence of the Nationalist press is a bad symptom. The reluctance of the Legislative Council to respond to Sir Eldon Gorst's attempts to encourage it to magnify its meagre functions is even more disappointing. In diagnosing this situation Sir Eldon Gorst naturally lays stress on the responsibility of the Nationalists themselves. They are not, we think, a wise or very capable party. Their outlook in politics is rudimentary, and for such vital matters as the reform of their religious colleges, the education of women (matters which really lie in their hands), or the condition of the fellaheen, they display no concern at all. They have suffered from the utter death of intellectual life in Egypt which followed from Lord Cromer's policy of anglicising education and starving the means adopted by the Khedive Ismail to encourage Arabic culture. The death of Mustafa Kamel Pasha, their one leader of talent, has left them even more violent, but much less united and much less competent, than they were. The spectacle of the sudden renaissance of Turkey by a swift revolution has naturally made them more than ever impatient with the slow evolution which their English rulers offer them as their only hope.

But on the other side of the account there is much to be set. A nation does not easily forget the humiliations of a period of foreign rule as tactless as it was despotic. It used to hear even from Lord Cromer occasional professions of his desire to educate them to govern themselves. Nothing in his policy confirmed these professions. For some time to come similar declarations from Sir Eldon Gorst, sincere though we believe them to be, will leave them sceptical and cold. Official etiquette and the fetish of continuity forbade him to make a sudden breach with the past. But only a sudden and dramatic breach would have impressed the native imagination. A bolder statesmanship would have found in the transformation of Turkey the occasion for such a breach. Nor are we altogether surprised at the irresponsive attitude of the Legislative Council. They ask for a Parliament, and Sir Eldon Gorst offers them Provincial Councils. He then sends them for their criticism the draft of a reform towards which they are quite indifferent, and he is surprised because they are not pleased by this sign of confidence, and delay indefinitely to send in their amendments. Their attitude may be foolishly sullen, but at least it is human and natural. "If the English are going to rule us," they reason, "let the English bear the whole responsibility for changes which are not the reforms we demand. If, on the other hand, the English really mean to consult our opinion, let them follow it; our opinion unanimously demands a Parliament." To the practical English mind this seems a foolish procedure, and it is certainly not a procedure which an Irish party under good leadership would have followed. The Irishmen saw the possibilities latent even in County Councils. But the curse of Egypt in the past has been the pliability and the timidity of its public life. A refusal to compromise, however inconvenient to us, is at least a proof that the nation is beginning to stand erect and to respect itself. Sir Eldon Gorst has not improved his chances of influencing native opinion by reviving the old Khedivial Press Law of 1881. We admit the provocation; a section of the Nationalist Press is both violent and unscrupulous. We recognise also that the intention was rather to threaten than to punish. But to revive a law which enables Ministers by an executive order and without trial to suppress a hostile newspaper, was to cast grave doubts on our sincerity in working for a Constitutional régime. The native Press has taken care that this one mistake shall be far more prominent in men's minds than the many indications of better things which mean so much for us.

For our part, we confess ourselves reluctantly sceptical of the success of a policy of evolution which fails to win the good-will of educated Egyptians, and is forced to temper reforms for which few are grateful, with coercion at which all are angry. One race can educate another only if confidence and mutual regard govern their relations. But the average Egyptian profoundly distrusts us; the average official despises and dislikes the Egyptian. The change of tone comes too late, and we doubt the power of men like Sir Eldon Gorst, Mr. Chitty, and Mr. Harvey to transform the standpoint of their subordinates trained in Lord Cromer's school. We are far from thinking the Egyptians in any sense mature. They lag behind the Indians or the Turks in culture and character, nor have they even the natural capacity of the Persians for speculation and literature. But it is easy to exaggerate the capacity even of Western races for self-government. Our armaments, our standing problems of poverty are a perpetual satire on that capacity. Europe, as a Cromer sees it, differs somewhat from Europe as an Anatole France sees it, and the latter has the clearer vision. An Egyptian Parliament would make mistakes as every Parliament does. They would not be the mistakes which Lord Cromer made, but they might not be, from an Egyptian standpoint, quite so objectionable. The sense of responsibility and the concern for detailed problems which are absent at present can come only from the exercise of power. What is required at once is, we think, some more imaginative effort to conquer Egyptian sympathies, which would most naturally take the form of an assurance that the gift of full self-government will be, if all goes well, an affair rather of years than of decades.

Life and Letters.

TO THE MEMORY OF THOMAS PAINE.

The centennial celebration stands upon the supposition that a hundred years are a good and sufficient time for the settlement of any human reputation. But there are instances which falsify the supposition, and one of the most remarkable is that of Thomas Paine. After a long life of conspicuous service in the causes of political and spiritual enlightenment in three great countries of which he was a citizen, a halo of infamy settled upon his memory which no vindication of the later historians of the revolutionary age in which he lived and worked has yet been able wholly to dispel. There lingers even now in most respectable circles of "educated" Englishmen the notion that Paine was a scurrilous writer of "atheistic" books, and in politics a forerunner of the modern anarchists. The present writer calls to mind how in his boyhood a gaunt, lonely old man used to be pointed out in superstitious whispers as "a follower of wicked Tom Paine," and there are parts of England where there still stands outside the front door a bushy brush for muddy shoes, to which is given the contemptuous name "Tom Paine." Nor has the faithful biography by Dr. Conway succeeded in winning any adequate recognition of the greatness of the man even in America, the country which owed even more to him than the country of his birth. The man whose eloquent and reasoned appeal, "Common Sense," first formulated the demand for independence, the first coiner of the great thought and expression, "The United States of America," the man whom Washington and Jefferson were proud to call their friend, and whose magnificent work for the liberation of their country they acknowledged with unstinted praise—this man was spoken of by Theodore Roosevelt quite recently as "a dirty little atheist." But, after all, our feelings of resentment at such a brutality are assuaged by the reflection that whereas Mr. Roosevelt will in a quick generation sink to the obscurity from which a series of accidents lifted him for a few years, history will gradually set in its proper place among the makers of the Republic the memory of the man whom he defamed.

For though Paine cannot be placed among the greatest philosophers and political thinkers, the magnitude, variety, and immediate efficacy of his writings constitute him one of the chief personal forces of the revolutionary age. How is it, then, that his name has been so besmirched, and that far smaller men have usurped his fame? It was not that he was an evil liver or a coarse, indecent writer, though both false charges were contained in the evil mythology that soon gathered round him. Though in a depressed period of his later life he indulged in excessive drinking, this was no bar to respect in the age of Fox and Pitt, and his domestic experiences, though unfortunate, were entirely free from blame. His pen, though sometimes virulent, hardly ever betrayed him into that offensive ridicule which has sometimes tainted the literature of "free thought." Even in the bitterest passages of the "Age of Reason" he did not exceed the liberal limits set by the practices of theological controversy in his time. Neither can his long eclipse be accounted for upon the ground of his excessive "rationalism," his over-confidence in the efficacy of abstract reasoning upon the rights of men, and his disregard of the sentiments and traditions which mainly govern human conduct. To modern readers of his two great works this criticism may sometimes recur. But two points must be remembered. In overrating the practical efficacy of reasoning, Paine only erred in common with nearly all the great minds of his and the succeeding age. It was an era of illumination: man was by nature just and reasonable, ignorance and the interested craft of rulers and priests had confused, retarded, and misled him in the past! Paine only shared with Fox, Godwin, Wordsworth, Shelley, Bentham, Owen, the delusion that a plain exposition of the rational order of society and the new moral world would liberate the necessary power for its prompt achievement. But modern sceptics who contemn the abstract idealism of the man who helped to draft the Declaration of Independence must not be permitted to deceive us. Ideas and general formulæ were not barren in the later eighteenth century; they were charged with faith and wrought great works. Paine was not in the least an arid intellectualist: from his early life of sordid struggle, in what his biographer justly calls "an almost incredible England," he carried into the New England across the water a consuming passion for human justice and liberty, not as platform phrases, but as hard, concrete goods worth fighting and dying for, which set America afire, when she was confusedly pondering "an impossible and unnatural reconciliation." From America to France, fresh in the throes of her great upheaval, he passed, not as an incendiary, but as a moderating and constructive influence in her National Convention, risking his very life for the cause of clemency in dealing with a traitorous king. From France to England, carrying the same doctrines of liberty in politics and religion, not a cold utilitarian conception of individual rights, but a rich human gospel of a commonwealth sustained by a passion of humanity as deep and real as ever inflamed the soul of man. Roosevelt's "dirty little atheist" was one of the first open advocates of the liberation of the negro slaves, of the abolition of capital punishment, of international treaties of arbitration: forty years before Comte he was the author of the phrase "the Religion of Humanity." So far was he from being the atheist his malignant traducers fastened in the common mind, that his first and avowed motive in writing his "Age of Reason" was to induce man to "return to the pure, unmixed, and unadulterated belief in one God and no other."

It is true that Paine was republican and Deist, an enemy of kings and churches. But many men of great and undimmed honor held the same principles: Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, and others of the "Fathers" were Deists, and in England that creed was even fashionable in certain aristocratic quarters. Paine's real sin was not that he preached Deism in the land of Bolingbroke, Hume, and Gibbon, or even that he professed republicanism in the age of rising republics, but that he succeeded for the first time in inoculating the people with these heresies. There was no danger in philosophic revolutionism at a guinea a volume, but 200,000 copies of the first part of the "Rights of Man," within two years of its appearance in 1791, revealed to the ruling aristocracy the new peril of a serf population who could read and think, and presently might act for themselves. For Paine found thought and feeling for the first batch of literate working men. He discovered this large new sort of Englishman, and invented a new, vigorous language for his use. A far more genuine thinker than Cobbett, he set him the example of terse, direct, dignified and sinuous English, with which these two men won the position of the first popular prose writers. It was not the views but the popularity of Paine, the reflection that his thoughts might spread among masses of men discontented with their hard lot, who might take ideas in earnest and strive to put them into practice, that brought upon Paine's head the vials of anger and calumny from persons in authority in Church and State. No wonder his books were burned by the common hangman, himself substituted for Guy Fawkes on the fifth of November, and his character blackened from a thousand lying pulpits! "Invent printing," wrote Carlyle, "and you invent democracy." Not quite so! Invent a sort of writing which when printed shall be understanded of the people, then you invent democracy. And this, earlier and better than any other man, is what Thomas Paine did. For this reason he was hated and maligned by those classes endowed with the power to make hatred and malignity effective. For this reason he will recover a glorious though tardy fame among those who take the necessary trouble to rectify false estimates and to do honor to one of the most truly honorable men who have striven to serve mankind.

IN RETREAT.

"No nasty shells here, Sire! No more screaming shells, and we are both alive!" said the jester, lying on the ground at his master's feet.

The large room was littered with bundles and various kinds of luggage. Several women, covered from head to foot in long cloaks and veils, lay about the floor or on the divans round the walls, hardly distinguishable from the bundles except that now and then they moaned or uttered some brief lamentation. From other parts of the house came sounds of hammering and the hurried swish of cleaning walls. From the long windows a deep and quiet harbor could be seen, and a few orange lights were beginning to glimmer from the quay and anchored boats. Across the purple of the water rose the blue mass of Olympus, its craggy edges sharp against the sunset sky, and over Olympus a filmy cloud was sometimes blown across the half-moon.

"No more shells, Sire!" the jester kept repeating, and at the word "shells" the women groaned. But the man whom he addressed was silent. Since dawn he had said nothing.

"Last night no one thought we should be alive this evening, Sire," said the jester. "We have gained a day of life. Who could have given us a better present?"

The half-moon disappeared behind Olympus, and out of the gathering darkness in the chamber a voice was at last heard: "They have killed other Sultans," it said. "They will kill me too."

At the sound of the voice the women stirred and whispered. One cried, "I am hungry"; another said, "Water, O give me water!" but no one answered her.

"Death is coming," the voice went on. "Every minute for thirty years I have escaped death, and to-night it will come. What is so terrible as death?"

"Nothing is so terrible," said the jester, "but fear is the brother of death."

"When death is quick, they say you feel nothing," said the voice, "but they lie. The shock that stops life—the crash of the bullet into the brain, the stab of the long, cold dagger piercing the heart between the ribs, the slice of the axe through the neck, the stifling of breath when someone kicks away the stool and the noose runs tight—do you not feel that? To think of life ending! One moment I am alive, I am well, I can talk and eat; next moment life is going—going—and it is no use to struggle. Thought stops, breath stops, I can see and hear no more. One second, and I am nothing for ever."

"Your Majesty is pleased to overlook Paradise," said the jester.

"Let me live! Only let me live!" the voice continued. "I am not old. Many men have lived twenty or even thirty years longer than I have. They say when you are really old death comes like sleep. Nothing is so terrible as death. That is why I have shown myself merciful in my power. What other Sultan has kept his own brother alive for thirty years? Did I not give him a great palace to live in, and gardens where he could walk with few to watch his safety? Did I not send him every day delicate food from my own table? Did I not grant him such women as he desired, and books to read in, and musicians to delight his soul? His were the joys of Paradise, and he was alive as well. He had life—the one thing needful, the one thing that can never be restored! And now my own brother turns against me. He will let them take my life. The shock of death will strike me down, and I shall be nothing any more."

"Truly," said the jester, "the joys of the Prophet's Paradise are nothing to be compared with the blessedness of your Majesty's happy reign. Yet men say that where there is life there is sorrow."

"Have I not watched over my people? Have I not upheld the city against the enemy? Have I not toiled? What pleasure have I given myself? When have I been drunk with wine as the Infidels are drunken? What excess of delight have I taken with the women sent me as presents year by year? They dwelt in their beautiful chambers, and I saw them no more. I have neglected no duty to God or man. Week by week I risked my life to worship God. From dawn till evening I have labored, taking no rest and seeking no pleasure, though the right to all pleasures was mine. Whatever passed in my Empire, I knew it. Whatever was whispered in secret, I heard. The breath of treason could not escape me, and where treachery thrust out its head to look, my sword was ready."

"Truly, Sire," said the jester, "from the days of Midhat it was ready, and there are more silent peacemakers than the sword."

"The Powers of the Infidel stood waiting. Like vultures round a dying sheep they stood waiting round the dominions of Islam. Here and there one snatched a living piece and devoured it as though it were carrion, while the others screamed with gluttonous fury and threatened with wings and claws."

"Ah, Sire," said the jester, "you have shown us how these Christians love one another!"

"One war," the voice went on, "one war I have lost, but the enemy did not receive the fruits of victory. In one war I was victorious, and the Crescent would again be flying over Athens if the Infidel Powers had not barred the way. I have not lived without glory. From east to west the moon of Islam shines brighter now. The sons of Islam are gathering side by side. They stand again for the glory of the Prophet and his Khalif. I see the brown peoples of Asia, I see the black hordes from African deserts and forests. They pass quick messages. They pledge their faith on the Sacred Book. They issue out again to the conquest of the world, and it is I who have gathered the might of Islam into one hand. It is I who have swept away the princes, the ministers, the governors, and the agents who divided the power of Islam and squandered its riches. It is I who have stored up wealth for the great day when the sword of Islam shall again be drawn."

"Forget not, Sire," said the jester, "the names of Fehim and Izzet, who stood beside you and also stored up the wealth of Islam against the coming of that great day. If I could find where it is stored now, Islam would be more secure, and I less hungry."

"I held the city of the world," said the voice from the darkness: "I kept the breath of life moving throughout the Empire when all said it must perish. For thirty years my one brain outmatched the diplomacy of all the Embassies. Emperors have been proud to visit my palace. Kings have called me venerable. I have worshipped God, I have protected my people, and now I must die."

"Ah, Sire," said the jester, "even in your blessed reign men have died. Their life was sweet, but they managed to die, and what is so common can hardly be intolerable. People have even been murdered before, and if together with the women we should now be murdered in the dark ——"

He was interrupted by the cries of the women. "We shall be murdered—murdered in the dark," they moaned. "We knew how it would end! Death is the honor of a Sultan's wives."

A rifle-shot sounded from the street and, dark in the darkness, a form cowered back upon the divan, making the draperies shake.

"They are quick," he gasped. "They are always so quick! They do not leave time for my plans. The sword of Islam is at work in Asia now. My orders were to slay and slay. They must be dead by now—thousands of them dead— thousands of cursed men and women—as many thousands as once made the quays so red—as many thousands as in the churches and villages long ago, or on the mountains of Monastir. Europe will not endure it. The Powers will intervene. They will save my life. They will come to set me free. They will give me back my power—my power and my life. I alone can govern this people. They know it. I am the only chance of peace. I have toiled without ceasing. I have never harmed a living soul. They themselves say I am merciful. It is no pleasure to me to have people killed. The Powers will come to save me. They will not let me die. Why are those rebels so quick? They do not give me time, and all my plans were ready!

Far down in Asia the killing has begun. Why does not the telegraph speak? The Powers will intervene. They will not let me die."

"Sire," said the jester, "they are lighting lamps in the street. They are firing guns. They are crying 'Long live the new Sultan'! Your Majesty's brother is proclaimed."

"I am the Sultan," cried the voice; "I am the Khalif, I am the successor of the Prophet. Tell them I am the successor of the Prophet! Tell them they dare not kill me!"

"Sire," said the jester, "greatness shares the common fate. The will of the Eternal is above all monarchs."

The firing of many rifles was heard in the street below. The door of the large chamber was flung wide open, and a flood of yellow light revealed the piled up luggage, the muffled forms of women, and a dark little figure curled upon the divan, his head hidden in his arms.

"Oh, be merciful," he cried. "Spare my life, only spare my life! What, would you kill a ruler like me? Would you kill an old, old man?"

"Your Highness," said an officer in a quiet voice, "dinner is served."

POETIC DICTION IN ENGLAND.

The death of Swinburne must have set some of us reflecting over the great gulf which to-day in England divides poetry from the people. Was it ever so wide before? And of whom is it a condemnation—the poets or the people?

Partly, no doubt, of the people. Popular education since 1870 has turned and is turning out millions of readers who have learned how to read but not what to read. This vast army of persons, whose taste in literature is much on a par with a savage's taste in colored beads, produce an effect on the book-trade, and through it a reaction even upon the more cultivated classes, to which earlier history affords no parallels. But the modern reading world is a very large one. There are in it many mansions. The tiny apartment still tenanted by the Muses is only one room out of a large suite, which those illustrious ladies might have occupied had they been less shy.

The fact is—and the sooner we recognise it, the better—that the Englishman of to-day has well-founded grievances against contemporary poetry. What he objects to, generally, is its aloofness from himself. His implied demand is that the poets should write with more eye to him as consumer. Particularly that they should speak the language which we now speak. Modern English poets aim at climaxes of affectation. The majority talk an obsolete jargon compounded incongruously of ballad-English, Elizabethan-English, and Miltonic Latinisms. When in doubt they ransack the Bible for disused phrases. The present fashion was definitely fastened upon them by Tennyson, and in a very real sense even the greatest of them after him—Arnold, Rossetti, Morris, Swinburne—may be called Tennysonians. Browning alone travels quite a different road, handicapped, however, by modes of literary indirectness peculiar to himself. Arnold, the earliest, came least under the Tennysonian category; Swinburne, the latest, came most. The critics still make an artificial poetic diction their principal criterion for poetry; and the verse-writers mostly acquiesce.

Of course this literary language is by no means indefensible. Its adepts may claim, with much truth, that it has behind it a long evolution whereby those modes of expression best fitted to poetry have been picked out; that, moreover, to the literary person it works wonders by association—"all the charm of all the Muses often flowering in a lonely word." These claims must be allowed for; Virgilianism has its place, and no one wants its total abolition. On their own ground, it is true, our English Virgilians come a long way after Virgil; some of us may even incline to the verdict of a great Oxford scholar, not long dead, who said that the exact Latin equivalent to Tennyson was Statius. Meanwhile, there are other souls in England not less important than the souls of literary persons, and at present they are too often like the hungry sheep which look up and are not fed. In other lands they would fare better. Things like the death-scene of Ase in "Peer Gynt," like "Mein Ruh ist hin," or any of the hundreds of exquisitely direct poems and passages in Goethe and his successors, have the straight unliterary appeal, which so little in modern English poetry has. Or, indeed, one need go no further for an illustration than to Scotland. The zeal and appreciation with which almost any commonplace Scot will sing or declaim the masterpieces of Burns should be a thought-begetting experience for a Southerner. We in England have had greater poets than Burns; but none of them has for our countrymen to-day the significance which Burns has for his.

Swinburne must represent something like the high-water mark of possible artifice. He practically never succeeded in anything at all natural and direct. Notice that the point we are considering has nothing to do with his wonderful metrical and rhythmical ingenuity. Miracles of sound, as Goethe showed, and after him Swinburne's own idol, Hugo, are quite consistent with direct and natural diction. It is true that such diction shields no makeshifts, and the innumerable stanzas and passages which Swinburne beyond question wrote not primarily to express anything, but to fill up a difficult metrical scheme or to work off sets of novel rhymes, would look naked indeed without their screen of artifices. But the drawback of screens is that they hide strength as well as weakness. Compare two comparable things—the political poems of Swinburne and Hugo. What explains the immense superiority, which we must all feel, of the latter? Partly no doubt the vastly greater dynamic force of the Frenchman's personality. But is it not also in great measure Hugo's constant readiness to drop affectation? Is it not those direct sentences, said in plain words straight from the heart, which save Hugo from falsetto, and which keep convincing us, as Swinburne so seldom does, that the poet's feeling is just as strong as its expression?

There are far more aspects of this problem than can be discussed here. The charge which we have suggested cuts deep at the roots of most English poetry since the death of Byron. But one further point may be touched on. It may be pleaded that the poet writes not for to-day but for all time, and that a poetic diction, though to-day it can only be appreciated by cultured persons, may preserve its charm for similar persons through all generations. And once more appeal is made to Virgil; has not the diction which he matured done precisely this? The argument would have more weight if other conventions had not practically all failed where Virgil succeeded. In the history of poetic mannerisms his is quite an exception; the rule is that after the passing of the age which hall-marks them (not always the poet's own age; sometimes, as in Milton's case, a succeeding one), they become more and more a hindrance to the appreciation of the poets encumbered by them. Where is now the poetic diction of Pope and Johnson? Milton preferred the style of "Paradise Regained" to that of "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso"; do we? Even the Virgilian mannerism hardly succeeded except with Virgil. Statius, no doubt, we can some of us still relish, but chiefly for graces of his own; can any scholar really enjoy Valerius Flaccus or Silius Italicus? Even where an obsolete poetic diction does convey some charm to us after we have acquired a taste for it, this charm is not poetical. Many of us enjoy Pope's mannerism very much, but its effect is to diminish and not to augment the poetical significance which Pope has for us.

The qualities which confer immortality on a poet or any kind of writer are various and uncertain, and perhaps it is easiest to talk in negatives. It pretty clearly does not pay the aspirant to do certain things. It does not pay him to obscure and dilute his vocabulary with slang, as, for instance, Mr. Kipling has done. Equally it does not pay him to tie himself, as Swinburne and most of his contemporaries did, to a cultured mannerism which is sure to go out of fashion. By one or other of these handicaps so much modern English poetry is burdened that one is tempted to fear it may mean even less for posterity than it has for the mass of its contemporaries. And yet how much genuine inspiration and how very much cleverness have gone to its making!

Short Studies.

ROBINA AND MARRIAGE.

"She's a good woman," said Robina.

"Who's a good woman?" I asked.

"He's trying, I expect; although he is an old dear: to live with, I mean," continued Robina, addressing apparently the rising moon. "And then there are all those children."

"You are thinking of Mrs. St. Leonard?" I suggested.

"There seems no way of making her happy," explained Robina. "On Thursday I went round early in the morning to help Janie pack the baskets for the picnic. It was her own idea, the picnic."

"Speaking of picnics——" I said.

"You might have thought," went on Robina, "that she was dressing for her own funeral. She said she knew she was going to catch her death of cold, sitting on the wet grass. Something told her. I reminded her it hadn't rained for three weeks, and that everything was as dry as a bone, but she said that made no difference to grass. There was always a moisture in grass, and that cushions and all that only helped to draw it out. Not that it mattered. The end had to come, and so long as the others were happy—You know her style. Nobody ever thought of her. She was to be dragged here, dragged there. She talked about herself as if she were some sacred image. It got upon my nerves at last, so that I persuaded Janie to let me offer to stop at home with her. I wasn't too keen about going myself: not by that time."

"She was a charming girl," I said, "seven and twenty years ago, when St. Leonard fell in love with her. She had those dark, dreamy eyes so suggestive of veiled mysteries; and her lips must have looked bewitching when they pouted. I expect they often did. They do so still; but the pout of a woman of forty-six no longer fascinates. To a pretty girl of nineteen a spice of temper, an illogical unreasonableness are added attractions: the scratch of a blue-eyed kitten only tempts us to tease her the more. Young Herbert St. Leonard—he had curly brown hair, with a pretty trick of blushing, and was going to conquer the world—found her fretfulness, her very selfishness adorable: and told her so, kneeling before her, gazing into her bewildering eyes—only he called it her waywardness, her imperiousness; begged her for his sake to be more capricious. Told her how beautiful she looked when displeased. So, no doubt, she did—at nineteen."

"He didn't tell you all that, did he?" demanded Robina.

"Not a word," I reassured her, "except that she was acknowledged by all authorities to have been the most beautiful girl in Tunbridge Wells, and that her father had been ruined by a rascally solicitor. No; I was merely, to use the phrase of the French police courts, 'reconstructing the crime.'"

"It may be all wrong," grumbled Robina.

"It may be," I agreed. "But why? Does it strike you as improbable?"

We were sitting in the porch, waiting for Dick to come by the white path across the field.

"No," answered Robina. "It all sounds very probable. I wish it didn't."

"You must remember," I continued, "that I am an old playgoer. I have sat out so many of this world's dramas. It is as easy to reconstruct them backwards as forwards. We are witnessing the last act of the St. Leonard drama: that unsatisfactory last act that merely fills out time after the play is ended. The intermediate acts were probably more exciting, containing 'passionate scenes' played with much earnestness; chiefly for the amusement of the servants. But the first act, with the Kentish lanes and woods for a backcloth, must have been charming. Here was the devout lover she had heard of, dreamed of. It is delightful to be regarded as perfection—not absolute perfection, for that might put a strain upon us to live up to, but as so near perfection that to be more perfect would just spoil it. The spots upon us, that unappreciative friends and relations would magnify into blemishes, seen in their true light: artistic shading relieving a faultlessness that might otherwise prove too glaring. Dear Herbert found her excellent, just as she was, in every detail. It would have been a crime against Love for her to seek to change herself."

"Well, then, it was his fault," argued Robina. "If he was silly enough to like her faults, and encourage her in them——"

"What would you have had?" I asked. "A lover does not tell his mistress of her faults."

"Much more sensible if he did," grumbled Robina. "Then, if she cared for him, she could set to work to cure herself."

"You would like it?" I said. "You would appreciate it in your own case? Can you imagine young Bute——"

"Why young Bute?" demanded Robina. "What's he got to do with it?"

"Nothing," I answered, "except that he happens to be the first male creature you have ever come across since you were six that you haven't flirted with."

"I don't flirt with them," said Robina; "I merely try to be nice to them."

"With the exception of young Bute," I persisted.

"He irritates me," Robina explained.

"I was reading," I said, "the other day an account of the marriage customs prevailing among the Lower Caucasians. The lover takes his stand beneath his lady's window, and, having attracted her attention, proceeds to sing. And if she seems to like it—if she listens to it without getting mad, that means she doesn't want him. But if she gets upset about it, slams down the window and walks away, then it's all right. I think it's the Lower Caucasians."

"Must be a very silly people," said Robina; "I suppose a pail of water would be the highest proof of her affection he could hope for."

"A complex being, man," I agreed. "We will call him X. Can you imagine young X coming to you and saying: 'My dear Robina, you have many good qualities. You can be amiable—so long as you are having your own way in everything; but, thwarted, you can be just horrid. You are very kind—to those who are willing for you to be kind to them in your own way, which is not always their way. You can be unselfish—by fits and starts. You are capable and clever, but, like most capable and clever people, impatient and domineering; highly energetic when not happening to feel lazy; ready to forgive the moment your temper is exhausted. You are generous and frank, but if your object could only be gained through meanness or deceit, you would not hesitate a moment longer than was necessary to convince yourself that the circumstances justified the means. You are sympathetic, tender-hearted, and have a fine sense of justice; but I can see that tongue of yours, if not carefully watched, wearing decidedly shrewish. You've any amount of grit. A man might go tiger-hunting with you—with no one better; but you are obstinate, conceited, and exacting. In short, to sum you up, you have all the makings in you of an ideal wife, combined with faults sufficient to make a Socrates regret he'd ever married you.'"

"Yes, I would!" said Robina, springing to her feet. I could not see her face, but I knew there was the look upon it that made Primgate want to paint her as Joan of Arc; only it would never stop long enough. "I'd love him for talking like that. And I'd respect him. If he was that sort of man I'd pray God to help me to be the sort of woman he wanted me to be. I'd try. I'd try all day long. I would."

"I wonder," I said. Robina had surprised me. I admit it. I thought I knew the sex better.

"Any girl would," said Robina. "He'd be worth it."

"It would be a new idea," I mused. "Gott in Himmel, what a new world might it not create." The fancy began to take hold of me. "Love no longer blind. Love refusing any more to be the poor blind fool: sport of gods and men. Love no longer passion's slave. His bonds broken, the senseless bondage flung aside. Love helping Life instead of muddling it. Marriage, the foundation of civilisation, no longer reared upon the sands of lies and illusions, but grappled to the rock of truth—reality. Have you ever read Tom Jones?" I said.

"No," answered Robina; "I've always heard it wasn't a nice book."

"It isn't," I said. "Man isn't a nice animal, not all of him. Nor woman either. There's a deal of the beast in man. What can you expect? Till a few paltry thousands of years ago he was a beast, fighting with other beasts, his fellow denizens of the woods and caves; watching for his prey, crouched in the long grass of the river's bank, tearing it with claws and teeth, growling as he ate. So he lived and died through the dim unnamed ages, transmitting his beast's blood, his bestial instincts, to his offspring, growing ever stronger, fiercer from generation to generation, while the rocks piled up their strata and the oceans shaped their beds. Moses! Why, Lord Rothschild's great grandfather, a few score times removed, must have known Moses, talked with him. Babylon! It is a modern city, fallen into disuse just for the moment, owing to temporary alteration of the traffic routes. History! It is a tale of to-day. Man was crawling about the world on all fours, learning to be an animal, for millions of years before the secret of his birth was whispered to him. It is only during the last few centuries that he has been trying to be a man. Our modern Morality! Why, compared with the teachings of Nature, it is but a few days old. What do you expect? That he shall forget the lessons of the æons at the bidding of the hours?"

"Then you advise me to read Tom Jones?" said Robina.

"Yes," I said, "I do. I should not if I thought you were still a child, knowing only blind trust, or blind terror. The sun is not extinguished because occasionally obscured by mist; the scent of the rose is not dead because of the worm in the leaf. A healthy rose can afford a few worms—has got to, anyhow. All men are not Tom Joneses. The standard of masculine behavior continues to go up. Many of us make fine efforts to conform to it, and some of us succeed. But the Tom Jones is there in all of us who are not anaemic or consumptive. And there's no sense at all in getting cross with us about it, because we cannot help it. We are doing our best. In another hundred thousand years or so, provided all goes well, we shall be the perfect man. And seeing our early training, I flatter myself that, up to the present, we have done remarkably well."

"Nothing like being satisfied with oneself," said Robina.

"I'm not satisfied," I said, "I'm only hopeful. But it irritates me when I hear people talk as though man had been born a white-souled angel and was making supernatural efforts to become a sinner. That seems to me the way to discourage him. What he wants is bucking up; somebody to say to him, 'Bravo. Why this is splendid. Just think, my boy, what you were, and that not so very long ago: an unwashed hairy savage; your law that of the jungle, your morals those of the rabbit-warren. Now look at yourself; dressed in your little shiny hat, your trousers neatly creased, walking with your wife to church on Sunday. Keep on—that's all you've got to do. In a few more centuries your own mother Nature won't know you.'"

"You women," I continued, "why a handful of years ago we bought and sold you, kept you in cages, took the stick to you when you were not spry in doing what you were told. Did you ever read the history of Patient Griselda?"

"Yes," said Robina, "I have." I gathered from her tone that the Joan of Arc expression had departed. Had Primgate wanted to paint her at that particular moment I should have suggested Katharine—during the earlier stages—listening to a curtain lecture from Petruchio. "Are you suggesting that all women should take her for a model?"

"No," I said. "I'm not. Though were we living in Chaucer's time I might; and you would not think it even silly. What I'm impressing upon you is that the human race has yet a little way to travel before the average man can be regarded as an up-to-date edition of King Arthur—the King Arthur of the poetical legend, I mean. Don't be too impatient with him."

"Thinking what a beast he has been ought to make him impatient with himself," considered Robina. "He ought to be feeling so ashamed of himself as to be willing to do anything."

The owl in the old yew screamed, whether with indignation or amusement I cannot tell.

"And woman?" I said, "had the power been hers, would she have used it to sweeter purpose? Where is your evidence? Your Cleopatras, Pompadours, Jezebels, your Catherines of Russia, late Empresses of China, your Faustines of all ages and all climes, your Mother Brownriggs, your Lucretia Borgias, Salomes—I could weary you with names. Your Roman task mistresses; your drivers of lodging-house slaveys; your ladies who whipped their pages to death in the Middle Ages; your modern dames of fashion, decked with the plumage of the tortured grove! There have been other women also, noble women, their names like beacon lights studding the dark waste of history. So there have been noble men: saints, martyrs, heroes! The sex line divides us physically, not morally. Woman has been man's accomplice in too many crimes to claim to be his judge. Male and female created He them: like and like, for good and evil."

By good fortune I found a loose match. I lighted a fresh cigar.

"Dick, I suppose, is the average man?" said Robina.

"Most of us are," I said, "when we are at home. Carlyle was the average man in the little front parlor in Cheyne Row, though to hear fools talk you might think no married couple outside literary circles had ever been known to exchange a cross look. So was Oliver Cromwell in his own palace with the door shut. Mrs. Cromwell must have thought him monstrous silly, placing sticky sweetmeats for his guests to sit on: told him so most likely. A cheery, kindly man, notwithstanding, though given to moods. He and Mrs. Cromwell seem to have rubbed along, on the whole, pretty well together. Old Sam Johnson, great, God-fearing, lovable, cantankerous old brute! Life with him, in a small house on a limited income, must have had its ups and downs. Milton and Frederick the Great were, one hopes, a little below the average. Did their best, no doubt—lacked understanding. Not so easy as it looks, living up to the standard of the average man. Very clever people, in particular, find it tiring."

"I shall never marry," said Robina. "At least, I hope I shan't."

"Why 'hope'?" I asked.

"Because I hope I shall never be idiot enough," she answered. "I see it all so clearly. I wish I didn't. Love!"

"It's only a trick of Nature to make fools of us all," she went on. "He will tell me I am all the world to him; that his love will outlive the stars: will believe it himself at the time, poor fellow. He will call me a hundred pretty names, will kiss my feet and hands. And if I'm fool enough to listen to him it may last—" she laughed—it was rather an ugly laugh—"six months, with luck perhaps a year, if I'm careful not to go out in the east wind and come home with a red nose, and never let him catch me in curl-papers. It will not be me that he will want—only my youth, and the novelty of me, and the mystery. And when that is gone——"

She turned to me. It was a strange face I saw then in the pale light—quite a fierce little face.

I drew her down beside me. But the childish face was still stern.

"I want the truth," she said; so that I answered very gravely:

"When the passion is passed, when the glory and the wonder of Desire, Nature's eternal ritual of marriage, solemnising, sanctifying it to her commands, is ended—when, sooner or later, some gray dawn finds you wandering bewildered in once familiar places, seeking vainly the lost palace of youth's dreams—when Love's frenzy is faded, like the fragrance of the blossom, like the splendor of the dawn, there will remain to you—just what was there before; no more, no less. If passion was all you had to give to one another, God help you. You have had your hour of madness. It is finished. If greed of praise and worship was your price—well, you have had your payment. The bargain is complete. If mere hope to be made happy was your lure, one pities you. We do not make each other happy. Happiness is the gift of the gods, not of man. The secret lies within you, not without. What remains to you will depend not upon what you thought, but upon what you are. If behind the lover there was the man—behind the impossible goddess of his love-sick brain, some honest human woman; then life lies not behind you, but before you."

"Life is giving, not getting. That is the mistake we most of us set out with. It is the work that is the joy, not the wages; the game, not the score. The lover's delight is to yield, not to claim. The crown of motherhood is pain. To serve the State at cost of ease and leisure; to spend his thought and labor upon a hundred schemes is the man's ambition. Life is doing, not having. It is to gain the peak the climber strives, not to possess it. Fools marry, thinking what they are going to get out of it. Good store of joys and pleasure, opportunities for self-indulgence, eternal soft caresses—the wages of the wanton. The rewards of marriage are toil, duty, responsibility—manhood, womanhood. Love's baby talk you will have outgrown. You will no longer be his 'Goddess,' 'Angel,' 'Popsy Wopsy,' 'Queen of his Heart.' There are finer names than these: wife, mother, priestess in the temple of Humanity. Marriage is renunciation, the sacrifice of Self upon the altar of the race. 'A trick of Nature' you call it. Perhaps. But a trick of Nature compelling you to surrender yourself to the purposes of God."

JEROME K. JEROME.

SOLITARY CONFINEMENT.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE HOME SECRETARY.

II.

BY JOHN GALSWORTHY.

Now, Sir, in regard to the object of solitary confinement we have surely no need to go behind the finding of your Committee:—

"It would appear that the main object of the separate" (closed cell) "confinement had come to be deterrence. . . . In effect this is the purpose which it must be regarded as now designed to serve."

In regard to its nature we have, as surely, no need of other description than its supporter's, the late Sir Edmund Du Cane's: "An artificial state of existence absolutely opposed to that which Nature points out as the condition of mental, moral, and physical health."

The questions arising, then, are two:—

(a) Is this practice of solitary confinement, in fact, deterrent?

(b) Has a civilised nation the right to retain offenders for months in a state of existence absolutely opposed to mental, moral, and physical health, even for the purpose of deterrence?

To question (a), after noting that no support can be gathered for the plea of deterrence from the statistics of penal servitude, I remark that the nature of their coming punishment is too vaguely known to those who have never been in prison for the thought of solitary confinement to have any deterrent effect whatever on ninety-nine out of a hundred first offenders. An unanswerable proof, indeed, that it is not sufficiently present to any man's mind is afforded by the fact that the most humane public in the Western world knows and thinks so little about the suffering of solitary confinement as to have allowed it to remain part of their prison system. With regard to those who either in penal servitude or in hard labor sentences, have already undergone solitary confinement, it is to be noted that mere severity of punishment has never been proved to be a factor of deterrence. When men were hung for horse or sheep stealing those offences were far more prevalent than they are now. The proportion of sailors, who, after experiencing the bitter sufferings of a winter passage round Cape Horn, are deterred by those sufferings from repeating the experience, is infinitesimal.

It is further to be noted that the effect of a period of solitary confinement which comes at the beginning of long years of imprisonment is inevitably wiped out by the monotony of the prison life which follows. Mechanical adjustment to environment is always going on in the human being. Solitary confinement is a smothering process to which the mind must adapt itself, or perish. The mental demoralisation remains after the confinement comes to an end, but the consciousness of that mental ruin, the consciousness of the suffering, has become dulled; from his closed cell the convict passes on to the ordinary prison life, actually unable to appreciate the extent of the suffering he has undergone. It is obvious, moreover, that deterrence (if there be deterrence) paid for by mental and moral weakening is not true deterrence; for the acquired power of resistance to crime, if any, is nullified through deterioration of the prisoner's fibre.

The true deterrence of imprisonment lies in the general fear of loss of liberty; in that nightmare of a thought, all details of impending punishment (even if known) mechanically merge.

This solitary confinement, however, is sometimes justified, on the ground that it is necessary to buoy the convict up with hope. It is thought that by placing him at the outset in the seventh hell of pain we lessen his sufferings in the minor hells which await him at the expiration of those first six months. That, Sir, is humanity with a vengeance. It would be curious to see a social life to which this principle was logically applied. The husband would beat the wife that she might not so greatly feel the inevitable wear and tear of matrimony; the mother would starve the child that it might experience with more equanimity the ordinary pangs of hunger. The master would withhold wages that the servant might more duly appreciate the receipt of what was due to him. It appears, indeed, to be almost what is called a vicious principle.

To question (b) Whether a civilised country has the right to retain its offenders in a state of existence absolutely opposed to mental, moral, and physical health, even for the sake of a supposed deterrence—I conceive, Sir, but this one answer: Only so long as we do not realise what this solitary confinement of convicts means.

Six months is a short time to a free man, it is an eternity to a prisoner confined in solitude. One hundred and eighty days—four thousand one hundred and forty hours, of utter solitude and utter silence in a cell, which—in the words of Sir Robert Anderson (XIXth Century, March, 1902)—"differs from every other sort of apartment designed for human habitation, in that all view of external nature, such as might soothe, and possibly alleviate, the mind, is, with elaborate care, excluded"—solitude broken only by one hour a day of chapel, and walking up and down a yard; by the sight of a warder, three times or so a day, bringing in food; by a rare ten minutes' visit from an overdriven chaplain or governor.

Four thousand hours of utter solitude in a closed space some twelve feet by seven—with the prospect of anything from two to twenty years of monotonous routine and loss of liberty to follow! Can a Public Opinion, which succeeds in bringing these facts home to its imagination, justly say that two-and-a-half to twenty years of loss of liberty, with all that this means in prison, is not sufficient punishment for any crime that man can commit, without the preliminary agony of four thousand hours of solitude in a closed space twelve feet by seven?

Sir, Public Opinion has never yet succeeded in realising what this so-called separate confinement means. In the year ending March, 1907, we set 1,035 persons, of whom 691 had never been sentenced to penal servitude before, to endure this four thousand odd hours of agony and demoralisation. In the year ending March, 1908, we set another 1,179 to endure the same, 749 of them for the first time. At the present moment, another thousand, more or less, are undergoing it.

In thus subjecting year by year a thousand persons to six months of an "artificial state of existence absolutely opposed to that which Nature points out as the condition of mental, moral, and physical health," we are annually committing an offence against our reason, of which we reap the full reward in the mental, moral, and physical deterioration of persons already weak and demoralised enough; and an offence against our humanity in reality as great as if we had placed them on the rack.

I by no means lose sight, Sir, of the fact that this closed cell confinement falls with different effect on different temperaments; it falls, no doubt, far less heavily on the sluggish and the brutalised than on the nervous types, of which, however, we are now breeding vast numbers. But, Sir, even the habitual criminal—popularly supposed to dread flogging more than anything—has been known while enduring solitary confinement to beg for the lash in place of it. Sir J. Jebb, giving evidence before the Penal Servitude Acts Commission in 1863, uses these words: "With burglars and reckless bad characters I think that separate confinement is dreaded more than any other kind of discipline." And in regard to its other effects on the habitual criminal, the words of Professor Prins, above quoted, are sufficiently significant. In the face of them it cannot be denied that the sluggish brutality of many recidivists is produced in the first place by this very process of closed cell confinement. Man, even the lowest type of man, is a social and gregarious animal—all that is best in him depends on, and is brought out by, contact with his fellow-creatures; if that be not so, our religion and whole social scheme are falsely conceived. Deprive man of all contact with his fellow man, shut him in upon himself, hopelessly, utterly, month by month, and not one in a hundred men—I say it as a professional student of men—but will come out of that artificial existence lower and more brutal than when he entered it. Prolonged starvation and agony of the mind is worse than starvation and agony of the body, carrying, as it does, the wreck of the body with it.

We have the right to restrain offenders, and to safeguard society; in doing this we unavoidably punish with that already terrible punishment "loss of liberty." But, sir, we have—surely—not the right to inflict unnecessary and harmful suffering. I use these words, recognising to the full that there is no lack of humanity among those who work our prison system; recognising to the full that they would not willingly inflict any suffering that they acknowledged to be unnecessary; but also recognising, what is true in every department of life, that those who administer a system are, in the nature of things, with rare exceptions, too habituated to that system, too close to it, to be able to see it in due perspective.

I desire to submit it to you, Sir, and to the common sense of the Public, whether harmful and unnecessary suffering must not inevitably be endured by the mind, and through the mind by the body, of a man or woman, during four thousand hours of closed cell confinement. To answer that question fairly, each member of the public has but to ask what would be the effect on himself or herself of six months' utter seclusion (except for one hour each day) from all sight and sound not only of human beings, but of animals, trees, flowers, and from the sight even of the sky, all but a patch no bigger than a tea-tray. We are a humane people; and it is not a question of our humanity. It is a question of our imaginations. The position is plainly this: No blame rests on those who have to work our prison system, for they could not do so at all if they allowed their imaginations fair play. No blame rests on the community, for they are too aloof to realise what that prison system means. And so, Sir, the unnecessary demoralisation and suffering caused by this closed cell confinement goes on at the rate of (for convicts alone) some 4,000,000 hours a year!

I do not base the appeal of this letter on humanity, I base it on common sense. Why, when we are faced with such appalling statistics of criminality, with such appalling difficulties in dealing with, and reforming criminals, do we deliberately continue a practice which both evidence and reason tell us, contributes to the more complete demoralisation of such as are already demoralised?

In the Report of your Departmental Committee of 1895 occur these words:—

"It should be the object of the prison authorities through the prison staff and any suitable auxiliary effort that can be employed, to humanise the prisoners, to prevent them from feeling that the State merely chains them for a certain period and cares nothing about them beyond keeping them in safe custody and under iron discipline."

And again: ". . . it strengthens our belief that the main fault of our prison system is that it treats prisoners too much as irreclaimable criminals, instead of reclaimable men and women."

I submit that no unprejudiced man can regard this closed cell confinement as a humanising influence, except in the rarest cases, or maintain that it helps to reclaim men and women.

I refer again to this paragraph in the Report of your Committee: "It" (the six months' detention of convicts in closed cell confinement at local prisons) "is certainly a practical convenience in the sense that the expense of sending convicts immediately after sentence to convict prisons, either singly or in detachments, is curtailed by the system of gathering prisons. This consideration alone is not sufficient to justify the practice."

I am credibly informed that the whole matter is one of administration, and can be modified without Act of Parliament. I appeal, then, to you, Sir, who have already done so much towards reforming our prison system, to work for the abandonment of this custom of confining convicts in closed cells for six months, or any less period, either in local, or in convict prisons; to substitute therefor work in association from the commencement of sentence; or, where such is not immediately possible, work in separate cells with open doors. And I would further appeal to you to advocate the reduction of twenty-eight days' closed cell confinement endured by prisoners serving sentences of hard labor.

Than this great and necessary reform, I can conceive none that will, at a single stroke, remove so much harmful and unnecessary suffering, or do more to reconcile our Penal Laws with Justice and Common Sense.—Yours faithfully,

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

[ERRATUM.—The present term of solitary confinement served by women convicts is, or was, four months, not six.]

The Drama.

THE "HARMSWORTH BRAND" AGAIN.

IT is not surprising that, after crying out for a drama of life and reality, our leading critics of the stage, or some of them, are unhappy now that they have got or are getting it. This is the way of mankind. When spirits rise at our call from the imaginative deeps, and fail to assume the shape in which we wished them to appear, we dislike the phantom, and perhaps disown the invocation. I trace this feeling in the cold welcome meted out by some of our writers to Mr. Fagan's play, "The Earth," and Mr. Arnold Bennett's treatment of the same theme in "What the Public Wants." There is Mr. Walkley, for example, in whose active memory live all the dramatic types of our age, and who can classify and label that astonishing collection of mummies with the most adroit and amusing effects. But Mr. Walkley will not allow that certain things exist, or that, if they do, they are worth putting on the stage. For example, he politely but firmly declines to believe in the Potteries. I think he has no faith in the existence of the English provinces, though he accepts parts of Scotland by looking at them with the eye of faith lent him pro hâc vice by Mr. J. M. Barrie. He has blank misgivings as to the existence of hypothetical tribes of men reported of east of Aldgate and west of West Kensington. Above all, he will not allow that the scheme of life contains any such created object as a Newspaper Proprietor, least of all a Proprietor remotely resembling Sir Felix Janion in "The Earth" or Sir Charles Worgan in "What the Public Wants." Confronted with these unhealthy dreams, Mr. Walkley retires to the normal life of British stageland, covering his retreat with epigrams.

What, therefore, explains this persistent concern of our young playwrights with such social trifles as the tendency of newspapers to be grouped under the ownership of one or two men with the power, to borrow a phrase from Mr. Fagan, of living vicariously in the street of busy common life, now and then descending to the gutter, and again flying as high as—let us say—Printing House Square itself? Is there nothing here to concern the stage moralist, the stage realist? For example, might not the existence of such a force incidentally affect some factors in modern existence—its religion, its politics, the tone and character of its literary and dramatic criticism? If it were worked very cruelly and unscrupulously, might it not set up blackmailing inquisitions into the private affairs of public men? And if it were exercised purely for commercial ends, would it not sadly cheapen the tone of the newspaper, banishing independence, sincerity, distinction, making the advertiser king, and setting up the business of catching and fixing the common fancy as the sole aim of the journalist? Is there not here dramatic stuff in plenty, yielding the very form and pressure of the times and holding the mirror up to their nature?

So at least think our young dramatists, and a fair number of the theatre-going public seem to think with them. Now this is surely an effort of the dramatic spirit to live, to find its sphere of influence, to be in with the movement of things, and therefore it should be encouraged. Mr. Arnold Bennett, indeed, does not make his satire on yellow journalism the sole motive of his new play "What the Public Wants," for he links it on to the line of portraiture in which he excels, his pictures, namely, of certain middle-class provincial types. He is, in a word, a thorough-going realist, eager to get on to his canvas a number of truthful sketches of certain hard, limited people, living "dismal illiberal lives," in middle England, but living them thoroughly and rather well. These two aims mingle and to some degree conflict with each other in "What the Public Wants." Mr. Bennett's newspaper millionaire comes from the Potteries. He is a chip of the old ware, and thus far he is not thoroughly characteristic of the "Harmsworth brand." He has no imagination. He is a very slightly magnified image of the common man he "caters" for, running his big newspaper shop on the principle of giving the public what they want. Testing these wants by circulation, he finds they require sensations, crime stories, popular religion. These he provides. Art he leaves out, and morals, and "culture." A vague love motive for an ineffectual pretty woman makes him feel the want of them, the "blind side" of his character. This again leads him back to the provincial stock from which he came. Coarsened by his great business "principle" beyond the average Bursley hardness, he sees nothing improper in weaving into a series of "Crimes of Passion," appearing in one of his Sunday journals, a recital of an old Bursley murder in which friends of his family were concerned. His sweetheart can coax him into cancelling "The Downes Murder Case"; but he cannot even understand the reproaches of his Bursley relatives; the instinct for circulation has swallowed up all delicacy, even the old provincial family and class feeling. The end of this must be the loss of his artistically minded lady-love; piqued but soon consoled, he abandons love and sham culture together, and throws himself with a fresh ardor into the ever fascinating study of the "largest circulation."

Mr. Bennett draws his picture of mœurs de province with his usual deliberate, rather cynical, skill, now and then with close touches of nature, seeking always to make all these peoples move on their accustomed plane, talk their day-by-day language, rise no higher and sink no lower than their nature and environment permit. His satire on the Yellow Press and the modern commercial drama loses itself a little in these subtleties; and Mr. Fagan's presents the more direct, popular, dramatically expressed challenge to the audience. In a sense he is wrong; the new journalism comes from America rather than from the Potteries, and it was conceived and built up by a slightly more imaginative type of man than his Sir Charles Worgan seems to be. He has got its governing ideas and policy right; but he declines to give to them the sharp, violent, concentrated issues which Mr. Fagan provides. And he has not secured a great actor like Mr. McKinnel to interpret his enterpreneur from the Potteries. Mr. Hearn's Sir Charles Worgan does not suggest power and sinister purpose; a timid, pompous, appealing snobbishness, and imitative culture-worship, almost blot out the bolder lines of the character, and the artist could not restore them. And the play should move quicker; the new journalism is rapid enough in all conscience, and Mr. Bennett should have got something of its "hum" and swing into the first and last acts. But the satire is excellent, even if a little over-done (the Yellow Press, for example, would not exchange its religious and its sporting editors; it keeps both these specialists in their places, neither confounding their functions nor dividing their substance). And he takes higher ground than Mr. Fagan when he makes his play centre in the main in a battle between art and cheap-jackery.

H. W. M.

---

Art.

PICTURES AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

The authorised critics of an Academy Exhibition are generally expected to inform the public of the feature or features by which that exhibition may be remembered in years to come. Such information, moreover, must be expressed in the tritest phrase, since the public in matters of art have no leisure to digest any but the tritest; it must be a phrase that is comprehensive and pithy at any cost, and truthful if it can. Now critics, like most other people, are not averse from saving themselves trouble, and as a formula is not a troublesome thing to adopt and adapt to all manner of purposes, it is a formula by which many critics seek to express the character of an Academy Exhibition. This formula embodies the pronouncement that it is somebody's or something's year at the Academy. To give a few illustrations, we have heard on recent occasions of portrait and landscape years, of an "outsiders'" year, and of a Sargent year. It should be said in explanation of the not very happy description, "An Outsiders' Year," that the Exhibition contained three or four prominent pictures by as many clever young men, and this fact was held to be sufficient justification for the label. A Sargent year is, of course, self-explanatory. It is understood to mean that Mr. Sargent exhibits his full quota of big portraits of big personages, and that these are satisfying in respect of æsthetic quality and social interest alike.

There are certain drawbacks to this method of summarising an Academy. The principal one is that as time goes on, and wisdom is slowly but surely pumped into the heads of hanging committees, it becomes increasingly difficult to make the formula fit. The various sections of the paintings tend to become more evenly balanced, and, among individual artists, the general levelling up in respect of quality makes it harder and harder to say, without a twinge of conscience, that one man is so far superior to his fellows that his work is the distinctive feature of the exhibition. One feels this difficulty in the case of the exhibition just opened—the difficulty of finding a formula-like phrase that does justice to its character. It is not particularly a year of landscapes or portraits, of Academicians or outsiders; it is not even a particularly good year or a bad one. It is not a Sargent year, at any rate, not in the accepted sense, since of this artist's four contributions only two are portraits; he is disqualified on numerical grounds. Were one possessed of easy scruples, one might call it a year of political portraits; for have not Mr. S. J. Solomon, Sir Luke Fildes, and Mr. Harold Speed given us a Cabinet Minister apiece, for all the world to talk about? Yet the conscientious person cannot but feel that nothing less than the whole Cabinet on canvas would, considering the size of the total exhibition, justify such a description. So one is reluctantly obliged to give up the idea of general description by phrase or formula, and proceed straight to some matters of detail that are likely to thrust themselves upon the intelligent visitor's notice.

It may be observed, in the first place, that neither Mr. Abbey nor Mr. Brangwyn exhibits this year. Their absence is a serious one for the Academy, since they are among the very few artists in this country who are capable of painting large pictures in the way these should be painted. The question is that of scale; and we are reminded by the present exhibition of how far we still are from appreciating its importance. In monumental painting it is not enough that a large area of canvas should be covered with color, that the color should be harmonious, and that the brush-work should be bold in proportion to the size; it is necessary that there should be a big subject bigly conceived and perfectly designed. At any rate, perfect design is a paramount condition of success, since imperfections in this respect, which, like inaccuracies in drawing, might escape observation in a modest-sized picture through the insistence of some good quality of color, magnify themselves unforgettably in the work of great scale. There are many large pictures here that fail simply in respect of design, and—design being inextricably connected with scale—in point of scale. Mr. L. Campbell Taylor, for instance, has made the mistake in his "Bedtime" of expanding a modest genre subject into a very considerable canvas; Mr. Harrington Mann's "The Workroom," and Miss Anna Airy's "The Scandalmongers," are other examples of misplaced expansion without the necessary power of design. Mrs. Laura Knight's "The Beach" may at the first glance appear to succeed, in spite of its lack of design, for it has beautiful qualities of atmosphere, of liquid sunshine and melting shadow, and of animated movement; it breathes the very spirit of happy youth at play. Only on analysis is the movement seen to be arrested, as it were by a camera, and the design to be at fault.

We take these cases from the rank and file; indeed, it is only among the rank and file that they are found in any number. Your average Academician knows his limitations at any rate, and, as a rule, avoids perilous experiments. Consider, for a moment, Sir L. Alma-Tadema's delightful little essay in marble, bath towels, and sponges, "A Favorite Custom," which the Chantrey Trustees have purchased. It is the latest of a series of similar small pictures exhibited by this artist in the same place; he has painted but few big pictures in recent years, and it is a long while since he favored the Academy exhibition with one. The logic of this course is obvious. Why, indeed, having found his métier and his scale, should he depart from either? It is right logic, and equally right is the decision of the Trustees that a fancy price be paid for this small work, rather than for an Alma-Tadema five times the size. Assuming that the artist has a right to be represented at the Tate Gallery, it was surely better that he be paid handsomely for the small work that he can do handsomely, rather than for the large one that he cannot. The same savoir faire may be attributed to the majority of other Academicians, and to several Associates. They are often charged with repeating themselves unnecessarily, but an alternative, in the shape of novelty, would in many cases bring sure disaster to safe public reputations. As matters are, theirs is the reward of consistency: the penalty is that, as regards the enthusiasms of an ever-changing populace, they must mostly give place to the younger generation, the generation of new artistic ambitions and indiscretions. As the years pass, this rising generation is making its presence felt more and more at the Academy. The present exhibition is an astonishing revelation of the fact; with some few honorable exceptions, its interest and opportunities for speculation are provided by the new men.

There are, however, Academicians of long standing who, if they furnish nothing absolutely new, retain a welcome freshness. Sir W. Q. Orchardson is one of these, and his two portraits, the "Mrs. Moss-Cockle" and the "Sir Lawrence Jenkins," are staggering expositions of an art controlled within the limits of a restricted palette, and worked out to its extremes of finesse. The first-named picture is the more searching of the two; perhaps it is a little too searching—the introspective painting of the eyes gives one a sense of uncanniness. Honestly, we prefer the second work, which, with all its curiously old-world air, is distinguished chiefly by its modern science in the scheme of black and white and subtle grey, buff, and crimson, and by its noble simplicity of arrangement. The portrait compares with the best in the gallery—even with Mr. Sargent's "Earl of Wemyss," which is more likely to be talked about as the picture of the year. Certainly the latter is a big accomplishment. It has much of the sombre dignity of a Velasquez, and character is expressed in every line of it, in the lean square-shouldered figure as well as in the keen face. And the seriousness of it is emphasised by one's memory of the same artist's "Mrs. Astor" in the first gallery, for this, in its delicacy of white and salmon pink, very adroit, very winsome, is just a Sargent; by that of the "Cashmere" in the Gem Room, whose whole seductiveness, which is very great indeed, does not allow one to forget that it is just a beautiful study; and by the big lunette "Israel and the Law," which suggests, rather than proves, that the artist's adaptiveness extends even into the art of pure design. In completeness, then, the "Earl of Wemyss" may be pronounced Mr. Sargent's chef d'œuvre for this year—and who remain among the Academic portrait-painters? With a slight bias in favor of interesting subjects, one might praise Mr. S. J. Solomon's "The Prime Minister," Sir Luke Fildes's more precise "Mr. Lloyd George," the virile "Sir John Brunner" of Sir Hubert Herkomer, and Mr. Speed's "Mr. John Burns" before one turns elsewhere in search of beauty or accomplishment. Yet one need not elaborate the praise.

The portraiture, on the whole, is sound rather than brilliant; we could point to fifty portraits, each of which is as sound as the other, but we cannot recall one other that belongs to the special rank of those we have already specified. So with the landscapes, admirable examples as there are of Mr. East, Mr. Aumonier, Mr. Clausen; and with the seascapes which, beyond the fact that Mr. David Murray is painting the sea and Mr. Hemy is not painting yachts or fishing-smacks, except in the water-color room, call for no particular comment. At the subject pictures, however, one may cry halt, if only for a brief space. In the third gallery Mr. Edward Stott has a picture of "The Flight" into Egypt, a gloaming landscape with figures rather than a subject picture, yet pregnant with subject interest; a biblical picture conceived with Rembrandtesque simplicity and executed in a spirit of poetic reverence; an old subject made new with reticent harmonies of color and tender handling. Then, in Room I., Mr. Frank Dicksee, whose art is often apt to hover on the border line between theatrical and dramatic force, reaches something like noble religious drama in "The Shadowed Face"; one cannot but be moved by its intensity. Mr. George Lambert, too, with his group of sporting figures on "Mearbeck Moor, Yorkshire," in Room VIII., triumphantly vindicates his right to make subject subservient to decoration, interest out of broad planes of sombre color, life itself a beautifully-balanced arrangement of tones and half-tones. And, to retrace our steps to the first room, and to what perhaps is the most seductive, as well as the most delightfully pagan, picture in the whole Academy, Mr. Charles Sims has taken "The Night Piece to Julia" from Herrick and has translated it into a color poem of his own. He is no illustrator of Herrick; the audacious variations he has introduced disabuse one of that idea: he has simply made the elemental sentiment of the poet the peg on which to hang a theme of feminine voluptuousness, of putti and elves and shooting stars, a sweet, suave melody of rainbow colors. We repeat that it is not an illustration to Herrick; it would be equally easy to think of it in connection with "Midsummer Night's Dream," with the inhabitants of that Shakespearean fairyland reinforced by a dim quaker figure and a silver white peacock. It is the product of a joyous, if slightly irresponsible, imagination, and the proof of a genuine power, unhappily rare, to conceive in terms of paint.

Letters from Abroad.

THE END OF THE BÜLOW BLOC?

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—On Saturday last the special Commission of the Reichstag on Imperial Finance rejected in repeated divisions the new proposals to cover a moderate portion of the deficit of 500 to 600 millions of marks by an increased tax on inheritances. This brings us very near a crisis which in the logical course of events would result either in the resignation of Prince Bülow or in the dissolution of the Reichstag and a new General Election.

The meaning of the vote is clear enough, and admits only one interpretation. The Conservatives and the Catholics—the latter assisted by the Poles—have combined in opposition, just as at a former division they cooperated in the stifling of the estate duty in the form first proposed by the Government. These three groups obstinately resist any measure that would tax the inheritances, be they ever so large, of husband or wife and direct descendants.

Now, some such taxation is, as things stand, almost indispensable, if wealth is to any considerable degree to bear a share of the new impost. Of Imperial taxes on incomes and property neither the majority of the Reichstag nor the federated Governments will hear, and the substitute for the succession duties proposed by the Conservatives and their allies in the shape of an Imperial tax on unearned increments is of too doubtful a character to be regarded as an equivalent source of revenue. There is even an aspect of bunkum about it.

The allied agrarian reactionaries recommend a tax on unearned increments on movable and immovable property. Profits on stocks and shares are to be taxed as well as profits on sites and other lands, agricultural land to be, of course, treated with due consideration. The first suggestion—the taxation of profits on stocks and shares—has, for obvious reasons, been declared inacceptable by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Committee have consequently only asked the federated Governments to take this point into consideration. Much more peremptory is their language in regard to the second point. They urge the federated Governments at once to draw up a Bill for the taxation of unearned increments on the value of immovables. But it is doubtful whether the federated Governments, even if they are inclined to do so, will be able to outline a workable measure that would yield the required millions. The mere fact that Germany is a federated Empire makes the task a very difficult one. Hitherto the taxation on immovables has been left to the States and the municipalities, and several of the latter do already tax unearned increments. Both bodies have the machinery ready for such taxation. But for the Empire it would have to be created at a considerable cost. And the experience of the municipalities which impose this tax is that the revenue from it fluctuates more than that from most other taxes.

The semi-official "Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung," in its issue of Saturday night, indeed passes over the question of this tax as a matter not worth considering, and says of the vote of the Finance Committee that "it has only proved the impossibility of providing an adequate substitute for the taxation of the inheritances of husbands and wives and children." On the federated basis of the Empire no other suitable taxation of wealth could be found, and consequently it is absolutely necessary to stick to this tax and to press its acceptance, all difficulties and resistances notwithstanding. With this determination "all political parties will now have to reckon. THE SITUATION IS EXTREMELY GRAVE. . . . The reform must now be settled. The nation demands it from the Reichstag. The early despatch has become a QUESTION OF NATIONAL HONOR. If the majority of the Reichstag fails in this task, incalculable consequences will be the result."

It is long since a threat of this kind appeared in the Ministerial Press. What is the position? At present hardly more than 150 members of the Reichstag can be relied on to vote for the financial Bill as a whole if it assumes the shape now advocated by the Government. Some twenty members are waverers. The forty-three Social Democrats who in Committee voted for the taxation of inheritances as part of their programme will, on the final vote, reject the Bill, because of the 400 millions of marks of indirect taxes; 105 Catholics and twenty Poles are determined opponents of the taxes on inheritances, and are almost sure not to recede from this opposition. Thus, as the Reichstag consists of 397 members, from two-thirds to three-fourths of the fifty-nine Conservatives are required to secure the Government a majority. But up to the present not more than fifteen have shown any disposition for a compromise. If their number is not increased to about forty to forty-five the conflict seems inevitable.

In politics nothing is impossible. But it can be said with some certainty that so many of the Conservatives are very unlikely to yield. They risk little if they persist in their opposition. Elected for the most part in agricultural divisions, they are pretty sure of their seats, since they are backed by the strongly organised agriculturists, and the Government will hardly make serious war on them. They count on their indispensable rôle as the traditional bodyguard of the Hohenzollern monarchy. This is, by the way, one of the reasons why a dissolution is not so sure a thing as it would appear to the outsider. A dissolution pure and simple will hardly bring a solution of the difficulties of the situation. An appeal to the electorate would, at the present moment, in all probability bring the Catholics and the Poles back in their former strength, the Socialists in increased numbers, the Conservatives little, if at all, weakened. In that case the upholders of the Bülow compromise, the Liberals and the Freisseinige might be the losers. And this will certainly not improve matters for the financial reform as now proposed.

But perhaps Prince Bülow has more than a pure dissolution in his mind when he directs his organ to point to "incalculable consequences." He may be thinking of a second dissolution to follow the first, should the new Reichstag not prove more amenable than the old one. He may be contemplating an appeal to the Nationalist sentiment of the German people—of a passionate Nationalist agitation, such as was led in 1887 by Bismarck against his then opponents. He may even dream in the last resort of some manipulations of the franchise.

All these are possibilities. They may sound adventurous; but the situation is so utterly confused, the whole system of parties and their relations is so contradictory, that no one looks for a rational development.

The Bülow bloc, never a healthy body, has now been in full decomposition—one may even say putrefaction—for some months. And yet some people go on repeating that it is not dead at all. Its life force is, on the one hand, the embittered strife between the working class democracy and the democratic elements of the middle classes, and on the other the over-representation in the Reichstag of the agrarian element and in the Parliament of the predominant State of the empire, Prussia. According to the latest census of the occupations of the people the industrial and commercial population of the Empire stands now to its agricultural population in a relation of 2 to 1, viz.,

| | |
|---|---|
| Industrial population ... ... | 26,386,537 |
| Commercial population ... ... | 8,278,239 |
| Together ... ... | 34,664,776 |
| Agricultural population ... ... | 17,681,176 |

We find almost the same proportion in Prussia, if counted alone.

For both Parliaments the agrarian element secures the nomination of the majority of the members, thanks to the maintenance of the now obsolete distribution of seats. Here is the mainspring of much of the present difficulties of Prince Bülow. Even the powerful federation of the great Captains of Industry, the famous "Zeutralverband deutscher Industriellen," cries out against the damaging effects of the disproportionate strength of agrarians in the councils of the nation. But to what purpose? A redistribution of seats, the measure that would do away with at least some of the anomalies, has by Prince Bülow himself been declared as out of the region of practical politics. The agricultural population, as the stronghold against the steady advance of the army of the proletarians, shall keep their political privilege. Is it, then, to be wondered at that the organised agriculturists make use of that privilege to secure by all means and at every opportunity the preservation of the safeguards of their social strength? That is the motive power of their attitude, and the virtue of consistency cannot be denied them. Prince Bülow, who to-day celebrates his sixtieth birthday, called himself seven years ago, when he forced the agrarian tariff of 1902, "an agrarian Chancellor." But this will not hinder the agrarians from acting as if they had no more ardent desire than to end his political career and to give his self-chosen epitaph the significant change:—"Here lies an insufficiently agrarian Chancellor." But this is mere skirmishing. It is more likely that we shall again live to see a great act of political sale and barter.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Schoeneberg, Berlin,
May 3rd, 1909.

Communications.

THE PASSING OF THE SIX-SHILLING BACK.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Whatever may be said of our books, at least our business is not dull. Once more we are making ready to be stirred to our depths—this time because one of the wealthiest firms, whose name is not, in this connection, public property, proposes to issue fiction by the leading authors, in bulk and format equal to the best six-shilling standard, at two shillings. Not reprints, be it observed, but original issues. The appeal of getting for two what one has hitherto paid six shillings for is universal; at least, at first sight. But is it really going to be cheap? Is there not at least a chance of our having to pay, if not in meal then in malt, rather more than we can afford? I fancy there is.

It is a pity that Mr. Roosevelt is busy with lions in Africa, for the new proposal smacks of race suicide. Publishers have hitherto copied nature and thrown their bantlings recklessly on the world, leaving elimination to the play of natural forces, with the result that the average reader—he still exists, despite the temptation of two-hundred-and-fifty-guinea prizes to go over to the enemy—has had at least an infinite variety of choice. That, on the whole, has made for good. The novelist has to learn his job, and the only way to learn it is by getting himself published. That might be compassed if his book could be published at six shillings; he will have to show a promise, and even an achievement very rare in the beginning practice of any art before a publisher can afford to risk publishing his book at two shillings. I mean, of course, at the publisher's own expense—the way in which, despite popular rumor, most novels are nowadays published. If the point be not too technical for the columns of a lay journal, I may explain that a publisher can give a beginner a fair run, printing a first edition of a thousand copies, for an outlay of about one hundred pounds, and out of the sales the author may look to get thirty-five pounds or thereabouts. But the publisher is now to be asked to print, not a thousand, but about five thousand copies. Remember that the cost of production will be very slightly decreased, if at all, and that advertising, carriage, and the general expense of handling will remain the same. Unless the author can bear, at any rate, a share of the outlay, the book can hardly appear. Thackeray's publishers came from the gutter and his authors from the 'Varsity; it is hardly too much to say that the reverse is now more nearly the case. And that, on the whole, is all to the good. It means that the net is cast wider, that those of the masses who are articulate can make their voices heard. Is our recruiting ground henceforth to be confined within the limits of the richer classes?

Certainly it would seem from this that the supply of fiction to the public is likely to be standardised; for you cannot have a number of prices, varying inversely with the popularity of the author and ranging from the beginner at six shillings down—or should I say up?—to Hall Caine at a penny. To put it concretely, my librarian knows the kind of novel I like, and supplies me regularly, and, as a rule, satisfactorily. But I don't want to tempt him beyond his strength. If he can work out my subscription on books that cost him a third of what he is now paying, clearly I shall get, whether I want them or not, the books that a certain firm thinks it can profitably publish at two shillings; if I want anything else I shall have to clamor for it. To continue with my own case, it so happens that I do not read the boomsters—not in the least because they are boomsters, but because our existing race of boomsters does not interest me. There may one day be a new boomster. . . . The men whose books I do want do not, I fancy, have very large sales. What is to become of them? The novels I have in mind give me very pleasant hours—there are still a few old-fashioned persons who play neither golf nor bridge—but I do not buy them. No, I would not if they were ever so cheap. I have not the space. And I believe my experience and habits are, in this respect, like those of most people. If I am right in this, it follows that the class of novelist I have in mind will suffer. He may get published; I doubt if, as is just barely the case now, he will receive a living wage. Many men of this type are doing what is, in my judgment at least, our best work in fiction. Will their sales be multiplied by four or five? In the case of a few, perhaps; and the new departure may for them mean a wider popularity and an increased income. The greater number have not, I think, just that knack of writing that enables a writer to gain the attention of a large number of persons of widely different tastes and habits of thought; those who have will, I fear, be tempted even more than they are now to "write down" to their readers. Once more, the reader does not come in; some of the work he wants he will lose, and some of it will cease to interest him.

With the firm that has formed the scheme I have no special concern. Its partners are well able to look after themselves, and to argue to them that they are by way of losing their money were something of an impertinence. But I do think so; I believe that they are mistaken in imagining that there is a section of the public, numerous enough for their purposes, which is yearning to buy current fiction but is debarred from doing so because of the price. And, if I am right, the experiment will clearly be costly. But assume I am wrong; suppose this fiction-buying public is there after all, and that the firm in question, with its money, its faculty of appreciating what the public wants—I believe the standard is higher than most publishers will admit—and its strong list of authors, justifies its policy. The considerations I have urged on behalf of the novice and the writer with only a small following will still hold good. The remaining richer firms will have to follow suit, and the smaller firm will suffer equally with the smaller author. The prospect rather suggests a publishing trust, or, at least, a narrower range of choice for the author; the corollary, lower author's fees, is so obvious as to be hardly worth stating.

And what of the bookseller? He is, too often, so absorbed nowadays in the sale of photograph frames and toothbrushes that one has almost forgotten he exists. If the same demands are to be made on his space and the work of his staff, with, roughly, a profit cut down from a shilling to fourpence, it seems to me that he had best imitate the snark, and softly and silently vanish away, or else show a stronger line in knick-knacks. But he may take it fighting, and prove the lion in the path. He is not exactly in love with the sevenpenny reprint, and, just possibly, he may think that the two shilling novel may ease his lot. That is for his own trade organisation to decide.

The printers will, I think—and by the term printers I mean also the publisher's other tradesmen, binders and paper-makers—be affected much in the same way as the authors. The few bigger firms, who get the orders from the few bigger publishers, will do well; the smaller man will be hurt. So perhaps it is all part of the same general tendency—a narrowing of the gate of opportunity, but more space and ease for the few who get inside. Incidentally, that has been tried with the drama. I mean that a smaller selling price does not mean cheaper production, but costlier production; and the costliness of theatre production has involved the sterilising of our drama. In publishing, we have hitherto at least given the beginner and the less popular man his chance. Shall we do wisely to refuse it?—Yours, &c.,

A Literary Agent.

Letters to the Editor.

"THE MILLS OF GOD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Some twelve years have elapsed since Lord Salisbury uttered words of warning to the Turkish Sultan. Abdul Hamid's policy had been crowned with apparent success. He had carried through his series of Armenian massacres with thoroughness and efficiency. The great Powers, armed with overwhelming strength, had looked on in impotent confusion, and their perfunctory protests were artfully silenced with commercial concessions or boldly flouted by massacre on massacre. When they feebly murmured over the devastation of Asia Minor, the Sultan replied with the greatest massacre of all before the eyes of their ambassadors. It was a triumph of consistent brutality unsurpassed in history, a complete epic of victorious evil, and paralysed humanity. Rounded off by the victories of 1897 and the farcical collapse of the Greeks, it seemed to establish the very incarnation of Wrong upon the throne of this world. It was at the climax of the action that Lord Salisbury predicted a very different end from that which then appeared inevitable to most onlookers. In language which unfortunately I imperfectly recall, and can but unworthily reproduce, he warned the Sultan of the existence of unseen forces working towards a very different consummation. We might call it the Providence of God, or we might call it the inherent and unalterable tendency of things, but call it what we might, and shut our eyes to it as we would, there was a principle at work in the affairs of men by which in the end persistent and unheeding iniquity brought its own retribution. Lord Salisbury was hardly the man to wield the sword of justice with his own hand. It was something if, alone among European statesmen in a cynical day, he maintained and avowed his belief in forces which only that form of short-sightedness which we call materialism can utterly ignore. We have had to wait long for the verification of his prophecy, and, while waiting, the faith of many of us waxed cold, but at length we have seen it with our eyes, and we shall not forget.

To be moved by a single event, it may be said, is at once illogical and weak. Lord Salisbury's principle is one which we must either accept as true, reject as false, or dismiss as unprovable, on the broadest grounds. Our acceptance or denial is a part of our whole interpretation of our experience. If in some sense, however difficult to formulate with precision, we believe it to express a truth founded on the unchanging order of things, it is unworthy to let our faith in it be moved by the accidents of contemporary history. We ought, if we were perfectly assured and perfectly consistent, to be neither unduly depressed at the apparent triumph of colossal wrong, nor too much elated when justice palpably comes by her own. One swallow does not make a summer. It must be admitted at best that, so far as our experience goes, the justice to which Lord Salisbury appealed is leaden-footed, and that if she be iron-handed her blow too often misses the arch criminal. That in this case the aim has been true is no warrant for unreasoning optimism.

All this may be true. Nevertheless, the regeneration of Turkey is an event which will profoundly affect the outlook on the world of many in our generation, and that, in part at least, quite reasonably. For if the event does not prove that the right always wins, it does prove that there is no good cause so hopeless as to be unworthy of an effort, for no cause seemed more hopeless than that of Turkey. It does prove that overwhelming material power may be undermined by adequate moral force. It proves that heroism, like wisdom, is justified of her children. It proves that is the part neither of the fanatic nor the madman, but of the sanest patriot who, tested by hard fact, will accomplish the greatest things.

> "To defy power which seems omnipotent,
> To love and bear, to hope till hope creates
> From its own wreck the thing it contemplates,"

But furthermore the course of contemporary history, the successes or failures that we actually witness have an effect on the mind beyond that which pure reason can justify. Yet it is an effect that few can escape. The firmest constancy is that of those who can work on without thought of results, who do their part and let success or failure come as they may. Those of us who are cast in less stoical mould may admit that, logically or otherwise, we derive fresh courage from the more recent course of public events. At the beginning of this century three great wrongs stood out in black and bold outline above all others—in Russia, in Turkey, and in South Africa. In distinguishing these three I am not forgetful of the Congo or of Angola slavery, of Ireland, or of the pervading incubus of economic oppression in the darker corners of modern industrialism. I am taking only those which most publicly and defiantly and with most exuberant force outraged the conscience of mankind. In all three freedom seemed to be beating itself to death against the adamantine walls of material power. All three could be cited as proofs of the impotence of justice, and brought as overwhelming evidence to confound the faithful. But in two of the three the seemingly hopeless struggle is already won, and even in Russia the day is gone by when the lamp was kept alight only by a few scattered exiles among Siberian snows. In future, we who have seen Abdul Hamid deposed, and have welcomed Botha and De Wet as Ministers of the Crown, will move to the attack, I think, with less of the grimness of the forlorn hope and more of the assurance of final victory.—Yours, &c.,

L. T. Hobhouse.

May 6th, 1909.

M. LOISY'S INAUGURAL LECTURE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your readers may like to have a brief account of M. Loisy's inaugural lecture and his triumphal entry into the Collège de France on Monday. No inaugural lecture since that of Renan has excited so much public interest. But, whereas, in the case of Renan, the disturbances were so serious that the Government seized the opportunity of suspending his cours, the threatened opposition to M. Loisy had melted away before Monday, thanks to the energetic action of the students of the Sorbonne.

An enormous crowd of a composite character waited outside the gates of the Collège de France on Monday for an hour before they were opened, and the majority had their wait for nothing, for the lecture hall could not accommodate nearly half of those who desired admission. When the gates were opened at ten o'clock there was a scramble like that for the pit of a theatre. In accordance with custom a small enclosure in the front of the hall was reserved for a few friends of professors and the family of M. Loisy's predecessor in the chair of religions; the rest of the hall was thrown open to the public.

On the platform were a large number of the professors of the College, including M. Bergson, M. Louis Havet, M. Arthur Chuquet, M. Lechatellier, &c. When, at half-past ten, M. Loisy entered, accompanied by the administrateur of the Collège de France, M. Levasseur, the whole audience rose to its feet, and there was a scene of wild enthusiasm which lasted for several minutes. M. Loisy seemed for a moment almost overwhelmed by his reception, but he soon recovered self-possession.

The first part of his lecture was a warm tribute to his two predecessors in the chair of the history of religions, Albert and Jean Reville. He then proceeded to explain his own conception of the purpose of the chair and the method which a professor should adopt, and sketched his programme. In an admirable passage he contested the view that the critical study of the history of religions involves indifference or contempt in regard to the subject studied. "Ah! Indifference and contempt in the face of that which is universally, fundamentally human!" He declined to agree with Renan that, in order to write the history of a religion, one must have believed in it and have ceased to believe. "Ask my colleague who teaches philosophy here"—and M. Loisy slightly turned towards M. Bergson, who was close by him on the platform—"ask him if he regards it in the past and the present with a cold look of disdain. Assuredly he loves it with all his soul. And, what is still more grave, he believes in it." "For my part," said M. Loisy, "I do not think that religion is a mere illusion." "To understand and to teach the history of religions, it is not necessary to see in religion the supreme folly of humanity; but it is necessary to regard all religions with that sympathy, if need be that indulgence, that one ought to feel for all that is human."

M. Loisy went on to say that it was, on the other hand, impossible to study impartially the history of religion if one regarded any one religion as exclusively and absolutely true, as being the perfect, definitive, and infallible expression of the religious ideal. "The science of religions cannot serve the purpose of any particular theology, and particular theologies are incompatible with the science of religions. For they impose on the latter conclusions which often contradict its acquired results and always fetter the labor of research." Their method would be critical and comparative, the method of historical criticism applied to religious history. They would use the results acquired by anthropologists, folklorists, sociologists, and other savants without binding themselves to any of those sciences.

The programme would be the study successively of sacrifice, divination, and prophecy, prayer, religious morality, beliefs, priesthoods in the various religions, and, finally, of those reforming movements which have resulted in religions that may be called universal. M. Loisy could not hope, he said, that his career would be long enough to enable him to finish so comprehensive a programme. "All that I can promise you is to proceed courageously. So far as it rests with me, all the new facts that are acquired to the history of religions, all the new discoveries that concern it, all real progress in its methods, will here have their echo; in that way we shall be able to elucidate our researches and to strengthen our conclusions. And we shall have no concern other than concern for the truth."

When the lecture closed with these words, another storm of applause burst forth. The applause was repeated by a crowd gathered in the Rue des Ecoles as M. Loisy left the college by the main entrance accompanied by Professor Havet and other friends.—Yours, &c., R. E. D.

Paris, May 6th, 1909.

CONCERNING OUR FRIVOLOUS STAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION

Sir,—Some of us are getting a little tired of being always reminded that Puritanism is responsible for a frivolous stage. The absence of seriousness in the theatre is due to commercialism. As soon as it became possible to make a fortune out of a single play, the commercial speculator regarded the drama as a legitimate commodity for a gamble; and when a man runs his theatre for the sole object of making money out of it, he purposely avoids supplying food for those who want to think; he caters for the spending classes and for the seeker after amusement. Besides, theatre rents are so heavy an item in a manager's liabilities, that he is obliged to sublet his bars and programmes, or to make "deals" with theatre ticket agents, or to enter into other business transactions in order to realise money independently of what will come out of the pockets of the playgoer, with the consequence that he is hampered by restrictions that often compel him to think more of his obligations to his various clients than of those to his public. The only remedy for this evil is for the public itself to manage the theatre in its own interests, and for this reason it is to be hoped that the public will give a loyal support to the National Theatre scheme.—Yours &c.,

William Poel.

May 4th, 1909.

A QUESTION OF IDEALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Having read your interesting, if rather melancholy, article on "The Laborer's Listlessness," may I remark that the infusion of new life and happiness into our country districts is one of the chief objects of the much abused Tariff Reformer. Surely this ideal is a worthier one than that which contemplates the possibility of an urban nation fed entirely with cheap food from outside.—Yours, &c.,

Immo S. Allen.

P.S.—I have frequently asked Free Traders what their ideal really is, but I have never succeeded in eliciting a direct answer.

London Institution, Finsbury Circus, E.C.
May 3rd, 1909.

THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Gill's letter in your last week's issue raises once more the failure of the Small Holdings Act to prevent the rural exodus and restore the people to the land.

As a matter of fact, about 98 per cent. of the applicants have failed to obtain holdings; the total number provided being about 500, or 10 per county. This is the result of fifteen months' work, during which period it is not unlikely that 100,000 of our villagers have left the rural districts for the towns and Colonies. Figures express little, but one must realise that a large number of these cases involve a personal tragedy, and the whole result is a national one.

What has happened to the other applicants? A few are being dealt with, but in the considerable number of cases that I have had under my notice in the Home Counties no attempt is being made effectively to administer the law in the interests of the people, and the whole movement is liable to be crushed out.

There seems to be only one way of dealing with this failure of local and central authorities. A local group in every village, supported by a powerful central organisation, is indispensable. Such a society would be able, not only to bring to light the evils under which country people suffer, but to secure their rectification. It is such an organisation that we are slowly building up, and for it the support of all who care for the welfare of our people is needed.—Yours, &c.,

Montague Fordham,
Secretary Land Club League.

May 5th, 1909.

"THE DEFECTS OF THE LIBERAL PROPAGANDA."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be allowed to express strong agreement with the remarks of "W. M. T." this week. Whatever good work the ordinary election agent is doing, it is obvious to any careful observer that very little is being done to counteract the pernicious effect of the paid orators of the Tariff Reform League—who trim their arguments to suit their audiences.

The idea of workmen coached up in arguments to suit the circumstances of their localities and the capacity of their fellow workmen, is sound and practical, and is the best way to meet the attack of unscrupulous opponents.

As a man of business, I am convinced that money and time could not be spent to more advantage in spreading the truth. Working-men will listen to their fellow workmen, and if such Committees as described by "W. M. T." were formed in every constituency, I for one would feel more hope for our next General Election than I do at present—and more inclined to subscribe to the necessary funds.—Yours, &c., W. R. SNOW.

33, Old Change, London, E.C.
May 5th, 1909.

DEER AND THE CRUELTY TO ANIMALS ACTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It used to be a very generally received opinion among lawyers that only those animals which are classed as creatures feræ naturæ are outside the protection of the Acts for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 1849 and 1854. In other words, it was thought that, so far as those Acts are concerned, there were only two classes of animals to be considered, viz., animals feræ naturæ, and animals domitæ naturæ, or domestic animals.

Recently, however, counsel of the very highest standing and authority have advised that there is a third class—a miserable tertium quid—of animals which, although they are not to be reckoned as feræ naturæ, are, nevertheless, not domestic animals, and are therefore not entitled to the protection of the Acts. The question arose in this way. Many years ago it was held by judges, whose decision stands as unquestioned to-day as it did when it was pronounced, that deer, when fed and cared for by man, may, although by no means closely confined, lose their wild character and cease to be animals feræ naturæ. Thus, in the case of "Morgan v. Earl of Abergavenny" (8. C.B. Rep. 768), which was decided on argument before four of the most distinguished judges that ever sat upon the Bench, viz., Wilds, L.C.J., and Maule, Coltman, and Creswell, J.J., it was held that deer, both red and fallow, to the number of some thousands, kept in an ancient park of 900 acres and of wild natural features, had, owing to the manner in which they had been fed and taken care of, ceased to be animals feræ naturæ. This case was followed by the similar case of "Ford v. Tynte" (31. L.T. Ch. 177), where Wood, V.C., in giving judgment, said, "I find that the deer in this park of 114 acres are tame, and there are no wild deer there." The judges, in fact, held that deer, in the conditions mentioned, "must be considered as other cattle."

Now, it seemed at first sight to follow from these decisions that deer which had "ceased to be animals feræ naturæ," and were "tame deer," and "to be considered as other cattle," would be, since the passing of the Acts of 1849 and 1854, under the protection of the law which makes cruelty to animals a criminal offence. It now appears that such an opinion was erroneous, and that any evil disposed person who may mutilate, or otherwise ill-treat, such deer may do so with impunity so far as these Acts are concerned. For such deer, as we have been advised, are not "domestic animals" within Section 3 of the Act of 1854. They are neither animals feræ naturæ nor are they "domestic animals." They belong to an anomalous, anonymous, intermediate class, which has hitherto, I think, had very little consideration bestowed upon it, if, indeed, it has been recognised at all.

And herein lies the immediate importance of this opinion. The animals used for the hunting of "carted deer" are bred from the tame park stock, viz., from deer which have "ceased to be animals feræ naturæ"; they are fed and cared for by man in a still higher degree than were the park deer in the cases cited; they are taken from the park and kept in paddocks or loose boxes; some of them are castrated when young, and are then known as "haviers." But, nevertheless, according to the opinion of eminent counsel, they are not "domestic" animals, and therefore they may be harried and injured at will so far as these Acts are concerned. Nay, if they should be deliberately starved (a most unlikely thing to happen, of course, for these deer are very carefully fed), no prosecution could be instituted against the offender, as might be done in the case of "other cattle."

I submit, sir, that here is a case for the reform of the law, in order that these poor creatures may be protected from cruelty; and this might be very easily effected by an Act of one or two clauses extending the definition of "domestic animal" in 17 and 18 Vict., c. 60, S. 3, so as to make it include deer when kept in captivity.

I may add that there is, I believe, no decided case in which an animal not an animal feræ naturæ has been held to be outside the protection of the Acts for the prevention of cruelty to animals, but seeing that such eminent counsel as Sir Robert Finlay and Mr. Arthur Cohen have, independently, advised that park or paddock deer, kept under such conditions as in the cases cited, are in this unhappy and anomalous condition, we are bound to assume that such is the law of the land.—Yours &c., G. G. GREENWOOD.

May 4th, 1909.

THE ANGLICAN CHURCH AND NONCONFORMISTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is high time that one or two fallacies which seem dear to your correspondents, and are so old and so false, should be decently interred.

1. The Church was not founded by Henry VIII.: it was the same old Catholic Church of the land continued unbrokenly—though reformed in certain particulars. The Popes up to the time of Elizabeth were willing to recognise it as such under certain conditions. If it was a new Church, then there must have been a complete change of doctrine—service, books, bishops, and priests. Was there?

2. No one wishes to speak against good and Christian work by whomsoever it is done—the finger of God is no doubt in it. But to contend that anyone is at liberty to found a Church, invent their own rules, system of ordination, &c., and then say that this "Church" is on a footing with one founded directly by Our Lord, is an argument unworthy of reply. If it were true, then the Mormons are a Christian Church: nay, perhaps the Christian Church.

3. When St. Paul wrote "Submit yourselves . . . unto the King as supreme" (and, be it remembered, a heathen king), presumably, according to Mr. Mudie-Smith, he made the Church a dissenting sect! But he did not say, nor has the Church ever said, that the King was supreme in spiritual matters. Henry VIII. was not, even in his most inquisitorial moments, an intruder on the purely spiritual functions of the bishops—witness his reply to Tunstall in 1531. And such authority is carefully repudiated in Article 37.

When, sir, your correspondents cease to drag in these antique and oft-refuted fallacies we shall have the ground clear for sane discussion.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES J. MAGRATH.

King Edward School, Sheffield,
May 2nd, 1909.

ADULT SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent Catherine Ryle speaks of the removal of the sex disability as being the thin edge of a wedge, and then proceeds to confuse the wedge itself with the people who are trying to drive it in. This is surely a mistake. A large number of Suffragists believe in ultimately driving in the whole wedge. They take it as a matter of course that once the thin edge is in, they will go on hammering until they succeed in doing so. Another section believe that the fabric of the building would be

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

Principles and Methods of University Reform.

Being a Letter addressed to the University of Oxford by LORD CURZON OF KEDLESTON.
8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

COMPLETION OF THE WORK

The Imperial Gazetteer of India.

NEW EDITION.—In 26 vols. 8vo, cloth, £5 net; morocco back, £6 6s. net.

The Four Volumes of "THE INDIAN EMPIRE" separately, 6s. net each in cloth, or 7s. 6d. net with morocco back; the Atlas separately, 15s. net in cloth, or 17s. 6d. net with morocco back.
Each volume contains a Map of India specially prepared for this Edition.

Standard—"A work of which British geography may justly be proud.....The book gains much by its excellent indexes."

THE ENGLISH FACTORIES IN INDIA.

By W. FOSTER. 8vo. (Published under the patronage of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council.) Vol. III., 1624-1629, 12s. 6d. net.

Previously published.—Vol. I., 1618-1621, 12s. 6d. net. Vol. II., 1622-1623, 12s. 6d. net.

HISTORICAL PORTRAITS.

RICHARD II. TO HENRY WRIOTHESLEY, 1400-1600. THE LIVES by C. R. L. FLETCHER. THE PORTRAITS chosen by EMERY WALKER. With an Introduction on the History of Portraiture in England. With 103 Portraits, crown 4to, 8s. 6d. net.

Spectator.—"In every way a most interesting book."

COLLOTYPE FACSIMILE OF IRISH MANUSCRIPTS IN THE BODLEIAN LIBRARY.

With Introduction by KUNO MEYER. Rawlinson B. 502, including the Annals of Tigernach; the Psaltar Na Rann; Brehon Law Tracts; and many Poems and Stories, Tribal Histories, and Genealogies. Folio, containing 83 leaves of Vellum, with which 20 leaves of Paper are bound up. Subscription price, £4 4s. net.

THE ORIGINS OF CHRISTIANITY

By the late C. BIGG. Edited by T. B. STRONG. 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

PLATO'S DOCTRINE OF IDEAS.

By J. A. STEWART. 8vo, 6s. net.

ON THE GRAMMAR OF ROWING.

Three Lectures by E. WARRE. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

MILTON MEMORIAL LECTURES, 1908.

Read before the Royal Society of Literature. By G. C. WILLIAMSON, W. H. HADOW, E. H. COLERIDGE, W. E. A. AXON, E. H. PEMBER, G. E. B. SAINTSBURY, H. G. ROSEDALE, E. DOWDEN, Sir E. BRABROOK, and A. VAMBERY. Edited, with an Introduction, by P. W. AMES. With 4 Illustrations, 8vo, 6s. net.

A VINDICATION OF WARREN HASTINGS.

By G. W. HASTINGS. 8vo. 6s. net.

AUTHORS' AND PRINTERS' DICTIONARY.

A Guide for Authors, Editors, Printers, Correctors of the Press, Compositors and Typists, with full List of Abbreviations. An attempt to codify the best Typographical Practices of the present day. By F. HOWARD COLLINS, with the assistance of many Authors, Editors, Printers, and Correctors of the Press. NEW AND CHEAP EDITION. Tenth Thousand. 1s. net.

CLARENDON PRESS CATALOGUE (160 pages) post-free on application.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

J. M. DENT & CO.'S BOOKS.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF MASTER JOHN HUS.

By COUNT LUTZOW, Hon. D. Litt. Oxon., Ph.D.Prag., Author of "A History of Bohemian Literature," "Prague," &c. Medium 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
Contains a Map, four Photogravures, and many other interesting reproductions from old prints and paintings.

BEETHOVEN'S LETTERS.

CRITICAL EDITION, CONTAINING OVER 1,100 LETTERS, WITH EXPLANATORY NOTES. By Dr. ALF. CHR. KALISCHER, Translated, with Preface, by J. S. SHEDLOCK, B.A. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 21s. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"It is hardly too much to state that here we have the final word on Beethoven, the best of all studies of the man and his innermost self."

RICHARD WAGNER.

By HOUSTON STEWART CHAMBERLAIN. Translated from the German and Revised by G. AINSLIE HIGHT. With Photogravure Frontispiece and many Illustrations, crown 4to, 10s. 6d. net.
The Times says:—"A book of deep interest and great weight."

ST. CATHERINE OF SIENA.

A Study in the Italian Religion, Literature, and History of the Fourteenth Century, by EDMUND G. GARDNER. With an Appendix containing some hitherto unpublished letters of St. Catherine.
Illustrated in Photogravure, sq. demy 8vo, 16s. net.
Mr. W. L. Courtney, in the Daily Telegraph, says:—"The most elaborate and comprehensive Biography of St. Catherine is that of Mr. Edmund G. Gardner, who writes with a full knowledge of all the materials."

Second Edition Now Ready.

THE MYSTICAL ELEMENT OF RELIGION.

As Studied in the Lives of St. Catherine of Genoa and her Friends. By BARON F. VON HUGEL. Photogravure Portraits, 2 vols., demy 8vo, 21s. net.

Daily News.—"The most complete and balanced attempt in any language to apply the modern scientific method to all the facts of religion on the grand scale. . . . The best-informed and most inspiring study of religion in our time—a mine for all future workers in that field."

NEW THINGS AND OLD IN SAINT THOMAS AQUINAS.

A Translation of various Writings and Treatises of the Angelic Doctor. With an Introduction by H. C. O'NEILL. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

JUSTICE AND LIBERTY.

By G. LOWES DICKINSON, author of "The Meaning of Good," "Letters of John Chinaman," &c. Sm. cr. 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Times.—"The last section of his book, on the relation of ideals to facts, is a passionate appeal, not only to beauty, but to truth, and is in every way worthy to be read and pondered."

NEW POOR LAW OR NO POOR LAW.

Being a description of the Majority and Minority Reports of the Poor Law Commission. With an Introductory Note by CANON BARNETT. 1s. net.

A POCKET LEXICON AND CONCORDANCE TO THE TEMPLE SHAKESPEARE.

PREPARED by MARIAN EDWARDS. Illustrated. Cloth, 2s. 6d net; leather, 3s. net.
Consists of various readings and interpretations of words and phrases, including the latest contributions given in "The Oxford Dictionary." The Glossary is accompanied by a Concordance, and illustrations from authentic sources have been introduced as a necessary means of understanding words referring to dress, armour, &c.

CALVIN IN HIS LETTERS.

By REV. HENRY F. HENDERSON, M.A., author of "Erskine of Linlathen," "The Religious Controversies of Scotland." Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

LES

CLASSIQUES FRANÇAIS.

Edited by H. WARNER ALLEN. A Series in the Original French. Photogravure Frontispiece. Pott 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net per vol.; limp lambskin, 2s. 6d. net.

New Volume.

JULIE; OU LA NOUVELLE HÉLOÏSE.

Par JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU. Avec Preface de FRANK A. HEDGCOCK.

Full List of Volumes will be sent on application.

J. M. DENT & Co., Bedford St., London, W.C.

greatly injured by insertion of the thick end. But both these sections of workers are unanimously of opinion that the thin edge should be driven in as speedily as possible, and they are working loyally together for that end. They understand one another, and they know that later on they will be in different camps, but they do not waste valuable time in quarrelling. Each section does its share in the work that all believe to be necessary. What are we to think of people who gravely advise them to concentrate upon the thick end of the wedge first, even before incision has been made? Such advice would appear to spring either from a total ignorance of the nature and limitation of wedges, or else from a desire to set the workers by the ears on a future issue, and so to hinder the attainment of their object, viz., the placing of women on a political equality with men before the law.—Yours, &c., B. Blagg.

May 6th, 1909.

Poetry.

THE TOWN WITHOUT A MARKET.

There lies afar behind a western hill
A town without a market, white and still,
For six feet long and not a third as high
Are those dense habitations. There stood I
Waiting to hear the citizens beneath
Murmur and sigh and speak through tongueless teeth.
When all the world lay windless to the sun
I suddenly heard them talking. Whispered one,
"Bright lights I loved and color, I who find My eyes gone blind, gone miserably blind."
"I loved the violin and dulcimer,"
Another said, "but here we make no stir."
And one, "On Earth I used not ears and eyes,
But with my fingers touched for harmonies
And knew things round and soft and brass from gold,
And dipped my head in water, to feel cold.
I thought my eyes would open; I was glad
To die—and lose the only joy I had."
Soon all the voices of a thousand dead
Shouted in wrath together, and one said,
"I care not, but the girl was sweet to kiss
At evening in the meadows." "Hard it is,"
Another cried, "to hear no hunting horn:
Ah me, the horse, the hounds, and the great grey morn
When I rode out a-hunting." And another,
"I longed to live when I became a mother."
A boy said, "I was strong and swift to run,
Now they have tied my feet: what have I done?"
A man said, "It was good to arm and fight,
And storm the hostile cities in the night."
An old man said, "I read my books all day:
They have killed me and hidden my books away."
And one, "The lying teachers did not well
To cheat poor dead men with false hopes of hell.
Better the fiery whips that hiss and rend
Than darkness with no meaning and no end."
I smiled to hear them restless, I who sought
Peace. For I had not loved, I had not fought
And books are endless vanities, and strength
A gathered flower. There would be peace at length.
No voices now: I turned to leave the town
Before the chill came and the sun went down.
Yet one more whisper—and I seemed to know
A timorous man buried long years ago.
"I long to shape once more the thing that seems:
Master of all men, give me back my dreams.
Give me my world that never failed before,
The island hills, the dancing on the shore,
The carven palace where I made my home,
My city that could break the pride of Rome,
The three queens hidden in the sacred tree,
The white folk in the clouds who sang to me.
O Death, why hast thou covered me so deep,
Who loved thy cloudy silver sister, Sleep?"
Then said my heart, "Death takes and cannot give.
If I must lose my fancy, let me live!"

James Elroy Flecker.

Reviews.

THE SOCIALISED MILLIONAIRE.*

"We have come to the parting of the ways. We are about to choose between the socialised millionaire and socialism." So Mr. Gerald Stanley Lee, an American writer hardly known in England, but one who ought to be known. For, almost alone among the writers of the New World, he has something which the Old World is always expecting from them, and never finding. He has a faith, and a faith which seems to be original, not a mere rehash of things that have been better felt and said in Europe. Mr. Lee's idea is American through and through. He takes exactly that phenomenon of American civilisation which, to a cultivated European, seems most monstrous and barbarous; he admits its monstrosity and its barbarism; and he says "exactly this thing is the most promising thing in America." He takes, that is, the Millionaire, and hails him "as an Archangel in embryo." It is worth while to follow out this romantic idea.

"What is wrong with civilisation?" Mr. Lee asks. Philosophers and poets and artists answer, "The machine." "Not at all," Mr. Lee replies; "the machine is wonderful, beautiful, inspiring." He has written a whole book to prove it, "The Voice of the Machines." What is wrong is not the machine, it is men with machine-souls. "When factory work is so arranged that the only habit of mind a man can have in a factory is the habit of not having any mind, the question a machine-civilisation is obliged to face is: 'What can be done for a man that is in the habit of not having any mind?'" This is Mr. Lee's problem: "Can men who live in a machine-civilisation—a civilisation in which men are obliged to earn their money with machines, in which they cannot even spend it without machines—have souls?" His answer is, "Yes, they can—if millionaires get souls." For the millionaire, as he is, Mr. Lee has scant respect. He regards him as an elementary, unintelligent, blundering creature, who is under the illusion that he is there merely to make money. Here is a description of him, and the reader, even though he be English, will probably have little difficulty in filling in the blanks. "What could be more pathetic than Mr. —— as an educator—a man who is educating and mowing down two hundred thousand (?) men a day, ten hours a day, for forty years of their lives; that is, who is separating the souls of his employees from their work, bullying them into being linked with a work and a method they despise, and who is trying to atone for it all—this vast terrible schooling, ten hours a day, forty years, two hundred thousand men's lives—by piecing together professors and dollars, putting up a little playhouse of learning, before the world, to give a few fresh young boys and girls four years with paper books? A man, the very thought of whom has ruined more men, and devastated more faiths, and created more cowards and brutes and fools in all walks of life, than any other influence in the nineteenth century, and who is trying to eke out at last a spoonful of atonement for it all—all this vast baptism of the business world in despair and force and cursing and pessimism—by perching up before it —— University, like a dove-cote on a volcano."

So much for the kind of millionaire we have got. From him Mr. Lee turns to the kind which he affirms we are getting, which he vows we shall get. This will be the millionaire-artist. He will not be an altruist; no, he will be selfish, like all artists, only he will "identify his selfishness with other people's." He will not be disinterested; no, he will insist on making money; only he will see that his employees and the public make it too. He will not be moved by his conscience; no, he will be moved by the joy of his work. "The great millionaire when he comes will do good, not by poking dismally around the world, and being on committees, and trying to be self-sacrificing, and trying vaguely to make people happy, but by being happy with some deep happiness himself, and overflowing the world with it." This, it will be observed, is a new version of Carlyle's "Captains of Industry"; but a version peculiarly modern and peculiarly American. It could hardly have

* "Inspired Millionaires." By Gerald Stanley Lee. Mount Tom Press, Northampton, Mass.

G. P. Putnam's Sons' List.

WHAT HAVE THE GREEKS DONE FOR MODERN CIVILIZATION?

The Lowell Lectures of 1908-9. By Professor John Pentland Mahaffy, C.V.O. Crown 8vo, cloth.

Contents.—Introductory—Greek Poetry—Greek Prose—Greek Art: Sculpture, Architecture—Greek Art (Second Part): Science, Grammar—Logic—Mathematics—Medicine—Politics and Sociology—Law—Higher Thinking—Philosophy—Speculative and Classical Theology—Ethics and Stoics.

BARTHOLOMEW DE LAS CASAS: His Life, His Apostolate, and His Writings.

By Francis Augustus MacNutt. Illustrated. 8vo, cloth extra, 15s. net.

Las Casas, the sixteenth-century historian of early Spanish America, the devoted missionary, and the defender of the Indians who fared so ill at the hands of their Christian conquerors, is the subject of the biography entitled "Bartholomew de las Casas," by Francis Augustus MacNutt, whose translation of "The Letters of Cortes," with its comprehensive, original, and scholarly editorial equipment has given him a high place among authorities on the history of early sixteenth-century America.

CHARACTERS AND EVENTS OF ROMAN HISTORY.

From Cæsar to Nero (60 B.C.-70 A.D.). By GUGLIELMO FERRERO, author of "The Greatness and Decline of Rome," &c. 8vo, cloth. 6s. net.

Professor Guglielmo Ferrero's work consists of a series of studies of the great men and great ladies of ancient Rome, and of critical moments and events in Roman History.

SHELBURNE ESSAYS.

Studies of Religious Dualism. Sixth Series. By Paul Elmer More. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net.

The publication of a new volume of the "Shelburne Essays," by Paul Elmer More, is a recurring event of importance in the world of letters.

"His faith in the virtue of criticism is as strong as was that of Matthew Arnold."—Athenæum.

"The Studies are both well read and well thought out."—Scotsman.

FIGHTING THE TURK IN THE BALKANS.

An American's Adventures with the Macedonian Revolutionists. By Arthur H. Howden Smith. Crown 8vo, cloth extra. 6s.

"Mr. Howden Smith's book is likely to take rank as one of the most informative and valuable."—Daily Telegraph.

THE HEART OF A GEISHA.

By Mrs. Hugh Fraser. With a Frontispiece in Colour by Ludwig Holberg and Ornamental Borders and Decorations by R. Weir Crouch. Crown 8vo, cloth extra. 6s. net.

"Mrs. Fraser tells a charming story of the old days in the land of the Rising Sun."—Westminster Gazette.

THE CENTURY OF THE CHILD.

By Ellen Key. Crown 8vo, cloth. 6s. net.

"She has thought deeply, and originally on the question of education."—Newcastle Chronicle.

"The book is a stimulating volume that deserves the attention of all thoughtful people."—Glasgow Herald.

THE EMMANUEL MOVEMENT IN A NEW ENGLAND TOWN.

A Systematic Account of Experiments and Reflections Designed to Determine the Proper Relationship between the Minister and the Doctor in the Light of Modern Needs. By Lyman P. Powell, author of "Christian Science: The Faith and its Founder," "The Art of Natural Sleep," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net.

A HISTORY OF MODERN BANKS OF ISSUE.

With an Account of the Economic Crises of the Nineteenth Century, and the Crisis of 1907. By Charles A. Conant. Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 8vo, cloth. 15s. net.

THE OCEAN CARRIER.

A History and Analysis of the Service and a Discussion of the Rates of Ocean Transportation. By J. Russell Smith. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth extra. 6s.

New Catalogue and Announcement List Now Ready.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS,
24, Bedford Street, Strand, London; and New York.

New Theological Works.

HASTINGS' ONE VOLUME BIBLE DICTIONARY

"is a very fine achievement, worthy to stand beside Dr. Hastings' larger Dictionaries, and by far the most scholarly yet produced in one volume in English-speaking countries—perhaps it may be said in the world."—Christian World.

ONE THOUSAND PAGES, with Maps, etc.

In cloth binding 20/- net; in half leather 25/- net. New and complete Prospectus free.

New Vol. "International Theological Library."

THE CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE OF GOD.

By Prof. W. Newton Clarke, D.D. (Author of "An Outline of Christian Theology," now in its 17th Edition). 10/6.

THE TESTS OF LIFE: A Study of the First Epistle of St. John.

By Rev. Robert Law, B.D., Edinburgh. 7/6 net.

"Marked throughout by accurate scholarship, discriminating criticism and brilliant exegesis. Mr. Law exhibits a complete mastery of the literature of his subject and a rare faculty of clear and eloquent exposition."—Scotsman.

THE PAULINE EPISTLES.

By Robert Scott, D.D., Bombay. New Vol., "The Literature of the New Testament" Series. 6/- net.

"Able, scholarly, thoughtful, and learned."—Aberdeen Free Press.

THE BACKGROUND OF THE GOSPELS; Or, Judaism in the Period between the Old and New Testaments.

By W. Fairweather, D.D., Kirkcaldy. 8s. net.

"The author may be said to discharge his task with extensive knowledge of the literature, with sobriety, and discretion. As an introduction to the study of this period, his book is the best now to be had in English."—Times.

OUTLINES OF INTRODUCTION TO THE HEBREW BIBLE.

By Prof. A. S. Geden, D.D., Richmond. 8/6 net.

THE GREEK AND EASTERN CHURCHES.

By Principal W. F. Adeney, D.D. Manchester. "International Theological Library." 12/-.

"A noteable addition to the series. The whole volume exhibits breadth of view and a fine judicial temper, and is a work for which students will be increasingly grateful."—London Quarterly Review.

A HANDBOOK OF CHRISTIAN ETHICS.

By J. Clark Murray, LL.D., Emeritus Professor of Philosophy, McGill University, Montreal. 6/- net.

"Students and preachers may safely be commended to this thorough and suggestive treatment of the subject. The book ought to take its place as one of the best and most attractive its subject has produced."—Literary World.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGION AND ETHICS.

Edited by J. HASTINGS, D.D.

"In the best sense of the term this is a weighty piece of work, and one that demands serious consideration from whatever aspect it may be approached. It is a work that for scholarship and all-round reliability will take its place among standard works of the kind."—Daily Chronicle.

Vol. One Now Ready.

In cloth binding, 28/- net. In half-morocco, 34/- net.

Also in twelve monthly parts, price 2/6 net each. 7 parts ready.

Complete Prospectus of this great work free.

T. & T. CLARK, 38, George Street, Edinburgh. 14, Paternoster Square, London.

London Agents: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO., Ltd.

proceeded from Europe, with its experience and ideal of public service; it could hardly have proceeded from Australia, with its mistrust of the individual. It could only proceed from a people who are, indeed, in a sense, democratic, but whose democracy is so set upon liberty that it is indifferent to equality. It is thus that Mr. Lee passes over lightly, almost without examination, the problem of the control of the millionaire. He says, in effect, that he won't want controlling; to say that he will is to despair of human nature. The millionaire will just overflow, by the sheer joy of living, into works of universal beneficence; all the time he will be creating men and creating things, like a god, for the delight of creation. Control him, hamper him, tie him up, and you sterilise him at once. You must give him all the wealth and all the power he wants. Yes, you must give him monopoly; and all you give will return a thousandfold in blessings to the whole society. No change in institutions is wanted. All that is wanted is a change in the hearts of millionaires; the millionaires will then change the hearts of the world.

Now this is a most interesting conception. It is the counter to Socialism, and the only counter. Individualism, as we have it, cannot stand up for a moment against the Socialistic ideal; that is why the writings of men like Mr. Mallock and M. Leroy-Beaulieu, with all their intelligence, are so ineffective; they are still-born, because they have no ideal. But Mr. Lee is an idealist of the extremest type. I grant you, he says, all the meanness, cruelty, and injustice of our individualistic system, and I propose to cure it—by more individualism. Socialists may be tempted to retort by scoffing at Mr. Lee's idealism, by confronting his notion of the millionaire-artist with their notion of the millionaire-brute. But such a retort does not lie in the mouths of Socialists, for they are nothing themselves if not idealists. They, too, conceive human nature working otherwise than it now works. And they must face the question: Is the Society they conceive more desirable and more possible than the Society Mr. Lee conceives?

Mr. Lee regards Socialism as a system under which men of genius would be "managed like automatons by society, or by a machine from the outside." If Socialism means that, and can mean nothing but that, it would not be much of a thing to achieve, though it might be better than what we have got. But why should it mean that? Just here seems to come in the limitation of the American outlook. The Americans have never had good government. Partly they have not had it because they do not believe in it, and partly they do not believe in it because they have not had it. But Europeans, and especially Englishmen, are accustomed to a high and noble type of public official. They have had their Wellingtons, their Gordons, their Lawrences, their Stephens, their Trevelyans. They know that public service and public honor are sufficient motives to great action; and they do not see why these motives should not be substituted, in the business world, for those other meaner ones that are making such havoc of society. Nor do they see why a man, because he is serving his country, and is paid a salary for doing it, should feel himself to be "managed like an automaton." They believe in the initiative and freedom of public servants. The whole case for Socialism lies here. If that assumption is false, the whole system is impracticable. But if it is true, the system is possible; and if it is possible, it seems to be more desirable than Mr. Lee's system. For Mr. Lee's system, after all, is that of monarchy or aristocracy. It leaves the mass of men dependent for their lives and fortunes on the few, and to these few it gives unlimited power. But if this arrangement is desirable in industry, why is it not also desirable in government? Does Mr. Lee, who repudiates social democracy, believe in political democracy? and if so, why? Is he so American in his individualism that he has ceased to be American in his democracy? And if so, of how many Americans is he typical? It would be interesting to know.

But there is another point. It is in the name, not of equality, but of opportunity, that Mr. Lee preaches his gospel. And on the point of opportunity he omits to discuss two questions which are fundamental between him and Socialism. First, is the millionaire to be allowed absolute ownership of land? Mr. Lee, no doubt, would answer in the affirmative, for he insists that his millionaire must be a monopolist. Indeed, unless he be a monopolist, he will hardly be a millionaire. But then, from the point of view of equal opportunity, by what right does the millionaire monopolise land? By that of superior ability? But the ownership of land presumes no superior ability. Anyone can own it who inherits it, or has the money to buy it; and he can then do nothing with it except take toll of society. Again, is the monopolist to be allowed to bequeath his wealth where he will? Then by what right, from Mr. Lee's point of view, does the son and successor, who may be a fool or a knave, become a millionaire? These two points —the ownership of land and the inheritance of wealth—are cardinal points in the discussion. The justification of Mr. Lee's millionaire is that he is a millionaire by genius. But as long as the private ownership of land and the private inheritance of wealth are possible, so long there will always be millionaires, not by genius, but by luck. Mr. Lee's ideal, in a word, is unsatisfactory, not because it is an ideal, but because it is an ideal inconsistent with itself. It purports to put the control of the world into the hands of men of genius, but it perpetuates an institution which may throw the control into the hands of fools and knaves. Is Mr. Lee prepared to modify or abrogate these institutions? If so, he has gone a long way towards the Socialism he repudiates. Meantime, all Socialists ought to read his book. For they, too, will need, in their community, the artist in industry; and they must consider whether they can get him without permitting him to be a millionaire.

G. Lowes Dickinson.

ART AND SPORT.*

The psychology of games is almost as baffling as the psychology of racial development. The play instinct, according to Herbert Spencer, lies at the bottom of all art. But play is very close to simulated contest, and from this gaudium certaminis spring, it would seem, those eternal antagonisms, art and sport. Yet, after all, as Mr. Haultain maintains, they are near akin: "the one being the intellectual and emotional, the other the muscular and nervous, representation of the primal and highly utilitarian instincts of hunger and love exerting themselves, in the form of hunting and mating and fighting, in a world of animal and vegetable life."

And the nearest of all to Nature of these simulated combats is the Antient and Honorable Game of Golf. For in this one game your contest is against the implacable: "The foe in golf is not your opponent, but great Nature herself, and the game is to see who will overreach her better, you or your opponent. In almost all other games you pit yourself against a mortal foe; in golf it is yourself against the world: no human being stays your progress as you drive your ball over the face of the globe. It is very like life in this, is golf. Life is not an internecine strife. We are all here fighting, not against each other, for our lives, but against Nature for our livelihood. In golf we can see a symbol of the history and fate of human kind: careering over the face of this open earth, governed by rigid rule, surrounded with hazards, bound to subdue Nature or ere we can survive, punished for the minutest divergence from the narrow course, and the end of it all . . . and the end of it all? . . . To reach an exiguous grave with as few mistakes as may be—some with high and brilliant flight, others with slow and lowly crawl."

Golf, then, isolated and alien from the more crowded and diffuse contests, illustrates admirably that playing at life which is so generally accepted as the basis of art. It is pleasant to believe that at one time art and sport alike were accepted as equal and gracious manifestations of this playing at life. It is pleasant to recapture as it were something of the glamour of those lost days in which Phideias and Olympian athlete alike translated willingly the divine will of the gods. Religion, art, sport—then, at least, there was neither divorce nor divergence. Zeus permitted the war toil which youth flung off so easily, Homer sang the immortal struggle, and young Greeks year after year renewed the divine swiftness of the heroes who were so in-

* "The Mystery of Golf." By Arnold Haultain. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.

ENGLISH REVIEW

MAY NUMBER NOW READY.

No. VI. CONTENTS. PRICE 2s. 6d.

Modern Poetry—

"ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE"

T. STURGE MOORE

DOLLIE RADFORD OSMAN EDWARDS

NORMAN DOUGLAS - The Sirens

FYODOR DOSTOËVSKY An Honest Thief

JOSEPH CONRAD - Some Reminiscences (part ii—vi)

W. H. HUDSON - - Goldfinches at Ryme Intrinsica

P. WYNDHAM LEWIS The "Pole"

PERCEVAL GIBBON - Afrikander Memories

BARON IGNATZ VON ASCHENDROF - The Nature of a Crime (ii)

GERTRUDE BONE - An Experience

STEPHEN REYNOLDS The Holy Mountain (ii)

CRITICAL ATTITUDES.

LESSER STATES AND GREAT NATIONS.

THE DRAMA OF THE MONTH.

TURKEY. By H. W. N. Brailsford.

THE RISE OF THE PAN-POLISH PARTY. By G. W.

GREECE. By W. H. B. Lynch.

And an Article by

PRESIDENT TAFT

ENTITLED—

"An Answer to the Panama Canal Critics."

DUCKWORTH & CO., HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

ENGLISH REVIEW

SMITH, ELDER & CO'S LIST.

New 6s. Novels.

THE FLYING MONTHS.

By FRANCIS M. PEARD, Author of "The Rose Garden," &c.

"One of the best novels of the year, with a beautifully happy ending."—Liverpool Daily Post.

PRISCILLA OF THE 'GOOD INTENT.'

By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE, Author of "Ricroft of Withens," "Benedick in Arcady," &c.

2nd Impression in the Press.

DAVINA.

By FRANCES G. BURMESTER, Author of "Clemency Shafto," "A November Cry," &c.

With 8 Illustrations. Large post 8vo, 6s. net.

LEAVES OF THE LOWER BRANCH:

The Attorney in Life and Letters.

By E. B. V. CHRISTIAN.

"Mr. Christian ransacks literature with no little learning. . . . He studies the attorney as the butt of humorists. . . . An interesting and diverting book."—Scotsman.

RE-ISSUE OF THE

Dictionary of National Biography

Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN and SIDNEY LEE.

IN TWENTY-TWO VOLUMES. Cloth, gilt top, 15s. net each; half-morocco, marble edges, 21s. net each.

Vols. I.-XIV. now ready. Vol. XV. (Owens-Pockrich) ready May 10; and a Volume will be issued each month until the completion of the Edition in December, 1909.

"We are all proud of the Dictionary, and few, if any, of us could now do without it."—Times.

"This new and marvellously cheap re-issue."

—Daily Telegraph.

 Prospectus, with specimen pages, post free on application.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

C. & H. CHAPMAN & HALL'S NEWEST LIST. C. & H.

Ready To-Day at all Libraries.

One of the Most Penetrating Human Documents of the Time.

A Stepson of Fortune.

The Memories, Confessions, and Opinions of HENRY MURRAY.

Demy 8vo. With Portrait. 10/6 net.

This is the true story of the writer's literary life, struggles, disappointments and consolations.

LARGE CROWN 8vo, 7/6.

Profusely Illustrated with Photographs, Drawings, and Facsimiles.

The Tower of London

FORTRESS, PALACE, and PRISON.

By CHARLES G. HARPER.

A popular history for old and young, abounding in romantic stories and in glowing records of tyranny and endurance.

The Third Edition of

E. TEMPLE THURSTON'S MASTERPIECE,

The City of Beautiful Nonsense.

Unquestionably the Most Popular Novel of the Spring.

The Fifth Edition of Arnold Bennett's Great Story,

THE OLD WIVES' TALE,

Which was published last October and is still selling every day.

NEXT WEEK:

BEYOND. By F. T. BULLEN.

A SPLENDID STORY OF SEA ADVENTURE.

SAMSON UNSHORN By REGINALD TURNER.

The Realistic Romance of a great Newspaper Proprietor's Success and Failure.

Please send this List to your Library in good time to get Early Copies of the New Books.

C. & H. CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD., LONDON, W.C. C. & H

timately close to them. Art expressed religion, and, in its turn, sport interpreted art with a yet more concrete significance. The genius of Pindar revealed the genius of the gods, and this or that athlete brought Pindar nearer to that capricious and careless people who would so unerringly hiss a false quantity.

But it was only then, perhaps, in the known history of the human race that these three manifestations of human aspiration were spontaneously exhibited in absolute harmony throughout the routine of daily life. Religion then blended graciously with the whole conception of national life, and religion which made its interpreter, the poet, sacred, smiled equally upon the athlete, who was in himself an image of the gods. The Olympian victor was no mere study of Pindar or model of Praxiteles; he was in himself the embodiment, in his physical completeness, of what the gods willed. The soothsayer might divulge in ecstasy the will of heaven, but Achilles threw his own genius into the rage and turmoil of youth.

Arbitrary classifications, however, have fastened upon us, and the last thing in the world that one demands from an athlete is genius, or from a game the thrill of art. But we do associate athlete and game with our own conception of conduct, and we are quite aware of the moral aspect of sport. Here, again, golf is a most excellent test, for in golf each stroke "must be played by the mind—gravely, quietly, deliberately. And this is why there is a psychology of golf, but there is no psychology of cricket or rackets or tennis or polo. If, for this theory, it is necessary to show that strong stimulation of the perceptive faculties tends to strong stimulation of the conceptive, one might point to the effect of music upon the mind and body. How easy it is to dance when the rhythmic valse strikes upon the ear, what waves of thought and emotion are set a-going at sound of martial airs!" And Mr. Haultain goes on to insist that golf is more than a test of a man's muscle or nerve or brain, that "it is a test of his inmost veriest self, of his soul and spirit, of his whole character and disposition, of his temperament, of his habit of mind, of the entire content of his mental and moral nature as handed down to him by unnumbered multitudes of ancestors."

Is it stretching the caprice of thought too far to suggest that to the golfer may be vouchsafed something like the thrill of art? Are sport and art in these later days too hopelessly incompatible? Before we utter the ironical affirmative let us at least consider actual facts. For example, let us glance round a crowded audience hanging breathlessly on a decision concerning a free kick. The game proceeds eagerly, furiously in this sincere simulation of the eternal life combat which many thousands are watching and even sharing through the imagination. It has become the habit to sneer at these spectators as idlers who should be shouldering rifles, and, indeed, so far as sport and conduct are concerned, they stand condemned. But, in their own way, they are living more amply, at a higher pressure, so that with each triumphant kick or charge the thin life-blood stirs more nobly in their veins. Now turn to another audience at a popular Anglo-Saxon rendering of the life play which is acknowledged to be art. Here the paltry subterfuges of the stage-carpenter are deliberately preferred to the ruthless and silent pressure of life. The clap-trap of talkative heroism takes the place of man fashioned by the wordless necessity. But these things are quickly and wisely forgotten. For, in this tense atmosphere it is possible to share a nobler and swifter phase of being. Small minds open out to ample declamation. Starved hearts feed hungrily on the love-flutters of romance. It is no wonder that the multitude acknowledges thankfully its debt to melodrama, for in this, the least and last of the arts, it finds its life-food of the imagination. That is what we are looking for, all of us, and one may maintain, with no exaggeration whatever, that these two audiences, the one in the football field and the other in the crowded theatre, are looking for and receiving precisely the same thing—the thrill of art.

Petronius may muse silently on the lure of a deeper beauty in some lost Greek statue. That is his life-food of the imagination, his thrill of art. But humanity as a whole seeks blindly exactly the same thing, the escape from itself. That is the tie between every one of us, the link between Prospero and Caliban, who sought, the one consciously, the other unconsciously, the same secret door of deliverance. However one strive for it, it is no exotic dream of the connoisseur, but the common goal of enduring humanity. And this goal, Mr. Haultain assures us in his delightfully written and fascinating book, is to be reached through the art and sport of golf.

A FIRST-HAND NOVEL.*

The first merit of a novel is to be the genuine expression of an individual mind. Alone, that merit will not suffice; but for its absence no assemblage of other merits will atone. Mrs. Garnett's novel conspicuously possesses it. We feel behind the narrative a real personality, and a first-hand view of life; and are nowhere tempted to imitate the gentleman in the anecdote, and to remark at successive stages: "That's Thackeray—or Shaw"—or any passing favorite of the hour. The characters, the story, above all the mental attitude are, in the best sense of that word, unconventional. The period, too, that of the Regency, not having been very frequently dealt with in modern fiction, will be comparatively fresh to most readers. Not arbitrarily has that date been chosen, since the leading personage is deeply involved in those political intrigues that centred round Napolon's projected invasion of England. In the delineation of Friend, so devoted a husband, so genial, able, and energetic, yet so totally devoid of veracity or of public honor, Mrs. Garnett set herself no easy task; but she has achieved it triumphantly. The man is solid and alive, never once do the inconsistencies of his nature strike us as unreal. We find no difficulty in believing that a woman of principle and of high spiritual ideals could have loved this man in spite of his low moral calibre; we understand how, to the two young people whom he had used as instruments for his own self-aggrandisement, his ultimate ruin seemed an overwhelming tragedy. In the contrast between the relations of these two couples—the elder matured by years of experience, the younger scarcely emerging from the hard shell of youth's unjust idealism—lies the very core of the book: the idée-mère which probably made the story seem to its author worth writing, and which, to discerning readers, makes it most essentially worth reading. The subtlety, the sympathetic insight, and the singular impartiality with which the four characters are drawn, can seldom have been equalled in a first book; indeed, there are not many contemporary English novelists, however practised, who can be trusted to display such artistic sincerity. Unfortunately, this quality is so little in demand among English readers that the presence of it may actually diminish rather than increase the popularity of the book.

It is, indeed, rather an interesting speculation to weigh the chances of "The Infamous John Friend's" general success. To begin with—though not ultimately—its artistic sincerity will tilt the balance adversely; on the other hand, the story is full of action, and even of adventure: there are smugglers, spies, stolen dispatches, hand to hand encounters, pistols presented, and nooses around men's necks, continual risks of life and death, and finally a trial on a capital charge. These are, of course, things dear to the heart of that superficial person, the general reader, whose imagination responds only to concrete ideas. But then the end is tragic; and the general reader is well known to desire at all costs what he—or she—calls "a happy ending," and to be quite careless whether such an ending stultifies (as in this case it would) the entire book. To a certain group of readers who like to think that they are receiving "instruction," and who regard "amusing" as an epithet of depreciation, the historical setting may prove attractive. Some proportion of this group, however, will probably be shocked by that frank recognition of the sexual element in human life, which is a part of Mrs. Garnett's sincerity.

Such recognition, in itself, ought surely to be welcomed by serious-minded people who desire that fiction should take its responsibilities seriously. In her presentation

* "The Infamous John Friend." By Mrs. R. S. Garnett. Duckworth. 6s.

MR. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS.

RANDOM REMINISCENCES OF MEN AND EVENTS.

By JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s.

With an Introductory Chapter by KING PETER OF SERVIA.

SERVIA BY THE SERVIANS.

Compiled and Edited by ALFRED STEAD,

Editor of "Japan by the Japanese." Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

DAYS IN HELLAS.

By MABEL MOORE,

Author of "Carthage of the Phœnicians." Illustrated. Crown 8vo 6s. net.

A NEW VOLUME OF "LITERATURES OF THE WORLD."

GERMAN LITERATURE.

By CALVIN THOMAS, LL.D. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

Now Six-Shilling Novels.

PETER HOMUNCULUS.

By GILBERT CANNAN.

AN INCOMPLEAT ETONIAN.

By FRANK DANBY,

Author of "Pigs in Clover," "The Heart of a Child," &c.

FRATERNITY.

By JOHN GALSWORTHY, [2nd Imp.

Author of "The Man of Property" and "The Country House."

TREASURE TROVE.

By Mrs. DAWSON SCOTT,

Author of "The Story of Anna Beames," &c.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

BOOKS OF LIBERAL RELIGION.

Crown 8vo, pp. 322, 3s. 6d. net.

THE ORIGIN AND CHARACTER OF THE BIBLE.

By J. T. SUNDERLAND, M.A. A revised and enlarged edition of "The Bible: Its Origin, Growth, and Character," brought up to date in every particular.

Fcap. 8vo, pp. 144, 1s. 6d. net.

MIRACLES & MYTHS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

By JOSEPH MAY, LL.D.

Crown 8vo, pp. 76, 1s. 6d. net.

WHOSE SON IS CHRIST P

Two lectures on Progress in Religion. By Prof. FRIEDRICH DELITZSCH, of Berlin.

Crown 8vo, pp. 152, 2s. net.

CHURCH COUNCILS AND THEIR DECREES.

By AMBROSE N. BLATCHFORD, B.A.

Crown 8vo. pp. 248, 3s. net.

SOME MEMORIES.

By ROBERT COLLYER, Litt.D. With Photogravure Portrait of the Author. Delightful reminiscences, rich in experiences, with quiet but irrepressible veins of humour and tenderness.

Crown 8vo, pp. 265, 3s. 6d. net.

PAUL THE MISSIONARY.

And other Studies. By Rev. P. W. DE QUETTEVILLE, M.A.

LONDON: PHILIP GREEN, 5, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY GUINEAS AWARD.

The Literary Agency of London has pleasure in announcing that it has been instructed by Mr. ANDREW MELROSE to conduct an

OPEN COMPETITION FOR THE BEST NOVEL.

submitted before November 30th, 1909.

The Adjudicators will be

MRS. FLORA ANNIE STEEL,
MISS MARY CHOLMONDELEY, and
MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

Particulars may be had by sending Stamped Addressed Envelope to

THE LITERARY AGENCY OF LONDON,

5, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

BOOKS TO BUY & READ.

FOLK-LORE AND FOLK STORIES OF WALES.

By MARIE TREVELYAN. Preface by EDWIN S. HARTLAND, F.S.A. Fcap. 4to, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net (by post 11s.).

[Ready shortly.

THE HISTORY OF PEMBROKESHIRE.

By the Rev. JAMES PHILLIPS. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net (by post 12s. 11d.).

BALKANIA.

A Short History of the Balkan States. By WILLIAM HOWARD-FLANDERS. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net (by post 2s. 9d.).

THE TRIUMPH OF MAN.

By PERCY SCHOFIELD. Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net (by post 1s. 9d.).

"Mr. Schofield has attempted a drama on lines not unlike Mr. Hardy's "Dynasts." His characters are cosmic fancies and passions. There are stately passages, and the lyrics are full of beauty."—Spectator.

SONGS AND POEMS: OLD AND NEW.

By WILLIAM SHARP (Fiona Macleod). Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 4s. 6d. net (by post 4s. 10d.).

MANY COLOURED ESSAYS.

By CHARLES J. DUNPHIE. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net (by post 5s. 4d.).

"Full of character and charm. The charm of Mr. Dunphie's work lies in its pleasant persuasiveness, in the genial air of intelligent good-fellowship which it diffuses. It is safe to say that whenever this pleasant book is read it will leave a friend behind it."—Daily Telegraph.

THE STRONGER WINGS.

By A. JEANS. A Story dealing with Austria during Metternich's time. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

THE LOVE-TALE OF A MISANTHROPE.

By ETHEL M. FORBES (née Angus). Author of "A Heart's Harmony." Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

"All who like a book to be filled with pleasant characters should read this delightful story."—Times.

Write for List of Antiquarian and General Literature free by post on application.

London: ELLIOT STOCK, 62 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

MAURICE HEWLETT'S NEW BOOK.

ARTEMISION: Idylls and Songs.

Royal 16mo, 3s. 6d. net. Also an edition, limited to 250 copies, for England and America, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Hewlett . . . has never made a bolder cast than in his new volume of poems, wherein he touches the shield of Keats and challenges him to a joust. And we will say at once the new challenger has not fared ill. . . . Mr. Hewlett's knowledge of Greek and of mythology is wider and more true than that of Keats, and, as Hellenic fancy clothed Artemis in endless forms, there is ample ground for a new singer to vary the legend. And Mr. Hewlett follows Keats not only in his passion for Hellenic myth, but in his metrical forms, and even in his verbal audacities. . . . The sonnets and songs show astonishing metrical skill, whilst the long poems have an undoubted poetic ring, together with that deathless Hellenic phantasy of which Maurice Hewlett has shown himself to be a master."—Observer.

"The interest of these idylls lies rather in their character-drawing. Callisto is magnificent, and we know few things of the kind better than the Niobe of the second idyll."—Birmingham Post.

THE MEANING OF HAPPINESS: A Discourse.

By LAURENCE ALMA-TADEMA. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"A fine and finely expressed essay."—Observer.

A FEW LYRICS.

By LAURENCE ALMA-TADEMA. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"These are simple little utterances, as dainty as the petals of the speedwell or the brief cadence of the spring willow-wren."—Times.

PERSONÆ OF EZRA POUND.

Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"Here is a poet with originality. . . . There is through all a thread of true beauty which gives the work something of a haunting charm. Mr. Pound is of the few who have gone forth into life and found something of a new seed, and his 'flower' is one that is unquestionably beautiful. He is much moved by the spirit of the troubadours—to them he turns again and again for theme, and gives us verses instinct with beauty."—Daily Telegraph.

THE MUSIC OF SPEECH.

By FLORENCE FARR. 4to, 2s. 6d.

VERSIONS AND PERVERSIONS OF HEINE AND OTHERS.

By Rev. GEORGE TYRRELL. With Preface "Of Versions and Perversions," by the Author. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [In the Press.

VIGO CABINET SERIES—NEW VOLUMES.

Roy. 16mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net.; wrapper, 1s. net.

RIVER MUSIC AND OTHER POEMS. By W. R. TITERTON, Author of "Love Poems," "Studies in Solitary Life," &c.

VANDERDECKEN, AND OTHER PIECES. By GILBERT HUDSON.

THE PHILANTHROPISTS, AND OTHER POEMS. By RUTH YOUNG.

THREE POEMS. By Dr. C. F. GRINDROD.

THIRTY-ONE POEMS. By LIONEL JOHNSON. With a biographical Note.

"THE REAL OMAR." Quatrains of Omar Khayyam. From a Literal Prose Translation by E. HERON-ALLEN. Done into verse by A. B. TALBOT. [Third thousand.

THE SHADOW OF THE GLEN—Riders to the Sea. By J. M. SYNGE. [Third thousand.

GERMAN LYRISTS OF TO-DAY. A Selection of Lyrics from contemporary German Poetry. Done into English Verse by Daisy Broicher. [Immediately.

London: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

Mrs. Garnett has shown delicacy without prudishness; but has perhaps allowed what is, after all, but one element, to occupy rather too large a proportion of space in her picture. This observation by no means applies to that critical chapter in which she skilfully throws her story into the form of retrospective confidences between the elder and the younger woman, thus avoiding the details of direct narrative, and concentrating attention upon the contrasted feelings and characters of the two. It is not this chapter but another which the judicious may be disposed to wish away: that, namely, in which Napoleon converses with a subordinate upon his ambitions in regard to England. Not only is the chapter in itself hardly successful; it is also outside the main current of the story, and its place might be better filled by a sentence or two.

"The Infamous John Friend" is a novel from which it is particularly difficult to extract any passage; partly because it is, on the whole, extremely well welded together, partly because felicity of phrase is not one of its excellences. Mrs. Garnett's style is far less individual than her thought; lucid, unaffected, and marked by the tone of good literary company, it yet lacks charm, harmony, and lightness: it is to be read, indeed, rather as a vehicle than as a style; and though a style should be a vehicle, it should not be only a vehicle. Here is a sample:—

> "The history of her married life had been of a continuous struggle to bring her husband's mind into harmony with hers. Repeated failures had not taught her that it was a hopeless task. Beaten on one point she took up a fresh position, always to be repulsed by his indulgent indifference. Yet his very insensibility had something in it to charm her, a sort of animal calm and strength that were soothing to her highly-strung temperament. It seemed to her that he grew the more lovable the more she disapproved. She hugged the thought that it was her duty to love him; to win him by obeying and pleasing. Her hope was that her prayers and the silent influence of her example might at last effect what her words could not do. Perhaps her death might awaken him; and in that thought she was glad to die. She was a woman whose whole life lay in the spiritual world; passionately moral, fervently religious. And through the curious attraction which contrasted temperaments often have for each other, her husband loved her the more for her unlikeness to himself.
>
> "He was a man of forty-seven, standing about five feet nine, built like a bullock for breadth and strength, so as to give the impression of being less than his height. For all his massiveness of frame he yet had an appearance of great activity; and a martial suggestion in his carriage, an indefinable hint in his countenance, inspired the thought 'a most formidable antagonist.' It could hardly be his expression that conveyed this veiled threat, for it was one mainly of humorous intelligence, yet showing resolution and command. Some people have an odd resemblance to certain animals; and though there was nothing vulpine about Friend's bullet head, square jaw, and massive brow, yet a look of sly, cheerful cunning, and something latent that might prove to be ferocity, reminded one on seeing him in no small degree of a fox."

There is nothing slipshod here; the work is solid, careful, in a sense adequate; but the final grace is not attained. Perhaps, even, there has been too much care, so that the mysterious quality known in studios as "atmosphere" has been improved away. In the conversations, too, although the thoughts and qualities of the speakers are always perfectly differentiated, their language varies but little. It is in this direction that Mrs. Garnett's talent is a trifle hard and stiff; though it should be added that as she warms to the work she masters her material better than at the beginning. Of some novels it is safe to say that they are the 'prentice work of writers who will do better things by and by; of a few the experienced critic can perceive that each is the single ripened fruit into which the essence of a whole personality has been distilled, and that from that trunk no further blossom will come to maturity. Upon other novels again it is impossible to pronounce whether they will prove to be beginnings or to be completions; and to this class belongs "The Infamous John Friend." As it stands it is interesting; and conceivably it may be but the first of a yet more interesting series, but it is also possible that it will stand alone, and that those "Brownies" of whom Stevenson tells and who have certainly this time had Mrs. Garnett under their thraldom, may never again inspire her. If they should, much may be hoped from a writer who follows their call so unswervingly. In any case, readers who care for faithful pyschology will find this volume worth their study; while those other readers who care chiefly for a new thrill should be careful not to overlook a writer bold enough to stage her last scene at the very . . . But, no; this is not fair. Let such readers seek out the new thrill for themselves.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"The Nineteenth Century and After" for May opens with a series of virtual interviews with six German public men on the naval situation, contributed by Mr. Æneas O'Neill. These authorities all reject the idea of a limitation of armaments as unpractical, dangerous, and incompatible with the dignity of a great State like Germany. On the other hand Mr. O'Neill states that "at the present moment in influential German circles, official as well as non-official, the desirability of an Anglo-German understanding is constantly urged in emphatic, though unfortunately vague, terms," but he fears that German feeling is such that "there is a fatal incapacity for mutual understanding, even in the highest quarters." Mr. Gibson Bowles denounces the Declaration of London on the ground that "the interest of this country, which depends wholly on its maritime powers for security, is manifestly to maintain all the maritime rights of the belligerent, and to resist any encroachment thereon by the neutral." We have already discussed the Declaration and what it involves in our leader columns. "The Origin of the Turkish Revolt" is treated by Halil Halid Bey. He lays all the blame upon "the unprincipled cosmopolitan league called the 'Liberal Union Party'," and affirms that with the victory of the Constitutionalists the roots of reaction has been destroyed, while "the danger of internal difficulties to be met by the Ottoman reformers will not be so insurmountably great as is represented by some European politicians." Canon Henson criticises "The Lambeth Ideal of Reunion" on the ground that the Lambeth Conference ignores the very existence of Nonconformity. Mr. D. C. Lathbury discusses Prayer Book Revision from the High Anglican standpoint, and Mr. Lewis Melville contributes some unpublished letters by William Beckford. Other articles are "Decentralisation of Government in India," by Sir Arundel Arundel; "Ireland and the Budget," by Mr. T. M. Kettle, M.P.; "State Feeding of School Children in London," by Sir Charles Elliott; and "The 'Unification' of South Africa," by Sir Walter Peace.

* * *

Mr. Edwin Pears contributes a powerful article to "The Contemporary Review" on "The Crisis in Turkey," detailing the history of the revolution and counter-revolution, and ending with the view that though the want of the country, even in this hour of danger, is of capable men, that 'the Turkish people are not going to part with the Constitution." Dr. Robertson Nicoll writes an appreciation of Swinburne. "Liberty," he says, "was to Swinburne a religion. He hated tyranny as few have hated it, and his horror and loathing clothed themselves in words at once musical and terrible. It has been said with truth that he was the last writer living who still felt the impulse of the original ardor of the French Revolution, who carried on the torch which he had received from Byron and Shelley and Landor, and the young Wordsworth. . . . He sometimes gives the impression of being no more than a master of words, but it is a thoroughly false impression. His work, even when most perverse and wayward, is full of thought." Father George Tyrrell finds that "The Dearth of Clergy" is due in part to an intellectual difficulty in accepting the formulas with which candidates for Holy Orders are confronted, and in part to financial pressure. "The Navy Controversy" is examined by the writer who signs himself "Conning Tower." He urges that the correct line with regard to "Dreadnoughts" and the ships that preceded them, is to adopt a medium view, though he holds that our superiority in the older types is no excuse for relaxing our efforts in building ships constructed after the latest models. Dr. Hagberg Wright gives a summary of some recent French criticisms and biographies of the English poets. Mr. Andrew Lang writes on "Preanimistic Religion," and Mr. H. Stanley Jevons contributes the first of a series of articles on "The Causes of Unemployment."

FIVE LECTURES ON CO-EDUCATION.

By ENNIS RICHMOND, Principal of West Heath School for Boys and Girls, Hampstead.

1. A NATURAL EDUCATION.
2. FOR OUR DAUGHTERS.
3. TWO ASPECTS OF CO-EDUCATION.
4. CO-EDUCATION AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
5. WHY NOT CO-EDUCATION?

Price Threepence each, post free.

Issued by the Women's Printing Society, Brick Street, Piccadilly.

BOOKSELLERS.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO LARGE BIBLE BUYERS,
CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS, SCHOOLS, &c.
THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C., are offering 5,000 BIBLES also VICTORIAN PRAYER BOOKS at HALF-PRICE.
ILLUSTRATED BIBLES from 1s.
LISTS SENT POST FREE. TELEPHONE: CENTRAL 329

BOOKS AT SPECIAL PRICES
Catalogue No. 354. May, 1909. Now ready.
CONTAINING MANY NEW AND ATTRACTIVE LINES IN PUBLISHERS REMAINDERS
WILLIAM GLAISHER, Limited, (Remainder and Discount Booksellers), 265, High Holborn, London, (and 14, George Street, Croydon)
The books are on view at both addresses.

Buy The Saturday Westminster
Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because
it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It Never Fails to Please & Satisfy
Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)
Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.
A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.
Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Will be Ready Shortly, and will be sent free, on application to the Manager.

SECOND EDITION.

AUTHORITY AND THE LIGHT WITHIN.

By EDWARD GRUBB, M.A., Author of "Social Aspects of the Quaker Faith." Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. net.

"Edward Grubb, to whom the Society of Friends owes many debts, has don well to reprint his valuable series of articles on the elements of the philosophy of Quakerism. It is to be hoped that in this convenient form his great message will have a wide circulation."—Friends' Quarterly Examiner.

LONDON:
JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 & 14, FLEET STREET, E.C.
HEADLEY BROS., BISHOPSGATE ST. WITHOUT, E.C.

The Right Hon. H. H. ASQUITH, M.P.

A Biography and Appreciation. By FRANK ELIAS. With Photogravure Portrait Frontispiece of Mr. Asquith. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top. Illustrated 3s. 6d. net.

"Well executed. . . . We congratulate the author on the successful accomplishment of a most difficult task. The life of the Prime Minister as here set forth is frankly told, and offers more agreeable reading than most such books do."—Athenæum.

AN ENTIRELY NEW EDITION.

A WORKING WOMAN'S LIFE.

The Autobiography of Marianne Farningham. With an additional chapter dealing with the closing days of her life. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, with photogravure portrait and eight Illustrations on art paper, 3s. 6d. net

"Her private life intermingles naturally and charmingly with her account of the work, and the two together make a book more interesting than most novels."—Westminster Gazette.

LONDON: JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 & 14, FLEET STREET, E.C.

A. C. FIFIELD'S New List.

By OLIVE SCHREINER. CLOSER UNION. Boards, 1s. nett. Postage 2d Has far more than the immediate interest due to the approaching Union of South Africa, and expresses with its author's wonted eloquence and sincerity her outlines of ideal, wise and honorable government, and her plea for the natives.

By SAMUEL BUTLER. GOD THE KNOWN AND UNKNOWN. Cloth Gilt, 1s. 6d. nett. Postage, 3d. A newly discovered work by the author of "Erewhon" and and "The Way of all Flesh," stating seriously and finely a new conception of the Universe, and possibly destined to re-instate a religious ideal in human life and thought. It claims God as both knowable and unknowable, gives new meaning to old dead phrases, life and fulness to thin visions, and attempts to satisfy both heart and brain.

New editions of Butler's other works include his relentless novel, "The Way of All Flesh," 6s.; his brilliant satires, "Erewhon," 2s. 6d. nett. and "Erewhon Revisited," 2s. 6d. nett; and his "Essays on Life, Art, and Science," 2s. 6d. nett. Postage 4d. each.

By WILLIAM H. DAVIES. NATURE POEMS AND OTHERS. Boards, 1s. net. Postage 1½d. The continued sales of this new volume by the tramp poet (now over 1,000 copies) is evidence of its readers' delight and recommendation.

Mr. Davies' "Autobiography of a Super-Tramp," 6s., is now in its second edition. Contains a 14 page preface by Bernard Shaw.

By ST. JOHN HANKIN. THE LAST OF THE DE MULLINS. A Play without a Preface. 1s. 6d. nett. Postage 1½d. Mr. Hankin's new play will be ready on May 12.

By F. E. GREEN. HOW I WORK MY SMALL FARM. With 5 Photographs. 1s. nett. Postage 1½d. A second edition of this practical modern work, dealing with cows, pigs, bees, poultry and vegetables, on 16 acres.

By Col. D. C. PEDDER. WHERE MEN DECAY. A Survey of Rural Problems. Cloth Gilt, 2s. 6d. nett. Postage 3d. An unusually able and and eloquent study of English villages to-day, in the grip of repressive influences. "It is a living book, written from the heart. A book to read."—Daily News.

By E. H. CROUCH. A TREASURY OF SOUTH AFRICAN POETRY. Selected and edited by E. H. Crouch. Cloth Gilt. 4s. Roan Leather, gilt edges, 6s. Postage 4d. A new and enlarged edition of a successful book. 352 pages, crown 8vo.

By C. D. SMITH. NATURAL MONOPOLIES, in relation to Social Democracy. Cloth Gilt, 2s. 6d. nett. Postage 4d. "Readers whose minds are not too tightly bound in the traditional technicalities of political economy will find much food for thought in this book.—Manchester Guardian."

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, FLEET STREET, E.C.

Under the apt title of "My Restless Life" (Grant Richards, 7s. 6d. net), Mr. Harry de Windt has published a book of reminiscences which carries the reader into many out-of-the-way scenes and into the most varied company. We have descriptions of life in Saráwak (Mr. de Windt's sister married the Rajah), in London during the 'seventies, in Australia, Russia, Siberia, Japan, Klondike, and, indeed, almost everywhere that attracts men of an adventurous bent. Mr. de Windt must hold the record as a lecturer, for he tells us that during four winters he travelled forty thousand miles and never spoke less than five times a week. His experiences have brought him into contact with many people of distinction, and he has something to say of each, not often, it is true, of much importance, but he rattles on in an amusing way, and his vivacious pages are certain to please the many readers who look for plenty of light gossip combined with some interesting glimpses of foreign countries.

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning. April 30. | Price Friday morning, May 7. |
|---|---|---|
| Consols 2½ per cent. ... ... ... | 85 ... | 85¼ |
| French 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 97 ... | 97 |
| German 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 85 ... | 85½ |
| Southern Pacific ... .. ... ... | 123⅜ ... | 125⅜ |
| Turkish Unified ... ... ... ... | 92½ ... | 92½ |

There is no longer any reason to feel anxious about the effect of the Budget. In spite of Mr. Balfour's talk about national credit the City has been decidedly reassured. Consols have been firm and seem more likely to rise than to fall. There is much adverse criticism as to the old sinking fund. But the average City man is quite satisfied about income tax and death duties. There is no talk of confiscation. The stock markets have been diversely affected by other events. South American stocks have been weakish in consequence of the strike in Buenos Ayres and the troubles in Nicaragua. There is a report that Mexico and the United States will intervene in Central America. The American market was depressed at first by the Supreme Court's ruling in favor of the Hepburn Commodity clause, but after a day's reflection decided that this would really be beneficial, and prices went up again. Generally speaking, speculative stocks are by way of rising, because there is plenty of cheap money for speculative purposes. The bank return, it is true, shows a heavy falling-off in reserve, but the market seems confident that cheap money will last some time. On the other hand prices are rising, and the wool market in particular is quite excited. A West Riding authority tells me that in the Yorkshire worsted trade manufacturers are working at high pressure.

German Finance.

Germany's finances are getting into a more and more hopeless position, and the last loan of 40 millions sterling for the empire and Prussia has not been at all well received. The total applications are said to amount to only 75 millions sterling. Yet the 4 per cents. are issued at the same price as Italian 3½ per cents! There seems to have been practically no participation from France or England or Holland; but some help has come from Belgium and Scandinavia. Meanwhile the German Treasury is in despair. Nearly all the taxes have been rejected, though a tax on the increment of land has been virtually agreed upon in place of death duties. On the other hand the Reichstag has passed a Bill for raising the salaries of imperial officials to compensate them for the increased cost of food and living under the new high tariff. This adds £1,250,000 to an annual deficit of some 25 millions sterling, and will involve an addition of a million to the Prussian Budget, which is in an equally parlous plight.

The Buenos Ayres and Pacific.

"I believe that Argentina will become one of the most wonderful countries in the world for small holdings." That is a bold prophecy to make of a country where at present anything between 200 and 1,000 acres is considered a little farm; but it was made this week by Lord St. Davids, who spoke, fresh from a visit to the Argentine, and has had a long and intimate experience of the land's development. To an unusually large meeting of shareholders he described in very vivid language the wonderful change that is taking place in Argentina and the extraordinary fertility of its soil; the great tracts of alfalfa-growing country in which you can nowhere find a stone as large as a pin's head; the vine and fruit country on the western border watered by the snows from the Andes; the wheat and maize lands in the Bahia Blanca districts, tilled by Jews of the Russian dispersion, starting life afresh among a population of half-bred Spaniards; and, above all, the rich and immediate rewards of agriculture which almost everywhere follow the building of the railways. It was a fascinating picture and a powerful defence of the forward policy for which Lord St. Davids himself is largely responsible. But he was opening up, after all, a more or less distant prospect, and, except when it is under the spell of some great personality, the Stock Exchange does not set much store by distant prospects; it is more concerned with the next dividend. And in the matter of the next dividend the speaker was a good deal less encouraging. The wheat harvest, he said, is likely to be disappointing, at any rate in the districts served by the Pacific line; and the maize which ought to have been a bumper crop has been spoilt by locusts. Consequently there is little prospect of increasing traffics for the rest of the year, and everybody knows that unless traffics increase, the dividend must be reduced. There has therefore been a sharp fall in the price of the ordinary stock; sales have been heavy and the quotation is down to 110½, 3½ points below that of a week ago. Of course, the strike in Buenos Ayres has assisted the fall, but the main reason is the lesson read by the market between the lines of Lord St. Davids' speech.

Brazilian and Argentine Investments.

"I hesitate to express a very decided opinion about Brazilian investments," writes a stockbroker of great ability and experience who has just returned from Rio and Buenos Ayres. "I went to Rio for a short visit to see the installation of the Tramways, Light, and Power Company. But, with the exception of this, I return with a feeling that there are many more risks in these than in Argentine stocks. Political affairs, as gathered from the reports of foreigners, are not satisfactory. I heard it said that the Argentines are not a nation, but in Argentina the people are prosperous and busy on their own affairs, and have no desire for political change, which in South America means bloodshed and exile." In Brazil there is much disaffection with present conditions. Financial affairs did not seem to be in a satisfactory state. The bankers report that the Government interference in exchange has stopped the import of gold and that the surtax on coffee has stopped its export; railway men say that the prohibitive tariff has excluded many useful imports, and the people seem to be getting steadily poorer. Many look forward with apprehension to 1911, when sinking fund payments on the National Debt have to be resumed, and the 1879 loan repaid, and confess that it is not clear how this can be done except by renewed loans. It seems difficult to hope for a better price for the great staple of coffee with a large crop in prospect, and a great part of the Government holding unliquidated. At present prices, the industry is unprosperous, while two of the greatest provinces depend almost entirely upon coffee. "I spent some time in seeing the Rio Tramways, Light, and Power Undertaking. The power installation at Larges is a great success. There is a sufficiency of water for all present requirements, with a good margin of safety, and for a large development of business." The various undertakings which the company has acquired in and near Rio are still more or less in a process of conversion, into electricity in the case of the tramways, from local to their own management in the cases of some of the more recently acquired companies, and in the case of the gas company to a reorganisation soon to be effected." Such a state of affairs makes the company's position to some extent still a matter of estimates, but there is little doubt locally of the value of the company's undertaking.

Lucellum.

LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.
Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,600,000.

Directors.

Hon. Sir ERIC BARRINGTON, K.C.B.
JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.
Right Hon. Viscount GOSCHEN.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.
WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.
Sir THOMAS JACKSON, Bart.
WM. McKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.

Auditors.

HENRY GRANT, Esq. THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq.
Hon. STUART PLEYDELL-BOUVERIE.

Head Office Manager—HERMAN RICHARD WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—FREDERICK JAMES BARTHORPE.
Country Manager—WILLIAM GEORGE GRIBBLE.
Chief Inspector—FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT.
Chief Accountant—THEOPHILUS JAMES CARPENTER.
Secretary—EDGAR FRANCIS ROBINSON.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.

Foreign Exchange Office—80, Cornhill, E.C.

266 Branches in London and Country.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms. Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS made to all parts of the World.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given or the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£18 18s. NORWEGIAN and NORTH CAPE CRUISE.
£11 11s. NORWEGIAN FJORDS CRUISES.
Sailings:—June 26, July 17, July 31.
£18 18s. ST. PETERSBURG for MOSCOW, STOCKHOLM, COPENHAGEN, CHRISTIANIA, etc., August 14.

Full particulars from the Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A TONIC FOR THE FEET.—For all Relaxed, Tender, Swollen conditions of the Feet, Pedestrine gives instant relief. It allays inflammation and the painful smarting that keeps you in perpetual discomfort. A trial will convince. 1/3 and 2/6 post free. Marshall & Co., 70A, Basinghall Street, E.C.

TANGYES
TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE
For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE
RED WHITE & BLUE
Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

"PYRENO"
(REGISTERED).
A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.
Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER.
GARTSIDE SCHOLARSHIPS OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRIES.

Candidates must be of British nationality and over the age of 18 and under the age of 23 at the date of election. The Scholarships, three of which may be awarded in June, will be tenable for two years and of the value of £80 the first year (which must be spent at the University), and from £150 to £250 the second year (which must be spent in the study of subjects bearing on commerce or industry in the United States, Germany, or other country or countries approved by the electors).

Candidates must send in their applications, together with testimonials of good character and record of previous training, on or before June 1st to the REGISTRAR, from whom further particulars can be obtained.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.

Six Scholarships (£60 and under) will be offered on June 16th. Examination at Giggleswick, in London, or at Preparatory Schools. Particulars from Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle Yorkshire.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

MALVERN COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATIONS, JUNE 1st 2nd, and 3rd, one of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Boys) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in Examination. Council Nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well but fail to obtain a Scholarship.—For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Moulton and other Scholarships in July.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

Thoroughly sound practical education—the best training for a commercial career.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.
Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauser, Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 " — ... 6d. "

MESSRS. BELL'S BOOKS.

READY SHORTLY. Imp. 8vo, 15s. net.

MODERN HOMES.

Selected Examples of Dwelling Houses. Described and Illustrated. By T. RAFFLES DAVISON. With nearly 300 Illustrations, chiefly from Pen Drawings by the Author.

A book of typical specimens of modern country-house architecture, which should appeal to all who are interested in modern architecture, or who are contemplating building.

FIFTH EDITION NOW READY. Royal 16mo, cloth, 1s. net.

THYSIA:

An Elegy in Forty-five Sonnets.

"Sonnets which I hold to be of exquisite quality. . . . They have that pathos inscribed on marble in the best Greek Epitaphs."—Mr. Frederic Harrison in the Nineteenth Century, November, 1908.

JUST PUBLISHED. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

THE WAY OF LIGHT,

And other Verses.

By the Rev. THOMAS J. HARDY, Author of "The Gospel of Pain."

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

ATHLETIC GAMES IN THE EDUCATION OF WOMEN.

By GERTRUDE DUDLEY, Director of the Women's Department of Physical Education, Chicago University, and FRANCIS A. KELLOR.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

HISTORY OF THE LATIN AND TEUTONIC NATIONS, 1494-1514.

By LEOPOLD VON RANKE.

A Revised Translation by G. R. DENNIS, B.A. (London). With an Introduction by EDWARD ARMSTRONG, M.A., Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford.

JUST PUBLISHED. Vol. IV., containing Parts VII. and VIII. Small 4to, with 3 Maps and 2 Plans, 12s. net.

THE ITINERARY OF JOHN LELAND.

Newly Edited from the MSS. by LUCY TOULMIN SMITH.

This edition will be completed in five volumes, of which Vol. I. (containing Parts I.-III.), price 18s. net, Vol. II. (Parts IV. and V.), price 12s. net, and Vol. III. ("The Itinerary in Wales"), price 10s. 6d. net, are also published. Vol. V., completing the edition, is in active preparation.

JUST PUBLISHED. Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

LIFE OF DEAN COLET,

Founder of St. Paul's School.

By the Rev. J. H. LUPTON, M.A., late Surmaster of St. Paul's School, and formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. With an Appendix of some of his English Writings, and a Facsimile Portrait taken from the Engraving in Holland's "Heroölogia." New and Revised Edition.

JUST PUBLISHED. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

LONDON'S LURE.

An Anthology of Prose and Verse Passages bearing on London.

By HELEN and LEWIS MELVILLE. With Title-page, Binding, and End-Papers designed by M. V. Wheelhouse.

In this volume Mr. and Mrs. Melville have gathered together passages from the works of the great writers who have written of the peculiar charm and fascination of London. The selections is wide and catholic, ranging as it does from Lamb, Herrick, Dickens, Thackeray, Hazlitt, Goldsmith, and Wordsworth, to Calverley, J. M. Barrie, Robert Hitchens, and Joseph Conrad.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, with 4 Coloured Plates and 24 other Illustrations, 7s. 6d.

FISH STORIES.

Alleged and Experienced, with a Little History, Natural and Unnatural.

By CHARLES FREDERICK HOLDER and DAVID STARR JORDAN.

Post 8vo, with 48 Illustrations and a Map, 7s. 6d. net.

ALASKA, THE GREAT COUNTRY.

By ELLA HIGGINSON.

In this volume Miss Higginson, whose writings are well known in America, tells the story of the growth of Alaska, for which at present little-known country she predicts a great future. The numerous illustrations are a special feature of the book.

THE QUEEN'S TREASURES SERIES.

Small Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net each. New Volumes.

JAN OF THE WINDMILL.

By Mrs. EWING. With 8 Coloured Plates and Decorated Title-page, Covers, and End-papers, by M. V. WHEELHOUSE. [Now Ready.

MRS. OVERTHEWAY'S REMEMBRANCES.

By Mrs. EWING. With 8 Coloured Plates and Decorated Title-page, Covers, and End-papers, by M. V. WHEELHOUSE. [Ready Immediately.

Bell's Miniature Series of Great Writers.

NEW VOLUME JUST PUBLISHED. Pott 8vo, cloth. Illustrated. 1s. net.

GOLDSMITH.

By E. S. LANG BUCKLAND.

Full List sent on Application.

AN IMPORTANT NEW NOVEL. Cloth, 6s.

[Ready Immediately.

STARBRACE.

By SHEILA KAYE SMITH, author of "The Tramping Methodist."

THE WORLD'S AUTHORITY.

WEBSTER'S INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY.

(Twentieth Century Edition.)

REVISED AND ENLARGED, WITH AN APPENDIX OF 25,000 WORDS, PHRASES, AND DEFINITIONS.

2,348 Pages. 5,000 Illustrations.

WEBSTER is the Standard Authority in the Postal Telegraph Department of the United Kingdom, of the Australian Commonwealth, New Zealand, and the South African Colonies.

WEBSTER is constantly used for reference in the Royal Courts of Justice.

WEBSTER is used in the offices of more than 1,200 English Journals.

Write for Detailed Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, Hundreds of Opinions of Eminent Men, and Prices in various Styles of Binding.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, Portugal Street, Kingsway, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1909.

The Nation

SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1909.

MACMILLAN AND CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

1909 Issue Ready Immediately.

THE STATESMAN'S YEAR BOOK. Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World, for the Year 1909. Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, LL.D. Revised after Official Returns. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

PSYCHE'S TASK. A Discourse concerning the influence of Superstition on the Growth of Institutions. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

AUSTRALIAN SOCIALISM. An Historical Sketch of its Origin and Developments. By A. ST. LEDGER. Crown 8vo. [Shortly

THE GOLDEN TREASURY OF THE BEST SONGS AND LYRICAL POEMS IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. Selected and Arranged by F. T. PALGRAVE. The First and Second Series. Complete in one volume. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Shortly

ART MIS TO ACTŒON, AND OTHER VERSE. By EDITH WHARTON. Extra Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net. [May 14

THE POEMS AND SONNETS OF LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON. Comprising "Swallow Flights," "In the Garden of Dreams," "At the Wind's Will," &c. With Introduction by HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [May 14

MARS AS THE ABODE OF LIFE. By PERCIVAL LOWELL, A.B., LL.D., Author of "Mars and its Canals," &c Illustrated, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE POOR LAW REPORT OF 1909. A Summary Explaining the Defects of the Present System and the Principal Recommendations of the Commission, so far as relates to England and Wales. By HELEN BOSANQUET. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

SIXPENNY EDITION. Now Ready.

THE TAXATION OF THE LIQUOR TRADE. By JOSEPH ROWNTREE and ARTHUR SHERWELL, M.P. Abridged Edition, sewed 6d.

NEW VOLUME COMMENCES WITH THE MAY NUMBER.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

BEAUVAIS: The Magnificent Fragment. By ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL. Pictures by JOSEPH PENNELL.

TWO GREAT SPANISH PAINTERS: Sorolla and Zuloaga. By CHRISTIAN BRINTON.

BIG GAME IN EAST AFRICA. By EDGAR BEECHER BRONSON.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

Volume II. Just Published.

A CATALOGUE RAISONNÉ OF THE WORKS OF THE MOST EMINENT DUTCH PAINTERS OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. Based on the work of John Smith, by C. HOFSTEDE DE GROOT. Translated and Edited by EDWARD G. HAWKE. In 10 vols. 8vo, 25s. net each.

Vol. II. The Works of Aelbert Cuyp and Philips Wouwerman.

SOCIAL LIFE AT ROME IN THE AGE OF CICERO. By W. WARDE FOWLER, M.A., Author of "The Roman Festivals of the Period of the Republic," &c. With Map and Plans. 8vo, 10s. net.

Second and Cheaper Impression.

THE PROVINCES OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. From Cæsar to Diocletian. By THEODOR MOMMSEN. Translated with the Author's Sanction and Additions by Prof. WILLIAM P. DICKSON, D.D., LL.D. In 2 vols, with 10 Maps, 8vo, 21s. net.

The text of this second impression has been revised throughout by Prof. Haverfield, who has added a new appendix on Roman Britain.

MONUMENTS OF CHRISTIAN ROME, from Constantine to the Rénaissance. By ARTHUR L. FROTHINGHAM, Ph.D., Professor of Archaeology and Ancient History at Princeton University. Illustrated. Extra Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. [Handbooks of Archaeology and Antiquities

GREEK ARCHITECTURE. By PROFESSOR ALLAN MARQUAND, Ph.D., L.H.D. Illustrated. Extra, Crown 8vo, 10s. net. [Handbooks of Archaeology and Antiquities [May 14

THE ANCIENT GREEK HISTORIANS. (Harvard Lectures.) By Professor J. B. BURY, Litt.D., LL.D. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE WHITE SISTER. A Story of Rome. By the late F. MARION CRAWFORD.

GERVASE. By MABEL DEARMER, Author of "The Alien Sisters,' &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The World: "An extremely interesting and cleverly worked-out story, which at the outset may be pronounced to be the very best Mrs. Dearmer has written."

New Work by the Writer of "Confessio Medici."

FAITH AND WORKS OF CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. Extra Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

DANTE'S INFERNO, PURGATORIO, AND PARADISO. Translated by EDWARD WILBERFORCE. 3 vols. Globe 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

SPRING BOOKS AT THE BODLEY HEAD

LOVE LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE AND JANE WELSH

Edited by ALEXANDER CARLYLE. Uniform with "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle." 2 vols., 25s. net.

Daily News.—"The literature of letters will be searched in vain for a parallel to these volumes. Even the love letters of the Brownings suffer by comparison."

Truth.—"Surely the most original and interesting that ever were interchanged between lovers of such note! They have all the interest of an absorbing novel."

THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF NAPOLEON.

By JOSEPH TURQUAN. With 22 Full-Page Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

A SISTER OF PRINCE RUPERT:

Elizabeth, Princess Palatine, Abbess of Herford.

By ELIZABETH GODFREY. With 17 Illustrations Reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints, &c. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Morning Post.—"No historical biography published during the last few years surpasses this one in the minuteness of its research and the width of the field it has covered."

LADIES FAIR AND FRAIL:

Sketches of the Demi-Monde during the Eighteenth Century.

By HORACE BLEACKLEY. With 16 Portraits Reproduced from Contemporary Sources. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Tatler.—"An interesting and most fascinating chronicle of the lighter side of the Eighteenth Century."

THE PHILOSOPHY OF LONG LIFE.

By JEAN FINOT. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

THE JOURNAL OF JOHN MAYNE

During a Tour on the Continent upon its Re-opening after the Fall of Napoleon, 1814.

Edited by his Grandson, JOHN MAYNE COLLES. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Morning Post.—"Very readable and obviously trustworthy and sincere."

Daily Telegraph.—"Interesting, not only for what it contains of descriptions and impressions, but also as the expression of one who may be regarded as a typical well-educated Englishman of his time."

THE WOMAN AND THE CAR.

By DOROTHY LEVITT. 2s. 6d. net.

Globe.—"May heartily be recommended to every lady who has a motor car . . . . No one has a better claim to write about motoring for women."

By JOHN DAVIDSON.

FLEET STREET ECLOGUES.

First Series. 4s. 6d. net.

FLEET STREET ECLOGUES.

Second Series. 4s. 6d. net.

SELECTED POEMS.

Leather, 5s. net; cloth, 3s 6d. net.

BALLADS AND SONGS. 5s. net.

NEW BALLADS. 4s. 6d. net.

THE LAST BALLAD AND OTHER POEMS. 4s. 6d. net.

6s. each. THE LATEST NOVELS. 6s. each.

JOAN OF THE HILLS — T. B. CLEGG

Author of "The Love Child."

The present story opens in London, but Mr. Clegg is soon back in Australia, describing the life on a remote Australian station, with its refreshing bush atmosphere.

CHIP — F. E. MILLS YOUNG

Author of "A Mistaken Marriage."

Liverpool Post.—"A really delightful book."

THAIS — ANATOLE FRANCE

Daily Telegraph.—"A very triumph in its imaginativeness."

SOMEONE PAYS — NOEL BARWELL

Academy.—"Mr. Barwell has carried his task through excellently."

THE PRINCE'S PRANKS — CHARLES LOWE

Observer.—"Thoroughly entertaining, told with raciness and spontaneous humour."

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH — ALICE HERBERT

Evening Standard.—"A fine and real novel, executed with finish and distinction. Quick, unforced humour. Passionate sincerity and feeling. Exceedingly clever. A notable novel. It will stand."

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON & NEW YORK

Supplement, May 8, 1909.

The Nation

Reviews.

THE ANCIENT GREEK HISTORIANS.*

No treatise of Professor Bury's upon this subject could fail to be of the greatest interest and importance. A historian himself of extraordinary range and learning, he is also, or at least so it seems to us, a highly conscious and self-criticising artist. When he writes, he knows exactly why he writes in that way and not another, and he believes strongly that one way of writing is right and another wrong. Hence he has the power of taking us, for moments at least, inside the historian's workshop and showing us things which an outsider is apt not to realise. Besides these qualities, he is a fine Greek scholar. The most sensitive Grecian of the old school will never feel in his case that the historian is misjudging history because of an inexact understanding of shades of meaning in some subtle or restrained piece of ancient writing.

The book before us contains the Lane Lectures, delivered at Harvard University, in the spring of 1908. The subjects treated are: The Rise of Greek History in Ionia, including the Epics and the early writers of history and myth; Herodotus, who has one whole lecture to himself; Thucydides, who has two lectures; the Development of History after Thucydides; Polybius and Poseidonius; the influence of Greek on Roman historiography; and lastly a study of the views of the ancients concerning the use of History.

One is tempted to dilate upon many parts of the book. The criticism of Herodotus, for instance, has a delightfully sure touch. The unity at the heart of the great book, the writer's conception of universal history and the meaning of the conflict of Hellenism with barbarism, his wide and undiscriminating love of knowledge, leading now to what looks like the acceptance of childish fables, now to the scepticism of a philosopher and man of the world, are all emphasised and illustrated. It is a little severe, perhaps, to speak of the impossible numbers of the army of Xerxes as showing "almost incredible incompetence" in Herodotus as a military historian. Large numbers have always paralysed the human intellect—except, of course, when aided by written statistics. The difference between ten thousand, a hundred thousand, and a million, is dreadfully hard to grasp, unless there is some scientific and artificial way of checking the numbers. Did not eyewitnesses of a recent demonstration in the Park vary between ten thousand and a hundred and eighty thousand in their estimates? And medieval military historians, even when they had the words of eyewitnesses to go upon, are apt to be very wild in their figures. One wonders whether Xerxes himself had the least idea how many men he was leading. He swept up all he could get, and those who could run away ran away. Doubtless Herodotus's ultimate estimate, "five hundred and twenty-eight myriads, and three thousands, and two hundreds and two tens," is, as Professor Bury says, "fantastically impossible." But it is hardly the sort of subject in which a blunder shows real incompetence.

The other instance of incompetence that Professor Bury cites raises an interesting problem, which it would take too long to discuss here. Herodotus entirely fails to state that the campaign of Thermopylae and Artemisium was governed, as it obviously was, by the co-operation of army and fleet. It may be that this is very stupid of him. But we wonder. The question is: Was the art of war in the fifth century a conscious art, or did certain ways of behaving in the field grow up from the necessity of events, without any conscious theory in any one's mind? The facts apparently are that, on the one hand, the actual campaigns of the fifth century seem to show great skill and forethought; on the other, the handbook of Aeneas Tacticus, written in the following century, and representing presumably the highest knowledge of the period, shows no conception at all of any advanced strategy. It is difficult to suppose that Pausanias, King of Sparta, had more theoretic knowledge than Aeneas Tacticus. We should like to know Professor Bury's solution of this difficulty.

But the Thucydides chapters are the most characteristic of Professor Bury's treatment and style, and call most both for admiration and for criticism. There is one point, indeed, where we are disposed to wonder whether the writer's usual soberness of judgment has not for an instant deserted him. It is this. Thucydides' style varies a good deal in difficulty and in intensity, both in the narrative and in the speeches. Now Professor Bury suggests that Thucydides uses his "unnatural style" deliberately with a special meaning, viz., to indicate that the sentiments so expressed are his own. Of course, before rejecting such a view we must remember that it is held by one who knows his Thucydides extraordinarily well, and that he has arguments to bring forward. But it does seem to us very improbable. Apart from this point, the exposition of Thucydides is admirable. It often agrees, more often, as is natural, it comes into conflict, with the brilliant theories of Mr. Cornford's "Thucydides Mythistoricus." If we read the two books together, we shall realise how greatly the criticism of classical authors has advanced of late years.

On one important point we are disposed to side with Mr. Cornford, namely, the treatment of the Melian dialogue. In 416 B.C. Athens made an attempt by negotiation to force the small Dorian island of Melos into the Athenian alliance. Melos refused; Athens declared war and annihilated Melos, massacring or enslaving all the inhabitants. The event seems to have been of no political importance. Yet Thucydides devotes to it no less than thirty-three chapters, written in his most intense style. What is the explanation? According to Mr. Cornford and others, it is that the Melian affair, though politically unimportant, was ethically tremendous. True, Thucydides passes no explicit comment on the morals of the two parties to the dialogue. Explicit comment is not his way. But he analyses with unsparing insight the position taken up by the Athenians, and lays naked the rejection of justice and religion, the final trust in nothing but brute force, which actuated the policy of the city, led at the time by men whom he elsewhere directly condemns. And more, he analyses it in language which, while studiously cold and professedly impartial, betrays itself here and there by the use of terms which belong, in Greek usage, to the psychology of crime. It is noteworthy, too, that he proceeds from this dialogue straight to the account of the Sicilian expedition, that final act of Hubris which led to the downfall of Athens. It falls in with this view that Euripides wrote his "Trojan Women," the greatest denunciation of war in ancient literature, immediately after the destruction of Melos. Professor Bury will have none of this. He does not consider the length of the dialogue, nor yet the position that it occupies in Thucydides's narrative, except to say that it probably represents a real dialogue which occurred at that particular time. He emphasises the absence of overt moral criticism, and he argues that a genuine disregard of moral issues is the real meaning of the reticence of Thucydides in other places. Diodotus in pleading for mercy to the Mytilenaeans uses purely political and prudential arguments. (Though it is hard to see what other line Diodotus could take, if he wanted to beat Cleon.) The fact is that Professor Bury has a sound hatred for the intermixture of moral judgments with history. "The historian's task," he quotes from Ranke, "is not to teach lessons or pass judgments, but simply to investigate how things happened." And he takes Thucydides as the first great representative of this practice.

What ought to be done, and what Thucydides did, are, of course, two different questions, though people are apt to return the same answer to both of them, Mr. Cornford on one side, and Professor Bury on the other. For our own part, if a reader cannot go through the Melian dialogue without his blood boiling, it seems hard to avoid believing that Thucydides intended it to boil, even though he never says so. One can hardly read the end of the Sicilian expedition without tears; Thucydides never mentions that he intended that, but no one doubts that he did. But we have opened a question far too large for a review. We gladly grant to Professor Bury that the habit of reading moral judgments into history tends not only to falsify history, but, still more markedly, to cheapen and degrade the moral standard. It leads either to the self-satisfaction of prejudice, or else to that vulgarest of intellectual vices, the tendency to slander those who fail. And one or two of his passing judgments, added together and developed, will nearly satisfy any reasonable opponent. "Thucydides recognised that the ideal of justice was an actual psychological force, and could not be neglected by statesmen." That takes one a good way, and is profoundly true. And the excellent criticism passed on the doctrine of "history for its own sake" as "merely a regulative maxim," may be taken in connection with it. Granted that the real task of history is to find out how things happened, the question perhaps is whether it will be most hindered in that task by constantly taking account of the apparent moral values of actions delusive as they are, or by rigorously excluding from its view one very important element that certainly belongs to them.

*"The Ancient Greek Historians." (Harvard Lectures.) By J. B. Bury, Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge. Macmillan. 7s. 6d.

Many other points in the book stimulate thought, and consequently invite discussion, the whole treatment of Poseidonius, for instance, and the interesting exposition of Polybius's change of mind about the meaning of "Fortune." But we have said more than enough already to show how valuable these lectures are, and how full both of vital thought and philosophical severity.

GILBERT MURRAY.

SPANISH LITERATURE.*

AN American (old style) whom I once met, informed me that he had come to Europe to study "literatoor."

I remember thinking at the time, he had, perhaps, come a long way, for literature bulks but little in European studies nowadays. It is the more refreshing to open a purely literary book, treating of literature, and written in a literary style for literary men, by a writer who has no scheme to save the world to propound, no problem to enunciate, or no sex question to ventilate. No, he has nothing to prove, except, perhaps, that the Arab invasion of Spain was a phantasy of Don Roderick's brain, and that in reality Mohammed was the last of the Troubadours, or at best a mere "mester de clerecia."

Leaving this ingenious theory on one side for the present, though there is much to say in its favor, when one remembers certain chapters of the Koran, I hasten to say that as far as I have gone in my parasitical capacity as an occasional critic and reviewer (for, after all, the critic is as true a parasite as the louse) I have not met with such an illuminating work on Spanish literature.

Ticknor and Dozy pushed out into the unexplored ocean (at least by North Europeans) of Spanish literature; but it has been reserved for the writer of the "Chapters" to erect a permanent lighthouse on their shores to light all our little footling, critical barques, to their timid landfall. It would, however, be as unjust to blame Ticknor and Dozy for not including facts, previously unobtainable, in their works, as it would be to blame the writers of the first three gospels for not having the same air of modernity as the sage of Patmos. Both they and Ticknor and Dozy did as well as they could in the face of the singularly small amount of public applause that they received.

Hitherto Spanish literature has been almost incomprehensible to northerners, by reason of the self-imposed difficulties that northerners have created, and by the fact that it has arrived at the north, through the medium of French.

Now the French, taken as a nation, are, perhaps, the furthest removed from the Spaniards of any people in the world.

It is most difficult, except by generations of culture, for a Frenchman to be what is conventionally called in England a gentleman. In Spain, the poorest of the poor are usually gentlemen without a conscious effort of their own.

Again, in French literature, it is the rarest of things to encounter a man who is not self-conscious, when he takes up his pen. There are, of course, some supreme instances of naturalness, such as Flaubert, Maupassant, and Villon, and the authors of the old "Chansons de Jestes," as witness the beautiful passage the author quotes from the "Chanson de Roland":—

> "Loer, chere amie, d'hune mort me demandes. . . "
> Alde respunt: "C'est moy mei est estranges.
> Ne placet Deu ne ses seinz ne ses angles
> Apres Rollant que je vive remaigne!
> Port la culur, chief as piez Carlemagne
> Tempes est morte. Deus ait mercit de l'anme!"

Corneille, Racine, and especially Victor Hugo (who contrived to live twenty years in Jersey without learning English, and ten in Spain without acquiring Spanish) have been the interpreters of the simple and direct realism of the homely Spaniards, with the result that, in England at least, we have come to consider the Spaniards as a sort of two-carat medieval Italians, instead of the most natural beings of the human race. With this great and abiding naturalness, Spanish literature has lost something in distinction, but it has gained in a corresponding measure in veracity.

Ticknor to some extent still saw through glasses made in France; Dozy falls into another category; but, then, he was a Dutchman and uncursed with the sentimentalism of the Kelto-Saxon race. Mr. Fitzmaurice Kelly is not sentimental in the least, and, therefore, in his criticisms is better fitted to explain the Spanish point of view. He seems to have put out his greatest strength upon the chapters dealing respectively with the Cid, the Romancero, and with Cervantes and his works.

In the chapter dealing with the Cid, he has given us, perhaps, the fairest presentation of that hero's character that we yet know. With admirable acumen he has disentangled, as far as it is possible to do, the real Cid from the Tulchan (if I may be allowed the Scotticism) presentment of the same hero, by the French. Little by little his character appears, made ten times more romantic and a thousand times more interesting by the searchlight of truth which is turned on it by the writer of the book. Instead of a capering swashbuckler, concerned with "points of honor," and other hogswash of the sort, such as Corneille would have us think the Cid was, unconscious that in Spain there never was a chivalry after the pattern of that of England, Germany, and France, the guerilla chief appears, exactly as is depicted by the Roman writers, such as he was in all the Carlist wars, and as he certainly will be again the first time that the French venture across the Pyrenees to enforce Parisian liberty upon Madrid. We see the Cid, thanks to the careful scholar, a marauding freebooter, selling his sword to Christian and to Moor by turns, hardy, abstemious, and to the last degree tenacious of his individual freedom, after the fashion of his countrymen, since Strabo wrote of them.

Withal appears a certain nobleness of character, chiefly because he made himself no "special conscience," and was aware exactly of the bearing of everything he did.

Ruthless in war, he yet in peace was probably kind and approachable, and, therefore, stood upon a plane to which your modern filibusters, who cheat themselves and try to cheat their God (for they are all good Christians at the heart) can never possibly attain, although they think in provinces compared to which Fraudesia is a mere dirt pie. Well does the author say, if "he (the Cid) had been a saint he would never have become the idol of a nation." That is so, for nations make their idols and their gods in their own image, and when all is said and done, and in spite of the efforts of chroniclers and writers to falsify, the few salient facts we have about the Cid make him on the whole worthy of the admiration he has received from his compatriots; and for his cruelty, he never killed sixteen thousand men in a few hours as we have done, and though he tortured and then burnt the Moorish sheikh Ibn-Jehof, we can match the exploit, even in latter days.

Curiously enough, the whole of the chapter on the Cid upsets a familiar theory of the author of the book, and one to which he very frequently returns. Upon page 1 he says, "it is the singular privilege of genius to substitute its own intense conceptions for the unromantic facts, and to evoke out of nothing beings that seem more vital than men of flesh and blood." He returns to this theory several times in the chapter on the Cid, and again on page 112, "The Moor of fiction is so much more attractive than the Moor of history, that he has imposed himself on the world."

* "Chapters on Spanish Literature." By James Fitzmaurice Kelly. Constable. 7s. 6d. net.

Now it is not, I think, the fact that the "intense conceptions of genius" are more vivid than facts, though, of course, they may be more vivid than microscopic facts; but very seldom. I take it, then, to be absolute, that no writer ever created anything out of nothing, for if what he writes is not the recollection, or the echo of the recollection, of a fact or an experience, we must fall back upon the theory of direct inspiration, which is as unsubstantial a thing to lean upon as an imaginary wall. In regard to the Moors, the actual Moor is as much more attractive than the Moor of Gines Perez de Hita, as the real Cid is to the Frenchified and invertebrate mammal of Corneille. Fact is always stranger than fiction, if only for its rarity.

Perhaps the greatest erudition is set forth in the chapter dealing with the Romancero. No one, in English at any rate, has so thoroughly gone into the subject, and pursued the various ballads up to their fountain heads. Rightly (in the course of showing Mahommed was a Troubadour) he brushes away the theories of Conde and the rest, as to the Arab influence on the versification of Spanish poetry, showing the metres, thought to be Arab, really came from France. In this he does a service, but, I think, misses where the real Arab influence acts upon Spanish verse. The differences between the ballads, even the Seranilla quoted on page 80 (though it contains three Arabic words, in one of which the cedilla is left out), and any Arabic verse, through which I have stumbled with a Taleb and a dictionary, is certainly most marked. However, in the realistic mode of thought and point of view, it seems the Arabs influenced the Spaniards considerably, just as all conquered peoples always influence the conquerors in essentials.

"Hibernicis Hibernicus ipsis" would not have been proverbial, had this not been the case. The conqueror imposes his outward customs, his dress, his laws, even his speech; but as the conquered usually are servants, concubines, farmers, and humble men and women as a general rule, they have great opportunities of moulding the character of youth, just as a mother moulds her children's minds. I believe no English knight, brought up in Ireland, or Spanish knight born in Valencia, ever thought or could have thought on the ordinary affairs of life, as did his grandfather, either in London or Castille.

Now certainly the Spanish view of life is semi-Oriental, and even in the ballads, intensely national as they appear, this now and then peeps out.

If in the Romancero, and in the chapters on the Archpriest of Hita (and I am glad he quotes the passage on the Moorish instruments), and also in those dealing with Lope and Calderon, he shows most erudition, in that upon Cervantes he displays the most humanity and a power of writing a moving and a virile prose, that hitherto he has kept in reserve. All read Don Quixote, in their youth, to laugh, and later on, if not to cry, at least to wonder now and then why it is that their glasses seem to want wiping now and then.

No finer, more appreciative, or nobler view has ever been set down than that the writer gives us, and that without a particle of cant. He takes Cervantes, both as a writer and a man, through his whole life, setting down all, extenuating nothing, and weighing his claims to be the greatest writer of his countrymen, as only one, full up and running over with learning on the subject, possibly could do.

I quarrel only with one word, or rather, though, as a rule, I do not care for many of them in a literary pie, would like to add an adjective. In speaking of Cervantes' last piece of writing, that which he wrote, as he says, "with his foot already in the stirrup" (to mount and ride), he refers to "the celebrated dedication of Persiles y Sigismunda."

Had Dr. Johnson been alive, being, as he was, a sort of Speaker to the Commons House of literature, I should have risen to beg leave to add the words "and pathetic" to the phrase, and after doing so, moved the clause as thus amended, stand part and parcel of the book. All through the chapters dealing with Cervantes and his works, phrases abound apt and felicitous.

Thus on page 162, "And as one reads the less elaborate passages, one acquires the conviction that the very dust of Cervantes's writings is pure gold," is in no wise parcel gilt. No one in English of late years has ever penned a passage nearer to the grand style than this with which I end my brief (though tedious) notice of the book:

"He was even as we are, but far nobler—braver, more resigned to disappointment, more patient with the folly which springs eternal in each of us.

"This inexhaustible sympathy, even more than his splendid genius, is the secret of his conquering charm." "Conquering charm" is good.

R. B. Cunninghame Graham.

THE MURDER OF SIR THOMAS OVERBURY.*

Few episodes in English history are more calculated to strike the imagination than the love story of Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, and the Countess of Essex, who afterwards became his wife, including, as it does, some three or four of the most romantic of our State trials—those relating to the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury in the Tower, and the fall from high place of a King's favorite. One wonders that the story has not been re-told more frequently. It was told often enough in contemporary brochures; it was told in book form so late as in 1846 by Andrew Amos in his "Great Oyer of Poisoning," a book which Professor Gardiner declared to have "no critical value." It was told in the clearest and best form for modern readers in the earlier volumes of Gardiner's well-known "History." It is not possible to claim for Mr. Gibbs that his book has any particular critical importance. He does not marshal his authorities very well; he fails to give us their dates and their relative values; he does not weigh the evidence upon which his conclusions are founded; his is merely a plain, straightforward narrative of events. The general reader is aimed at, and with him the book should not fail to secure a large audience—an audience which might be worse employed than in reading this quite exciting drama. Perhaps Mr. Gibbs is a little too journalistic in his methods. He writes of a Member of Parliament who "voiced the opinion of the majority," and he refers to places "not a thousand miles from the Court." It is a little below the dignity of History to drag in Father Bernard Vaughan and "The Smart Set" as an illustration of Court life in the reign of James the First. Again, while every schoolboy has been taught in the old-fashioned histories that it was the first James who demoralised our country by the sale of hereditary titles, why should we grow unreasonably angry with James over this, when every student of political history knows that modern Prime Ministers do much the same thing?

Mr. Gibbs very rightly accepts the view of Gardiner that there was very little evidence to connect Carr with direct responsibility for the murder of Overbury. But it would have enhanced the value of his book if he had taken the opportunity of discussing Bacon's position with regard to that trial. Mr. Spedding, in his anxiety to defend Bacon, endeavors to prove that Carr was guilty. Professor Gardiner, in his wish to be fair, leans to the other view; but to ask from our author, who does not even allude to the Bacon aspect of the controversy, a careful balancing of evidence is to demand a higher kind of work than he is able to give. One must be content to say that here is an agreeably and easily told narrative of a dramatic situation. We see Robert Carr, a poor youth from Scotland, arriving at the Court, in the train of a great noble. We follow the King's sudden devotion, and the climb of the youth into favor with the successive titles of Viscount Rochester and Earl of Somerset. We recall that Frances Howard, a girl of sixteen, is married to the Earl of Essex, a mere boy, who, after the ceremony, is sent on the Continent. In the interval, before his return, Lady Essex has fallen in love with the King's favorite. Essex returns to find his wife indifferent to him. It was this Essex who, a generation later, was to become a distinguished Parliamentary leader is the Civil War: now he is a bitter and disappointed youth. His wife does not love him. She, poor soul, has gone to the quack doctors and witches who abound in her day--a Mrs. Turner and one Simon Forman, in particular—and from these she receives charms that are intended to make Robert Carr more devoted than ever, and when administered to Essex, to make him less anxious for his wife's society. Carr, meanwhile, is also in the hands of a favorite—one Overbury —who wishes him to break the coil that Lady Essex is weaving around him. On some trivial excuse Overbury is sent to the Tower. Then again Lady Essex turns to the witch doctors, not this time for love philters, but for poisons. She will clear Overbury from her path, for he may put difficulties in the way of her desired divorce from Essex, and of her projected marriage with Somerset. A jailor is bribed —one Weston. The Governor of the Tower—Sir Gervase Helwys—sees the warder carrying poisoned food to his prisoner, and seems only to have remonstrated and to have stopped him from administering it. But Helwys, realising the great names that are behind this poor tool, has not the courage to punish, so that Weston continues his efforts as poisoner. In any case, Overbury dies. Not until some time after this is the suspicion of poisoning aroused. In the interval Lady Essex obtains a divorce and is married to the Earl of Somerset. When suspicion is alive, the Earl and his wife, Helwys, the Governor of the Tower—whom Mr. Gibbs, following the State Trials, calls "Elwes"—and Weston, the jailor, are all arrested, as is also Mrs. Turner and a Doctor Franklin, who is supposed to have prepared the poison.

* "King's Favorite: The Love Story of Robert Carr and Lady Essex." By Phillip Gibbs. With forty-three illustrations. Hutchinson. 16s. net.

Weston is brought to trial first, and hanged. Then followed Helwys, who seems to have been more sinned against than sinning, and whose only crime, indeed, appears to have been weakness of character. Then Mrs. Turner is hanged; then Franklin, who declares the Earl guilty also. The instigator of the whole tragedy—Lady Essex—is put on her trial, pleads guilty, is condemned. Somerset refuses to plead guilty, but also is condemned. Both Earl and Countess, however, are pardoned by James, after a long imprisonment in the Tower.

Their after-life, if we may gather from the meagre fragments that are forthcoming, was not a happy one, but their one child—the Lady Anne—lived to become Countess of Bedford, and the mother of the Russell who ranks among the martyrs for English liberty.

With such material as this, filled out from the State Trials, and other sources, no wonder that Mr. Gibbs has given us an interesting book—a book which perhaps owes its chief value to its disclosure of the methods of justice in the seventeenth century. By our modern criminal procedure not one of the condemned would, we think, have been brought in as guilty. The guilty would have escaped with the innocent. The more rough and ready methods of that age permitted innocent and guilty alike to suffer.

---

QUIDQUID AGUNT HOMINES.*

In the encyclopaedic work which is now completely before the public in two bulky volumes, Professor Westermarck has surveyed every nook and corner of human society. To illustrate the growth of social customs and moral ideas he has laid under contribution travellers and historians, teachers and preachers, divines and philosophers, ancients and moderns. He surveys mankind not merely from China to Peru, but from the dawn of history to the present day. Within a few pages we shall find him referring to the Veddas of Ceylon, to Equatorial Africa, to ancient Egypt, to the Christian Fathers, and to a modern Rationalist. One point will be verified by a text from a Babylonian Incantation tablet, another from a Greek tragedian, and a third from Rousseau or Bentham. For his subject is the moral consciousness of mankind in its ethnological variations and its historical development, in its fundamental unity, and in all the diversities of form and application that it exhibits in response to a myriad of changes in social and economical conditions, in intellectual insight, in magical, religious, and scientific beliefs. There is no point in human history at which morality begins, nor is there any definite break in moral development. The germ of morality is involved in all social life, and if there ever was a time when man lived, or could live apart from society, it is a time of which we have no record. But men cannot live together in society without a certain amount of common understanding, nor without a measure of mutual forbearance and mutual aid. The conditions of their life favor the growth of the necessary feelings about conduct. In particular, in Dr. Westermarck's view, they foster "retributive emotions" of gratitude for well doing and resentment of injury, and those of a sympathetic approval or resentment of action affecting other people. On this emotional basis, in Dr. Westermarck's view, the moral conceptions rest. What is good is that which stirs the emotion, sympathetic or self-centred, of approval. What is bad is that which incurs resentment. The conceptions of right, duty, and obligation are not simple and unanalysable, but complex conceptions, built on this emotional basis. Whether the whole history of moral development as here unravelled may be regarded, as Dr. Westermarck maintains, as a justification of this hypothesis, is a question on which not all thinkers will agree with him. The problem of the essential nature of right and wrong is more one for philosophical analysis than for the comparative method, and it is possible that the very same phenomena could be equally well explained on a different hypothesis. There is a rational element involved, as Professor Westermarck, of course, recognises, in the working of emotion itself, and the question of the relative parts played by reason and emotion, and, in fact, of what is meant by reason and emotion, is not one to be settled by comparing results, but rather by analysing out fundamental principles.

The real value of Dr. Westermarck's work, however—and it is work of the first importance—lies in the scholarly care and the immense width of range with which he has amassed data for enquiry into the actual course of moral development. A considerable part of the field was covered in his first volume, but in the second, which is now before us, we have his full treatment of the Rights of Property, of the Regard for Truth and Good Faith, of the respect for other men's honor, of Patriotism, of the growth of Altruistic sentiment, of Suicide, of Industry, of Restrictions in diet, of asceticism, of Marriage and Celibacy, and of the whole relation of religion to morality. From the method of arrangement it may be seen that we have rather the data for a theory of development than the theory itself. Social life is a whole of many interacting parts, and to understand its life and growth we have to take the parts in their mutual relations. Taken in isolation they are not always easy to interpret aright. Thus, to give a single instance, stress is laid here on the universality of the insistence on the rights of property, and this is perfectly just. Everywhere we find property recognised in one form or another. But in many primitive codes of custom the only protection of any right whatever is the possibility of vengeance, and what a "right" of property means is that a man who is robbed will take vengeance if he can, and will get his relations to help him in taking vengeance, on the thief. In sympathy with this point of view we find early codes, as in the Book of Exodus for instance, making distinctions in the treatment of the thief which have no meaning for the moralist who regards theft as the infringement of a right, but which are perfectly intelligible from the point of view of the elder of a barbaric clan who wishes to regulate and mitigate vengeance, who understands what allowance must be made for hot-blood, but can insist that in a cooler moment restitution, simple or twofold or fivefold, must be accepted. It is difficult, in fact, to discuss any special "right" fully without considering it point by point in connection with the conception and administration of justice generally in any given society. Nevertheless, between cover and cover, there is in Professor Westermarck's volume an inexhaustible store of facts for the student who wishes to verify any sociological hypothesis, and we may safely say that such a mass of carefully tested, well-digested

* "The Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas." By Edward Westermarck, Ph.D., Martin White Professor of Sociology in the University of London Vol. II. Macmillan 14s. net.

THE PLACE OF HISTORY IN EDUCATION.

By J. W. ALLEN,

Formerly Brakenbury Exhibitioner, Hulsean Professor of Modern History at Bedford College, University of London.

5s. net.

"Fresh and suggestive throughout, Professor Allen's essay will be found most helpful and stimulating."—Scotsman.

SURE TO BE WIDELY READ AND DISCUSSED.

THE REALITIES OF WAR.

READ

THE GREEN CURVE,

And other Stories.

By OLE-LUK-OIE. 6s.

THE FIRST REVIEWS—

"Powerful."—Daily Mail.
"Vivid."—Morning Leader.
"Remarkable."—Daily Express.
"Forceful and sincere."—Daily Chronicle.
"Entertaining."—Scotsman.
"Convincing."—Dundee Advertiser.
"Fascinating."—Observer.
"Most readable."—Glasgow News.
"Notably good."—Sketch.

SIDE TRACKS & BRIDLE PATHS

By LIONEL JAMES ("The Intelligence Officer"), Author of "On the Heels of De Wet." Illustrated. 6s.

Mr. James has used his wide travels to the best advantage. In this book he covers ground in Persia, India, Russia, South Africa, Germany, Turkey, and England.

"The book has a welcome up-to-dateness, and provides a very readable volume of varied adventure, observation, and anecdote."—Observer.

"Characterised by the masterly grasp of the subject, the same terse and forceful expression of the author's meaning, that went so far to give his earlier books the success they achieved."—Scotsman.

2nd Edition Now Ready.

THE SHORT CUT TO INDIA.

The Record of a Journey along the Route of the Baghdad Railway.

By DAVID FRASER, Author of "A Modern Campaign" and "The Marches of Hindustan."

With 83 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"A most readable book."—Times.
"Should be read widely."—Morning Post.

THE ENGLISHWOMAN IN INDIA

By MAUD DIVER, Author of "Captain Desmond, V.C."

5s. net.

"Mrs. Diver has given us here a very interesting book . . . full of puzzles. Still it is good to have to think about them."—Spectator.

"Gives us an excellent idea of the activities of Englishwomen in India."—Birmingham Post.

To be Published on Tuesday.

FIFTY YEARS OF IT.

The Experiences and Struggles of a Volunteer of 1859.

By the RIGHT HON. LORD KINSBURGH, K.C.B., Lord Justice Clerk.

10s. 6d. net.

STORIES OF THE ENGLISH.

Told to a Child.

By F. Illustrated. 5s. net.

6s. NOVELS. 6s.

THE NEW JUNE.

By HENRY NEWBOLT.

CECILIA KIRKHAM'S SON.

By MRS. KENNETH COMBE.

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

CASSELL'S Announcement

At all Libraries and Booksellers

Quaint Subjects of the King. By JOHN FOSTER FRASER.

With 77 Photographs from Unique Photographs 6s.

It tells in a bright and chatty manner about the quaint Subjects of the King in distant lands, with true stories as thrilling as any in a novel.

Women of all Nations.

Edited by T. ATHOL-JOYCE, M.A., and N. W. THOMAS, M.A.

Profusely Illustrated from Photographs, and Magnificent Plates in Colours. In 2 vols., half leather, gilt top 15s. each net

"The text and the illustrations are the last word in popular anthropology. The whole thing is admirably executed throughout."—Morning Leader.

The Nature Book.

Profusely Illustrated from Photographs and a Series of Coloured Plates. Vols. I. and II. now ready 12s. each net

"Will form a veritable treasure house to all who love wild nature and would read of her ways."—Westminster Gazette.

Familiar Swiss Flowers. By F. E. HULME, F.L.S., F.S.A.

With 24 Coloured Plates. Series I. 1s. net

"Every one will be glad to find a book which teaches so much about Alpine and other plants."—Ladies' Field.

Cassell's Royal Academy Pictures and Sculpture, 1909.

The leading and most sumptuous art publication of the year. In five weekly parts, 7d. net. Part I. now ready. Or one complete volume, Paper Cover, 3s. net; Cloth Cover, 5s. net, now on sale.

Beautiful Rembrandt Photogravure—"Flowers of June," by Frank Dicksee, R.A., presented with Part I., and with complete volume.

George Borrow: The Man and His Work. By R. A. J. WALLING.

With Portrait of George Borrow by HENRY PHILLIPS 6s. net

"Mr. R. A. J. Walling had a great opportunity and he has made good use of it . . . a very readable book."—Daily Chronicle.

Little People. RICHARD WHITEING.

With Portrait of Author in Rembrandt 6s. net

"A sympathetic study of the minor characters on the world's stage . . . its earnestness allows nevertheless of humour and of some caustic thrusts at the modern ways of life and thinking."—Methodist Recorder.

Napoleon and His Fellow Travellers. CLEMENT SHORTER.

With Frontispiece in Colours and 3 Photogravure Plates 12s. net

"A fascinating picture of Napoleon's life which enables us to realise something of his greatness."—Westminster Gazette.

The Show Girl. MAX PEMBERTON.

Frontispiece in Colours 6s.

"Brightly written without a superfluous word to encumber the action. The sentiment is painted in with a delicate touch."—Daily Graphic.

The Sword of the Lord JOSEPH HOCKING.

Frontispiece in Colours 3s. 6d.

"The incidents of those stirring times at Wittemberg whem Luther was fighting the Papacy, are treated with practised skill and no little power."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Double Bonds. FLORINDA McCALL.

Frontispiece in Colours 6s.

"A novel worth reading. In happiness and in misery alike Silver Mackay grips our sympathy throughout."—Times.

The Red Saint. WARWICK DEEPING.

READY MAY 14. Frontispiece in Colours 6s.

The Wreathed Dagger. MARGARET YOUNG.

READY MAY 14. Frontispiece in Colours 6s.

Daphne or "Marriage à la Mode." Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

READY MAY 21. With 4 Illustrations in Colour and 6 pen drawings 6s.

New and Complete Catalogue free on application.

CASSELL & Co., LTD., La Belle Sauvage, London, E.C.

information, covering so wide a field, has never before been brought together within the limits of a single work in the field of social history.

The reader will turn with especial interest to the chapters dealing with the relation between religion and morality. Professor Westermarck finds "no solid ground" for the view that morality has its origin in religion. In common with other independent enquirers he is inclined to lay more stress on magical conceptions than on religion as the predominant influence upon conduct in the lower stages of social development, and he suggests the interesting view that the intervention of the gods in moral matters comes about in the first instance through magical agencies, in particular through the appeal to supernatural powers in the curse and the oath. The god so appealed to would, he thinks, come to be regarded as in himself the disinterested guardian of morality. The influence of supernatural religion advances with civilisation, as anthropomorphism develops and the gods are conceived as looking upon conduct with the eyes of men, and in fine with a superhuman range of vision and plenitude of power. Yet "most religions contain an element which constitutes a real peril to the morality of their votaries. They have introduced a new kind of duties—duties towards gods—and as we have noticed above, even where religion has entered into close union with worldly morality, much greater importance has been attached to ceremonies, or worship, or the niceties of belief, than to good behavior towards fellow men." He holds, accordingly, that "religious influence has reached its greatest extension at certain stages of culture which, though comparatively advanced, do not include the highest stage." In this connection, no doubt, we are to understand religion as equivalent to belief in supernatural beings, not in that more inward and spiritual sense in which Comte truly declared that "L'homme devient de plus en plus religieux." For in this wider sense ethics is only the practical application of the inward and spiritual life for which all that men do has meaning, and from which all that is worth doing derives its vital impulse.

A "FRIEND" OF ROSSETTI.*

There is only one possible way of approaching this book sympathetically. We must approach it as the work of one great man of established fame, who is writing about another great man—his "friend." Dante Gabriel Rossetti, as seen by Mr. Hall Caine, that is the real subject of the book—the personality of Rossetti, enhanced by the refining presence of the author of "The Christian." We must be prepared to find that the real Rossetti is someone quite different from the artist whom we have commonly associated with the paintings and poems, and quite different from the man described by his relatives and other surviving friends. He will be found to have the same cast of mind as Mr. Hall Caine himself; to have been naïve, ostentatious, full of platitudes. This is the new "portrait" of Rossetti, presented from a "fresh" and "interesting" "point of view."

To those who do not agree that Mr. Caine is a great man and artist—and there are such people—the whole book will seem to be a piece of presumption. For though we know that Rossetti was kindly disposed towards the youthful Mr. Caine, having been pleased by a eulogistic essay he had written on his poetry, we have no record of his strong affection for the author, save such as is supplied by Mr. Caine himself. And Mr. Caine, as biographer, as the aforetime "companion" of the sick and mentally depressed poet, is hardly the most fitting person to claim a privileged friendship, which is not borne out by the considerable family correspondence now accessible to the public.

It was the reading of this eulogistic essay to Rossetti which brought about the correspondence between the two men, the one famous as a master in two arts, the other as yet hardly a débutant in one. It must be remembered that already at this time Rossetti was causing much anxiety to his family by his ill-health; already his constitution and his intellect had been undermined by excessive recourse to chloral. At a time when he imagined that there was a conspiracy of critics cherishing a personal animosity to him, it was natural that he should be pleased by the overflowing praise and the personal appeal of the young aspirant to literary honors in Liverpool, whose defects as a writer have always resembled the inevitable defects of youth. The correspondence between the two has been carefully edited by Mr. Caine. The passages which he has thought most worthy of production are those in praise of Mr. Caine himself—the rest is generally indicated by dots. "You know," Rossetti is made to say, "how high I rate your future career (short of the incalculable storms of Fate), but I do think I see your field to lie chiefly in the noble achievements of fervid and impassioned prose." We may recall how, according to the evidence of Mr. William Michael Rossetti himself, Christina, in her tactful and sympathetic way, wrote endorsing Dante Gabriel's praise of Mr. Caine, and Dante Gabriel wrote back "damping down" her ardor.

We are still taking the point of view of those who do not hold that Mr. Caine is a great man and a great artist. We are induced to marvel at the prescience of Mr. Gladstone who, seeing Mr. Caine, aged fifteen, at work on his estate, "patted me on the head—it was easy to do so—and said I would do something some day." We marvel less at Mr. Caine's audacity in comparing his own brilliant youth with that of Rossetti. He explains the interest which the poet took in him when he first visited him in London:—"I must have stood beside him like his youth, with its eagerness, its hopes, its dreams, its aspirations." When he comes to speak of the time which he spent with Rossetti during his painful illness, we are made to feel as if we were at a sort of sombre peepshow. Mr. Caine shows off his "friend" in the style of a popular interviewer—"I asked if he had ever heard Ruskin read, and he replied . . . "—and when he is not praising the great heart and intellect of the man (we know something of this from other sources) he describes to us the symptoms of his mental and physical infirmity; or dilates on his services to his patient. But he takes too much credit to himself when he implies that it was only by his own intervention and energy that "Dante's Dream" was sold to Liverpool for fifteen hundred guineas. As a matter of fact the success of this sale was mainly due to Rossetti's old friend, Frederick Leyland, of Liverpool, who himself subscribed most of the money necessary for the purchase.

There is one lamentable chapter in this book. Under the guise of "justifying his character against misinterpretation," he suggests evidence which would lift Rossetti—the weakened poet, dragging out his last days with a future novelist for his companion—"out of the character of the wayward, weak, uncertain, neurotic person, who could put up a blank wall about his existence because his wife had died by the accident of miscalculating a dose of laudanum; who could do a grave act and afterwards repent of it and undo it; who could finally shut himself up as a hermit, and encourage a hundred delusions about the world, because a rival poet had resented his success." In a word, Mr. Caine seeks to rebut the charge of morbidity by showing that Rossetti had good cause to be depressed; and this cause was that he held himself responsible for his wife's death! To quote the exact words—"Above all, it was my impression that Rossetti had never ceased to reproach himself with his wife's death, as an event that had been due in some degree to failure of duty on his part, or perhaps to something still graver." This is the tribute of intimate friendship. We need say no more about this unpleasant book.

* "My Story." By Hall Caine. William Heinemann for Collier & Co. 6s.

A BUDGET OF NOVELS.

Mr. Vincent Brown's new novel is far better than usual. Not that in "Magnificat" (Chapman & Hall, 6s.) he abstains from persistent preachment and pointing of morals, not that he has learnt to construct a story or to write without shrieks; no, but he has conceived and presented a real human personality, true and "in drawing" from the beginning to the end. Moreover, although the person is a young woman, although her chief characteristic is simple goodness, and although the author is perpetually singing

ROUTLEDGE'S LATEST BOOKS.

With 64 Magnificent Coloured Plates (256 Figs.)

BRITISH BIRDS IN THEIR HAUNTS.

By the late Rev. C. A. JOHNS, F.L.S. Edited throughout by J. A. OWEN. With 64 Full-page Coloured Plates (256 Figs.) by WILLIAM FOSTER. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net; hf.-mor., 10s. 6d. net.

The Times (11th March, 1909), says:—"Of the familiar letterpress—now revised by a capable naturalist—we need not speak. The drawings are the thing, and putting aside the larger, more expensive works of Lord Lilford and others, these drawings of Mr. Foster's are by far the best of the three or four attempts made in recent times to do the same thing. They have none of the crudity of tint which is so common; they are accurate both in form and colour; they are very complete, and often give the hen bird as well as the cock. The pose is true and lifelike, and they are admirably reproduced."

No book of recent years makes so strong an appeal to the Nature-Lover, unless it be the New Edition of the same author's

FLOWERS OF THE FIELD. Edited throughout

by CLARENCE ELLIOTT. With 92 Coloured Plates (268 Figs.) by Miss E. N. GWATKIN. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net; hf.-mor., 10s. 6d. net.

Of this book the Daily News says:—"Few books dealing with the flowers of the field have been more deservedly popular than that of Johns. It is one of those serious attempts to deal comprehensively, but not too heavily, with the whole division of flowering plants that have not been swept aside by treatises on plant biology on the one side, or random coloured plates on the other. Its cuts are as good as ever. . . . To them have been added 92 coloured plates from the exceedingly clever water-colour drawings of Miss E. N. Gwatkin. There is no doubt that 'Johns' is once more one of the very best flower-books of the day."

BIRDS AND THEIR NESTS AND EGGS IN AND AROUND GREAT TOWNS.

By Dr. G. VOS, B.A., M.B. (Cantab.) 3 Series. Profusely Illustrated by Photos of Birds, Nests, and Eggs in situ. Each, cloth, 1s. The 3 Series in 1 vol., 3s. 6d.

"We earnestly recommend this charmingly written and exceedingly practical little book to all who are interested in Nature Study."—Schoolmaster.

WILD BEES, WASPS AND ANTS. By

EDWARD SAUNDERS, F.R.S., F.L.S., With 4 Coloured and many Text Illustrations, 3s. 6d.

BRITISH MOUNTAINEERING. With 37

Illustrations. By C. E. BENSON, of the Climbers' and Yorkshire Ramblers' Club. 5s.

"Deserves a warm welcome from all who are interested in one of the noblest of human sports. Its great merit is that it preaches commonsense on a subject where dangerous heresies are becoming too frequent. . . . He gives excellent advice as to equipment and method, and he who pays attention to these wise words will learn his craft in the only true way—by its legitimate stages. . . . It deserves to become a classic of the rucksack."—Spectator (April 24th, 1909).

DICKENS DICTIONARY: the Characters and

Scenes of the Novels and Miscellaneous Works alphabetically arranged with originals, &c. By ALEX. S. PHILIP. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top and headband, 8s. 6d. net.

"Not only unfailingly complete, but exceptionally interesting."
—Evening Standard.

SHAKESPEARE WORD-BOOK. By JOHN

FOSTER, M.A. Large 8vo, hf.-morocco, 7s. 6d. net.

Professor DOWDEN writes:—"One of the special distinctions of the book lies in its tracings of the ramifications of meaning, and I think there is a delightful training of the mind in following its guidance here. But, apart from this, as a mere swift aid in getting past difficulties in reading Shakespeare, it will be most useful, and all the more useful because of its condensation."

PASSING ENGLISH OF THE VICTORIAN ERA:

a Dictionary of Heterodox English, Slang, and Phrase. By J. REDDING WARE. Large 8vo, hf.-morocco, gilt, 7s. 6d. net. A Companion Vol. to Farmer and Henley's "Dictionary of Slang and Colloquial English" (7s. 6d. net).

ROMAN LIFE AND MANNERS UNDER THE EARLY EMPIRE.

By Prof. L. FRIEDLANDER. Authorised Translation of the Seventh (Enlarged and Revised) Edition. In 3 vols. (Vols. I. and II. now ready) 6s. each.

NICOTINE or the PEACE PIPE: the History and Associations of Tobacco.

By EDWARD VINCENT HEWARD. With 4 Full-page Plates and 5 Text-cuts, 5s. net.

THE FAMILY DOCTOR: a

New Dictionary of Domestic Medicine and Surgery. Specially adapted for family use. By EDMUND BARRETT, M.B. With many Original Illustrations, 8vo, 5s.

"An unusually concise and handy volume of its kind, which pays particular attention to diet, emergency treatment, and things that a sufferer can see to for himself."—Scotsman.

STATUS of WOMEN in ENGLAND from 1066 to 1909.

A Continuous Epitome with full citations and interchapters. By A. B. WALLIS CHAPMAN, D.Sc. (Econ.), and MARY WALLIS CHAPMAN, B.A. 2s. 6d. net.

TOWN COUNCILLOR'S HAND-BOOK:

Constitution and Government of Boroughs and Town Councils, Officers, Private Acts, Orders, &c. By SYDNEY JONES. 2s. 6d. net.

NEW ONE-VOLUME NOVELS.

DUNCAN FALCONER'S REVENGE.

By ALICE M. DALE. 6s.

"The endeavours of Lady Monckton to protect her daughter from the wiles of fortune-hunters will sustain the interest of the reader to the last chapter."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

"The author has the true writer's art of giving an unexpected turn towards the finish."
—Scotsman.

"A delightful novel, told in a bright and skilful manner."
—Belfast News Letter.

THE FORTUNES OF A FAIR FREE-LANCE.

By C. E. JEFFERY. 6s.

"A ruthless and very clever revelation of feminine calculation and cold-heartedness."
—Glasgow Herald.

"The study of Seth Hamlyn's passionate and dogged suit of the woman he loves is the great feature of the novel."
—Nottingham Guardian.

WAS HE A COWARD? By

VALENTINE TRAIL. 6s.
[Just out.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LIMITED, LONDON.

DUCKWORTH & CO. have Just Published

Makers of our Clothes.

A Case for Trade Boards.

By Mrs. CARL MEYER & CLEMENTINA BLACK.

Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

 This volume is the result of a year's investigation into the work of women in London in the Tailoring, Dressmaking, and Underclothing Trades. It should be invaluable to politicians and to the large number of persons whose conscience is disturbed by the problems of poverty and underpayment.

THE INFAMOUS JOHN FRIEND.

By Mrs. R. S. GARNETT.

A Novel of English Life at the time of Napoleon's threatened invasion.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Mrs. Garnett's able and impressive story. A work well established in a picturesque interest of the romantic sort, and written with a fine energy and solemnity."—Scotsman.

A NOVEL OF THE OPEN AIR.

THE HEART OF A GYPSY.

By ROSAMOND NAPIER. Crown 8vo. 360 pages. 6s.

2nd IMPRESSION.

THE LIBRARY OF ART.

New Volumes.

THE SCHOOL OF MADRID.

By SENOR BERUETE Y MORET. 48 illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

By BASIL DE SELINCOURT. 40 illustrations. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. Uniform with the above.

THE SCIENTIFIC FEEDING OF ANIMALS.

By O. KELLNER. Translated by W. GOODWIN, B.Sc., Ph.D. 404 pages, crown 8vo. 6s. net.

Prospectus can be had.

THE COUNTRY MONTH BY MONTH.

By J. A. OWEN and Prof. G. S. BOULGER. A New Edition. With Note by the late Lord LILFORD. 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

MEMOIRS OF A SURREY LABOURER.

By GEORGE BOURNE. New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

SOUTH AMERICAN SKETCHES.

By W. H. HUDSON. A re-issue. Cloth, crown 8vo. 1s. net.

Two Important Books to be published immediately.

ENGLAND AND THE ENGLISH.

From an American Point of View.

By PRICE COLLIER.

434 pages, demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Essays in Freedom.

By H. W. NEVINSON.

Large crown 8vo. 6s. net.

DUCKWORTH & CO.,

3, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

her praises, she remains quite charming. To have achieved this is, as all experienced novel readers will admit, a triumph. That part of the book, however, which is not Annie is feeble; and the horrible warning meant to be conveyed in the tale of David Carew's ruin, consequent upon a lady's refusing to become legally his wife, is nullified by the reader's inevitable reflection that David would have been worse off if she had been.

* * *

"The Mystery of The Myrtles," by Edgar Jepson (Hutchinson, 6s.), is, no doubt, good enough for its original purpose—that of running as a serial in one of the lesser magazines. Regarded from the point of view of literature or of verisimilitude or of psychology, it is frankly good for nothing. It has neither style nor characterisation; but it has the merit of being workmanlike. As a competent carpenter planes, saws, and fits a shelf, so has Mr. Jepson planed, sawn, and fitted in his material, wasting, like the carpenter on piece wages, no unnecessary moment's labor. When we remember the promise of Mr. Jepson's beginnings, the individuality of his slightly perverse mind, the basis of real thought upon which his novels were built and the remarkable gift which he possessed of vivid presentation, we can but sigh. Even as late as "The Admirable Tinker," there was humor in his work and brio, and at least a flavor of human character. But here there is nothing—nothing but the hand of the expert carpenter. What is the explanation? Doubtless the old one: "A man must live." Yes, but not necessarily by pen-carpentry, and not permissibly so when he has known and achieved better things.

* * *

It is curious how the same central theme tends to appear simultaneously in unconnected novels. Human sacrifice, around which "The Mystery of The Myrtles" circles, figures also in "The Silent Ones," by Mary Gaunt and J. Ridgewell Essex (Werner Laurie, 6s.), a story which may not unfairly be described as appropriate to the taste of schoolboys. In one respect it has originality; the hero is an African, educated in England, and, as a result, isolated both among white men and among black. He is engaged in the quest of an ancient native document, and he brings upon himself the enmity of native priests by rescuing a girl about to be sacrificed. Hairbreadth escapes follow, and comic relief of rather an obvious sort. Amid all this comes in a little pathetic sketch of an entirely single-minded and entirely misplaced young missionary who dies of hardships and of a tropical climate, still cheerful and still hoping to see Birmingham again.

* * *

Mr. Carlton Dawe is a practised novelist in whom familiarity has apparently bred contempt for the art of fiction. "The New Andromeda" (Nash, 6s.) is not only poor stuff, but is carelessly cut out and put together. Its people are not real; its incredible and offensive central incident is never adequately explained; and, finally, in the closing chapter, there comes a sudden change in the point of view, that not only throws the whole story out of focus but also breaks the inexorable canon by which it is forbidden in fiction to behold through the eyes of the victim the approach of a murder that gets really completed. If the reader had been able to feel interest either in the murdered lady or in the madman who kills her, the result would have been to spoil the book.

* * *

Why Mrs. Winefride Trafford-Taunton should call her novel "The Threshold" (Long, 6s.) is not very clear. It is a wandering, flighty, ill-made story, with patches of good work where scenes of daily life are described. Far the best of these is the sober, but appalling, picture of the work of "pug girls" in the Potteries. The supposed date does not appear; if it is true that young women are still carrying "foive ton o' clay 'twixt breakfast and tea," Mrs. Trafford-Taunton would have done well to make herself the Harriet Beecher Stowe of that slavery. Unfortunately, she soon quits the paths of reality and takes her helot of the clay pit to chapel on Sunday morning, not only wearing neat shoes and stockings and a "spotless cambric petticoat edged with lace," but also exhaling from her hair a very perceptible scent of Russian violets—a refinement applauded both by the author and her hero. But as we know that Mary Ivory earned 12s. a week, paid 4s. 6d. for rent, and had a sick father to keep, it is difficult not to frame injurious suspicions as to the source of the private income that enabled her to purchase expensive perfumery. Mrs. Trafford-Taunton's English is sometimes excruciating; she should really forbid herself such expressions as "pedal extremities," "specialists in hirsutery."

* * *

Mr. George Cable is a writer who has always taken his work seriously, and who deserves that those who speak of it should speak seriously, too. Quite obviously he writes with thought and pains, and the people, scenes, and events of which he writes are real to him. Why is it, then, that they are never quite real to his readers? In "Kincaid's Battery," for instance (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.), we see motion, flutter, color; we receive a strong impression of bands of music, and cannons, and flags, and boats coming up and down, but we never know quite where we are at any given moment, nor what persons are present, nor to whom who is speaking. Furthermore, we are bewildered by a singular confusion of social ranks. Surely Flora Valcour belongs to a grade altogether removed from Anna Callender's; yet she seems to be accepted as an equal, although, in addition to her lack of the most elementary moral code, she speaks the jargon of a wholly uneducated person. But so, for that matter, does Hilary Kincaid, the hero. Was language really in a state of deliquescence in the Southern States at the time of the civil war? Or is it that, with all his gifts and all his practice, Mr. Cable lacks the gift of the right word—that he suffers from the common infirmity of thinking that he has communicated his thought when he has, in reality, not done so? For instance, that little phrase, "The bell tapped for six." It means absolutely nothing. It is meant to mean that, on a boat, "four bells" sounded, indicating six o'clock. The reader can understand, if he tries hard enough; but a succession of such efforts does not leave a sense of lucidity. Somewhere beneath the luxuriance of "Kincaid's Battery" a novel lies buried—a novel that probably at one stage was nearer the surface, and that has been laboriously "dug in" by the author with much care and zeal.

* * *

"Geoffrey Cheriton," by John Barnett (Smith, Elder, 6s.), is a good piece of work, and in places a little dull. It has all, or nearly all, the virtues, and no charm. Quite clearly the author was resolved to present life sincerely as he sees it, and his picture of certain aspects is admirable. The life of the office, the sketch of Geoffrey's landlady, most of the character drawing, and especially the uncompromising absence in the excellent Geoffrey himself of any touch of attractiveness—all these things are well above the reach of the careless average novelist. There is originality, too, in the scheme; it is in literary form that Mr. Barnett falls short. He needs a finer sense of the values of words, a wider vocabulary, variety in the shaping of his sentences—in short, mastery of the literary instrument. For a man who has, as he has, an ear for the music to be expressed, such mastery is worth the trouble of acquiring.

* * *

To persons in the habit of regarding women as the frivolous sex, a perusal of "The Happy Elopement" (Brown, Langham, 6s.) is recommended. Mr. E. H. Lacon Watson, its writer, having published nine previous volumes, of which one is called "Hints to Young Authors," must be supposed to know something of his craft and of his public. Since he prints 319 pages, out of which, at the very lowest estimate, 200 deal exclusively with golf, it seems probable that a considerable number of persons in the world, as well as nearly all the Englishmen in this book, regard golf as one of the larger issues of life. Except the chauffeur and the French professor, both industrious persons and useful in their vocations, Mr. Watson's personages do not pretend to do anything worth doing. They are not even vicious; they merely cumber the ground; and to readers accustomed to breathe more strenuous air, their babblings and beatings about of balls are boring in the extreme. Satire could hardly be so cutting as these sympathetic and detailed records of the existence of a "leisured class."

If you want a good complete Sixpenny Story each month, please ask any newsagent to send you regularly the published at 4, BOUVERIE ST., LONDON, E.C., and sold everywhere.

LEISURE HOUR STORY MAGAZINE

JUST READY. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

GEORGE GRENFELL,

CONGO MISSIONARY AND EXPLORER.

AN ENTIRELY NEW POPULAR BIOGRAPHY,

PRICE 6s. NET.

By GEORGE HAWKER,

Minister of Camden Road Baptist Church, London.

With Photogravure Portrait, Maps, and Thirty-two Full Pages of Illustrations.

"This may be regarded as a companion volume to Sir Harry Johnston's 'George Grenfell and the Congo.' Sir Harry Johnston dealt with Grenfell the Explorer. Mr. Hawker treats of Grenfell the Missionary."—Times.

"A missionary story which takes rank with the best of recent years, both in interest and variety."—Daily News.

"A book of fascinating interest throughout, well proportioned, well arranged and admirably written."—British Weekly.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, Bouverie Street, E.C.

The MAY NUMBER of the

GIRL'S OWN PAPER & WOMAN'S MAGAZINE

Edited by FLORA KLICKMAN contains The Life Story of

WILHELMINA

Queen of Holland

By her former Governess.

Miss E. SAXTON WINTER.

FOUR STORIES.

JOSEPH HOFFMAN

On How Rubinstein Taught me to Play the Pianoforte.

SOME PLAIN SPEAKING ON

LOVE and MARRIAGE

How a Bride Should Wear Her Veil.

NET BLOUSES FROM PARIS.

And a host of other items of interesting information that

EVERY WOMAN SHOULD KNOW

NOW READY AT ALL NEWSAGENTS. 6d.

400th Anniversary of the Birth of Calvin.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Crown 8vo, cloth gilt. 2s. 6d.

JOHN CALVIN:

The Man and His Work. By the Rev. C. H. IRWIN, M.A. With Portraits and numerous other Illustrations.

"We wish that people to whom Calvin is a 'bogey' might be led to read this admirable account, for denunciation of the man is often in exact proportion to the ignorance of what he did and taught."—Churchman.

"Mr. Irwin tells his story tersely and instructively."—Times.

"Mr. Irwin's 'Calvin' is popular in style and well informed in all its facts."—Daily Chronicle.

"It is a handy, simple, and well-indexed account of the Reformer, his system, and his general influence."—Glasgow Herald.

"It is an admirable short biography."—British Weekly.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, Bouverie Street, E.C.

A NEW BOOK BY DR. HORTON.

JUST READY.—Small Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE CROSS.

Brief Counsels on Faith and Duty.

By ROBERT F. HORTON, D.D.

This little book purports to be a reminder of the beginning and the end of a Christian life, an epitome of the things which really matter for one who would be a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, Bouverie Street, E.C.

BUNYAN REVIVIFIED.

Suggestions for the Children's Address and Books that Boys and Girls will read. Try them on the young people of your Church, School, or Family. You will find that the author has given New Life to the Old Allegory.

THE WONDERFUL JOURNEY.

TALKS WITH YOUNG PEOPLE ON THE FIRST PART OF "THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS." By the Rev. CHARLES BROWN, Ex-President of the Baptist Union. With 4 Coloured and 11 other Full-page Illustrations by Harold Copping. Large Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

JUST READY.—Large Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

CHILDREN ON THE KING'S HIGHWAY.

TALKS WITH YOUNG PEOPLE ON THE SECOND PART OF "THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS." By the Rev. CHARLES BROWN. With Coloured and other Illustrations by Harold Copping.

A New Presentation Edition.

Large Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s., with 4 Coloured Illustrations.

By JOSEPH HOCKING.

THE CHARIOTS OF THE LORD.

A STIRRING STORY OF THE TIME OF JAMES II. AND THE COMING OF WILLIAM OF ORANGE.

The Daily News says:—"The first chapter grips the reader, and the interest is maintained to the end."

Published by THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, London, E.C., ; and Sold by all Booksellers.

NEW BOOKS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS

THE STORY OF THE HOUSEHOLD CAVALRY — 1661-1902. By CAPTAIN SIR GEORGE ARTHUR, BART., late Second Life Guards. With Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations, including Six Coloured Plates. Two vols. Super Royal 8vo. Edition de Luxe, limited to 40 copies, £10 10s. net. Ordinary Edition, £3 13s. 6d. net. [Shortly.

ENGLISH HERALDIC BOOK STAMPS: Figured and Described. By CYRIL DAVENPORT, F.S.A. Super Royal 8vo. Illustrations. 25s. net. [Shortly.

This is the first English book dealing with coats-of-arms on bookbindings.

CONTEMPORARY FRANCE. By GABRIEL HANOTAUX. Volume IV.—1877-1900. Translated from the French. Demy 8vo. With Portraits. 15s. net. [This month.

The completion of M. Hanotaux' monumental work, containing much new material throwing light on the history of present-day France.

PLAYS, ACTING, AND MUSIC. A Book of Theory. By ARTHUR SYMONS. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

This volume is part of Mr. Symons' concrete expression of a theory, or system of æsthetics, of all the arts.

RUWENZORI. An Account of the Expedition of H.R.H. the Duke of the Abruzzi to the Snow Ranges situated between the Equatorial Lakes of Central Africa. By FILIPPO DE FILIPPI, F.R.G.S. Illustrated from Photographs. Numerous Plates, 5 Panoramas, 3 Maps, &c. 31s. 6d. net. [Second Impression now ready.

"A more lavishly magnificent mountain book has never been seen."
—Pall Mall Gazette.

"All students of African geography, and all interested in mountain exploration, will feel indebted to the Duke of the Abruzzi for the brilliant feat of travel by which he has wrested from the clouds of Ruwenzori the secrets they have concealed so long."—Nature

ECONOMIC HERESIES: Being an Unorthodox Attempt to Appreciate the Economic Problems presented by "Things as They Are." By Sir NATHANIEL NATHAN. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

"The author's general attitude may be gathered from his frank recognition that the authority of the professional economists has completely broken down, and that the orthodox teaching requires a thorough-going re-construction. . . . A distinctly valuable contribution to the thought of the day."—Pall Mall Gazette.

GLIMPSES OF THE TWENTIES. By WILLIAM TOYNBEE, Author of "Vignettes of the Regency." With Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 Plates, demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Toynbee's absorbingly interesting book is in effect a complete review of English Court and political history during the period from the last days of George III. to the death of George IV."
—Glasgow Herald.

"A very able piece of work."—Daily Telegraph.

FAMOUS WOMEN OF FLORENCE. By EDGCUMBE STALEY. Illustrated, demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

[Just Ready.

The careers and characters of some of the famous ladies of Florence whose stories illustrate the Renaissance period.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF WAGNER. By ANGELO NEUMANN. With Four Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

"Call no man a perfect Wagnerite till he has read and digested this addition to Wagnerian literature . . . this delightful and interesting book."—Daily Telegraph.

SIX MASTERS IN DISILLUSION. By ALGAR THOROLD. Penetrating Studies of Anatole France, Huysmans, Maeterlinck, Fontenelle, Mérimée, and Fabre. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

"A book of lively interest for readers who like to cultivate a conscious recognition of new intellectual tendencies in modern thought."—Scotsman.

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS. By FRANCI GRIERSON, Author of "Modern Mysticism" and "The Celtic Temperament." Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

"Maurice Maeterlinck has said of Mr. Grierson that he writes what others would only have dreamed of writing. But the secret of his art lies not only in the courage and frankness to set down his memories, but in the quality of the memories themselves, and the delicacy and distinction of the language in which they are embodied."
—Glasgow Herald.

"A genuine document of much historical interest and artistic force. . . . One scarcely knows whether to admire most the extraordinary tenacity of his memory, or the living freshness of his vivid pictures."—Nation.

UNIVERSITY ADMINISTRATION. By CHARLES W. ELIOT, President of Harvard. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

"Of special interest and value in Oxford at the present time."
—Oxford Magazine.

"In this book the American university system is outlined with authority, without pedantry, and with a comprehensiveness which provides many points of interest and stimulation for the British educationist."—Glasgow Herald.

RADIOACTIVITY AND GEOLOGY. An Account of the Influence of Radioactive Energy on Terrestrial History. By J. Joly, M.A., Sc.D., F.R.S., Professor of Geology and Mineralogy in the University of Dublin. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Dealing with the recent developments of the view that radioactivity has been a force in geological dynamics, and giving in detail the results of the author's own investigations. [Just Ready.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A SILVER FOX. By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON. With numerous Illustrations by the Author. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

This charming life of a fox, by the Author of "Lives of the Hunted" and "Two Little Savages," is in Mr. Seton's best style.

THE DOMINION OF DREAMS. By FIONA MACLEOD. New Edition. Pocket Size. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

The mysterious personality and peculiar genius of the writer who chose the name of Fiona Macleod were never more beautifully rendered than in "The Dominion of Dreams." It was the book she liked best herself, and the critics were unanimous in placing it first among her writings. [Shortly.

PORCELAIN: Oriental, Continental, and British. A Book of Handy Reference for Collectors. By R. L. HOBSON. 49 Plates. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

[Second Edition ready.

"A book of reference which every collector will be inclined to add to his bookshelves."—Globe.

"The collector and connoisseur who desire to possess a trustworthy guide in a single volume of moderate dimensions and price ought to be thankful to Mr. Hobson. . . . A full and careful index adds notably to the usefulness of this delightful book."
—Saturday Review.

The Newest and Best Novels.

PRISCILLA AND CHARYBDIS. By F. FRANKFORT MOORE, Author of "The Jessamy Bride."

"This most entertaining social comedy."—Times.

"For good, festive, but not facetious novels, it would be hard to beat him."—Observer.

THE STORY OF THYRZA. By ALICE BROWN, Author of "Rose Macleod."

"A strengthening tale builded of charity, human kindness, and the humour which has tears behind it."—Daily Chronicle.

THE PERJURER. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "The Square Peg."

Mr. Norris has never written a more delightful story.

PATRICIA BARING. By WINIFRED JAMES, Author of "Bachelor Betty."

"If I had been a young man on the spot, I should certainly have been at her feet with the rest of them."—Punch.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD. 10 Orange Street London W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 7.] SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Diary of the Week | 229 |
| Politics and Affairs:— | |
| The Voice of the Junker | 232 |
| The Equity of the New Licence Duties | 233 |
| The State and its Workers | 235 |
| The South African Union | 236 |
| Life and Letters:— | |
| A Children's Pageant | 237 |
| Psychology and Crime | 238 |
| The Modern Hen | 239 |
| Present-day Problems:— | |
| An Academic View of Lord Curzon's Manifesto.—I. By Dr. Hastings Rashdall | 240 |
| Contemporaries:— | |
| The Prime Minister | 242 |
| The Drama:— | |
| America for the Americans. By William Archer | 243 |
| Letters from Abroad:— | |
| The Nemesis of French Bureaucracy. By Our Paris Correspondent | 244 |
| Letters to the Editor:— | |
| To the Memory of Thomas Paine. By Joseph Clayton | 245 |
| Solitary Confinement. By St. John Hankin | 246 |
| The Anglican Church and Nonconformists. By Richard Mudie-Smith and George Whale | 246 |
| The Small Holdings Act. By A. I. Tillyard | 247 |
| Is Golf a Game? By Penguin | 248 |
| The Budget and the Brewers. By H. Peter Bone | 248 |
| A Question of Ideals. By Eliza Delf and Ernest W. Leighton | 248 |
| A Misquotation. By P. | 249 |
| The World's Shortage of Wheat. By R. Shindler | 249 |
| The Object of the German Navy. By J. F. Collier | 249 |
| Poetry:— | |
| A Dancing Song to the Mistral Wind. (From Nietzsche.) By M. D. P. | 249 |
| The World of Books | 250 |
| Books to be read | 250 |
| Reviews:— | |
| An Illustrious Middleman | 251 |
| Sidelights on the French Revolution | 252 |
| The Romance of Youth | 253 |
| Books in Brief:— | |
| We Two in West Africa | 254 |
| Glimpses of the Twenties | 254 |
| A Holiday in Connemara | 254 |
| The Panama Canal and its Makers | 254 |
| The Curious Case of Lady Purbeck | 256 |
| Italy from 1494 to 1790 | 256 |
| Stories from the Greek Legends | 256 |
| Paul Verlaine | 256 |
| The Week in the City. By Lucellum | 256 |

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Budget has been debated all through the week, six days having already been spent on the preliminary and formal resolutions which precede the Bill, though there are eleven to come, and the Government only ask for the first reading of the measure by Whitsuntide. This is quite unprecedented, and points to obstructive tactics on the part of the Protectionists, who think the Budget destroys their chances, and are determined to make a case for rejection by the Lords—an impossible contingency. If the Lords tried to amend the Budget, the Speaker would rule out all their amendments as the gravest breaches of Commons' privilege that the Upper House could commit, and if they rejected it, the Constitution would be violated, and the business of the country would be thrown into confusion. The probability is that if Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Bonar Law cannot force or taunt the Government into premature closure by compartments, they will yield after a Session prolonged well into the autumn. To this the Ministerial Party, which is united and enthusiastic for the Budget, must make up its mind and fix its arrangements accordingly.

* * *

On the other hand Mr. Balfour, while paying lip service to the extremists, seems to hold a much less revolutionary course. At the Albert Hall on Friday week he called the Budget vindictive, illogical, and the rest of it. He thought that it injured the productive powers of the country, which it does not, because the landlords and the capitalists will not, as a result of it, withdraw land and capital from use, and said that the new land tax ought to go to the municipalities, which his own House of Lords will not allow. But he stated that the case of the Navy was nearer to his heart than the Budget, and again called for eight "Dreadnoughts" this year. If his party will not pay for four, why should the Government give him eight? In the House Mr. Balfour inveighed against the taking of the income-tax resolutions at a late hour, and, while accepting the principle of the super-tax, thought it involved an unfair inquisition into a rich man's property. Mr. Balfour forgets that thousands of professional men submit to just such a disclosure of their total means. Mr. Alfred Lyttelton, whose line of criticism is modelled on his chief, also spoke with moderation. His desire that garden cities should be excepted from the scheme of land taxes will of course be met. The country gentlemen care nothing for this type of censure. They are almost inarticulate with wrath, and find their spokesmen in Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Pretyman.

* * *

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, though he has put on the closure, has been most conciliatory, seeing all parties and listening to the most extreme and contradictory protests. He has promised some concessions, especially to the brewing trade. Beer is to be taxed on the standard barrel, which means lighter duties for the lighter beers; the larger hotels will probably be relieved; the tax on clubs will be somewhat raised in amount, and levied on the liquor purchased rather than on that sold, and there is to be a customs duty on imported beer. The brewers have announced that they will raise the price of beer after July 1st, which means that they will try, probably in vain, to screw a large profit out of the tax on barrelage and the new scale of licence duties. Perhaps the Chancellor would be wise to abandon the former. But the industry is not united, the free and country brewers—who suffer little—not uniting with their town comrades. Mr. Lloyd George will probably grant a new valuation of public-house property in London, where the worst grievances of the brewers are said to lie.

* * *

The only economic criticism of any note on the Budget came from Mr. Harold Cox on Wednesday, and this was slipshod. Mr. Cox brushed aside so trifling a witness for the taxation of unearned increment as John Stuart Mill. He repeated Mr. Balfour's points that there was no difference between property in land and property in stocks and shares, and that both were equally fit subjects for taxation. But such property does not escape under Mr. George's scheme. He compared the unearned increment of land with the increment secured by a doctor residing in a rapidly increasing colonial town, and asked whether cotton was not held up for a rise in price as well as land. But the two operations are quite different, for while the supply of land cannot be increased, that of cotton can, unless the whole crop is held by one manipulator, and therefore the one operation is much more serious for mankind than the other. He compared the search for ungotten land to a search for ungotten children—a sneer which was presently rebuked by the Chancellor's exposure of the fact that "ungotten minerals" were estimated as a side value of the Linlithgow estate at Rosyth. Mr. Cox is losing his intellectual sharpness and refinement, and touts too obviously for Tory cheers.

* * *

The threatened French postal strike broke out on Tuesday night. On the previous Thursday the postal employees had registered themselves as a trade union. The Government replied by announcing that it would never receive the delegates of a postal trade union, and instituted proceedings for its dissolution as illegal. The situation became more strained when on Saturday the Disciplinary Court dismissed eight employees in obedience to the Cabinet's instructions, and against the protest of the men's representatives, who declared that the men were being punished for political opinions and private conduct. The Chamber reassembled on Tuesday, but a debate made it clear that the Government were determined on strong measures. The Federal Committee of the postal workers proclaimed a strike. Apparently they were not prepared for it, and the Government preferred the struggle to come sooner rather than later. So far only a small number of men have left work in Paris or the provinces, and over 200 of the strikers have already been dismissed. Apart from repression, the Government does not appear to have any general and permanent solution for the problem of the relations between Ministers and their subordinates. As M. Buisson says, the principles on which the French Civil Service is still constituted are Napoleonic; democracy has not fully entered it, favoritism is rampant, and the humbler officials are without defence against caprice.

* * *

Meanwhile, M. Clemenceau, who, like Lord Palmerston, usually speaks to win, however unwisely he may have acted, has again secured his position by a vote of the Chamber. At a private meeting of the Radical-Socialist group a vote of censure was only carried by a small majority, and a vote of confidence, declaring that the Chamber refused the right to strike to civil servants, while ready to give them a "legal charter," was carried by 365 to 159. The debate showed a sharp cleavage between the Socialists and the Radicals, and the recurring Clemenceau-Jaurès duel was resumed in a sharp speech by the Premier, who reproached M. Jaurès with the common fault of democratic leaders, that they never dared to tell the workmen when they were wrong. A significant incident was the singing of the "Internationale," the Socialist chant, by the Socialist wing within the walls of the Chamber. To this the non-Socialist Republicans replied by striking up the "Marseillaise," the great battle hymn of the French Republic.

* * *

The Russian Cabinet crisis has ended with M. Stolypin's defeat, but he remains in office. The crisis began with M. Stolypin asking the Duma to vote £5,000 for the establishment of a Naval General Staff. The Duma voted the credit, but when the demand came before the Imperial Council M. Witte and the more extreme reactionaries denounced the measure as a violation of the Fundamental Law giving the Tsar exclusive control over naval and military affairs. The Bill passed the Council by a small majority, and pressure was brought to bear to persuade the Tsar to veto it. The hope of M. Stolypin's opponents was that he would be driven from office, and they would resume the loaves and fishes. M. Stolypin and the whole Cabinet informed the Tsar that they would resign if the Bill were vetoed. The Tsar, however, has rejected both the Bill and the resignations, and the Cabinet remains in office, with instructions to avoid such blunders in future. It cannot be doubted that M. Stolypin's influence has suffered heavily, and one might have called his defeat a blow to Liberalism and Constitutionalism, had there been more traces either of Liberalism or of Constitutionalism about his administration. The real significance of the episode is in its revelation of the infinitesimal influence and weight of the third Duma, and of the growing power of the Conservative reaction.

* * *

The American people are beginning to wake up to the meaning of the new Tariff Bills, which, in fulfilment of a pledge to revise downwards, raise the average duty under the Dingley tariff in the case of the House Bill by 1½ per cent., and in the case of the Senate Bill by rather more. There have been some rather warm debates in the Senate. Mr. Dolliver pointed out that the Dingley wool schedule was drawn up by the manufacturers and led to 75 per cent. of the people being clothed from head to foot in cotton, and to the remaining 25 per cent. being handsomely swindled. Other schedules have been equally vigorously assailed by an Opposition drawn from the Democrats and a few Western Republicans. The "stand-patters," however, are in the majority, and will make no concession. The curious feature of the situation is the attitude of our own Tariff "Reform" papers. The "Morning Post's" correspondent telegraphs that the tariff is a manufacturers', not, as promised, a consumers', tariff. The "Times" correspondent is almost dithyrambic in denunciation, and the "Times" prints an article which sneers at this practical illustration of "the mystification of the art of scientific tariff making." But neither paper draws the moral that the same fraud which is being perpetrated upon the deluded American people by American Protectionists would be perpetrated on the English people by English Protectionists if they were ever in a position to draft a tariff.

* * *

M. Lopukhin, the Russian detective official, has been sentenced to five years' penal servitude and the loss of civil rights, after a public but almost a mock trial. The Court allowed all evidence and statements which tended to show that the agent provocateur, Azeff, was a great anti-Terrorist force, and muzzled M. Lopukhin and his counsel when they tried to prove that Azeff was himself a Terrorist, and aimed at the life both of Plehve and of the Tsar. In other words, the case for the prosecution was fully heard, that for the defence was burked. The result is said by the "Times" to have caused much indignation in St. Petersburg.

* * *

The exact balance of power which the General Election in Newfoundland created last November between Sir Edward Morris and Sir Robert Bond has been destroyed by a fresh election in which Sir Edward has won eight seats from Sir Robert, and established his Government on a firm basis. It appears that the Governor of Newfoundland refused a Dissolution to Sir Robert Bond in February on the curious ground, among other reasons, of his evident unpopularity in the country. But surely that is a reason for granting, not refusing, an appeal to the electorate.

* * *

The sale by the Duke of Norfolk of Holbein's famous picture, "The Duchess of Milan," has raised a vehement discussion on the rights and proprieties of the transaction. The facts are briefly that the Duke, appalled by the gravity of his responsibilities under the Budget, and seeing poverty in prospect, accepted an offer of £61,000 made him for the picture by Messrs. Colnaghi, stipulating that he should be free to offer it at the same price to the National Gallery for a little over a week. The authorities of the National Gallery had no time to act in this interval, and Messrs. Colnaghi became the owners of the picture. They then offered it to the nation, but this time at a price of £72,000—a clear profit, as a correspondent of the "Times" points out, of £10,000 for a month's employment of their money, or something like 192 per cent. per annum. The trustees of the National Gallery have now issued an appeal for funds to save the picture from going to America, and Mr. Lloyd George has promised £10,000 on behalf of the Government. So far there has been no response on the part of the public. The picture has been so long on the walls of the National Gallery that many people thought it to be public property. There is no doubt that its public exhibition at Trafalgar Square has helped to enhance its value. It is, in fact, a clear case of "unearned increment."

* * *

The Nationalists have been putting pressure on the Shah. A force from Reshd has taken Kazwin and advanced a good way along the road to Teheran, and the Bakhtiari at Ispahan have threatened to move. Partly as a result of this pressure and partly in the dread of further Russian aggression, the Shah on Sunday announced the restoration of the old Constitution, formed a Liberal Cabinet, dismissed the troops from before Tabriz, issued an amnesty, and invited Nationalist co-operation in the drafting of a new electoral law. The civil war therefore seems to be at an end, and the situation in Persia, so far as the Shah and the Nationalists are concerned, much brighter than it has been for a long time. But the Russian Legation has taken upon itself to order the Nationalists from Reshd to return and the Russian Government has announced that it will occupy the road from the Caspian to Teheran if communication along it is interrupted. The road is a Russian concession, but that fact of course would give no shadow of justification in international law to such action as Russia threatens. There are already Russian troops at Tabriz in the west and Meshed in the east; should a force be sent to occupy the Teheran-Caspian road the greater part of the Russian sphere of influence, including the capital, would be in Russian military occupation, and the partition of Persia almost an accomplished fact.

* * *

Mr. Montagu Sharpe appears to be anxious to outdo his amiable predecessor in the chairmanship of the Middlesex Bench. On Saturday last he condemned a man of sixty-five, convicted of being an habitual beggar, to the monstrous sentence of twelve strokes with the birch and twelve months' imprisonment. This brutal punishment is unfortunately possible under a Statute passed in the reign of George IV., which, though most of its provisions are now obsolete, is occasionally revived by magistrates of Mr. Sharpe's type. On a previous occasion when Mr. Sharpe condemned a man to be flogged, the sentence was carried out within four days of its passing, before Mr. Gladstone could give the case his consideration. If this has also happened in the present instance, we expect at least that a shortening of the term of imprisonment will be allowed.

* * *

The cricket season has opened interestingly and even brilliantly. Surrey has shown its old power of crushing weak elevens and beating down moderate bowling, and its four crack players—Hayward, Hobbs, Hayes, and Crawford—seem in form, and Hobbs and Hayes have both made double centuries, scoring at an almost unparalleled rate. Yorkshire also is at its full strength, with its many dangerous bowlers all available, and Hirst as wonderful an all-round cricketer as ever. The prime interest of the season will, of course, consist in the Australian matches. The team seems far too strong for our average county eleven, and Mr. Bardsley looks to be almost as great a bat as Victor Trumper. The bowling has not yet been fully tested; but some of it is said to have strengthened. England will do well to win the majority of the test matches.

* * *

There died on Saturday last a statesman who combined a genius for power with a rare contempt for its vanities. Friederich von Holstein spent the greater part of his seventy-two years of life in executing the ideas of his master, Bismarck, first as his lieutenant, and then, as it were, as the jealous trustee of his policy, watching behind the screen of a permanent official's desk over the fortunes of this heritage, while smaller, but more conspicuous, personalities held the stage. His diplomatic career began at St. Petersburg, where he was Bismarck's pupil. After probation in England, Brazil, and the United States, he helped to make the Danish war, served as Bismarck's lieutenant in the triumph at Versailles, watched over German policy in Paris as Bismarck's spy on the ambassador von Arnim, and thereafter was the dominant personality in the Foreign Office at Berlin down to the day of his resignation in 1906. He was an indefatigable worker, a too-subtle weaver of intrigues and calculations, a daring manipulator of the Press, and a somewhat truculent draftsman of despatches. His guiding thought was to maintain German hegemony by dividing the forces of other Powers. He thought we ought to have been so grateful for German aid in acquiring Egypt as to have eschewed for ever any rapprochement with France. The Moroccan crisis was especially his work, and he retired only when he realised that he had failed to break the Anglo-French understanding.

* * *

The main interest of his career lay in its secrecy and retirement. He had a male passion for power, with a complete indifference for applause. The public hardly knew his name. He never went into society. The "Times," in a capital notice, tells how the Kaiser, prompted at last by curiosity to meet him, was fain to allow him to dine beside him without a dress coat. Von Holstein remarked afterwards that the Kaiser had made "no bad impression on him." Such personalities have been common among Jesuits and financiers. In the modern world they are to be sought in the Departmental services. Such men derive a secret pleasure, a rare sense of superiority, in seeing others appropriate the work of their brains. Their delight lies in moulding the world to their ends. They are the artists, others the performers. It is a type which the plain man instinctively dreads, and often with reason. To be indifferent to applause is often to have discarded the moral standards by which the average citizen dispenses applause.

* * *

We propose in next week's number to publish an important letter in vindication of Leigh Hunt's character, written for this purpose by one who was intimate with Leigh Hunt and his family fifty years ago. We shall also cite other documents bearing on the same question.

Politics and Affairs.

THE VOICE OF THE JUNKER.

> "The gigantic sacrifices—and I use the phrase advisedly—the gigantic sacrifices which you all in this room and the whole country are going to be called upon to make in the next ten years, and perhaps long after that, ought to begin NOW."—(Mr. Balfour, at the Albert Hall.)

It is necessary for the friends of the Budget to distinguish and set out two salient lines of opposition among its enemies. There is, first, the relentless hatred of the classes whose pockets are directly touched by it. We are bound to say that these gentlemen have stripped themselves with great alacrity of every rag of national feeling or disinterested views. The brewer looks after his beer, the landlord after his land. Parliamentary privilege, social position, economic power are being audaciously used to denounce taxes or to shift taxes which affect each politician's private rents or dividends. The workman is forgotten save as an object for the doctrine of "vicarious sacrifice" which Mr. Balfour's party substitute for Mr. Balfour's plea for a great personal rally to the cause of the Navy. Well may the people ask whether they did well to send even 150 Tory members to the Parliament of 1906 for this unabashed pursuit of individual or trade concerns. Not less unworthy is the more remote end of this passionate propaganda, steeped, as it is, in the very spirit of selfishness. In the main the Budget is remarkable for its deliberate choice of the higher rents and capitals of our very wealthy classes as proper objects of moderate taxation. Ignoring the special needs of the times, their own free assent to the public provision made for them, and their marked identification with the naval expenditure, the bulk of these men are seeking to transfer the cost to the food, the wages, the whole subsistence and efficiency fund of the workers. To this aim the Budget offers a double obstacle. It opens up new sources of taxation, and it exhibits steadily growing means of revenue. If it goes through, not only will certain wealthy interests be called on to make a contribution now, but the apparent fiscal necessity for a Protectionist tariff will have been destroyed. Thus, if the Budget passes it will be fatal to Protection, and it is this fact which accounts for the difference between Mr. Balfour's carefully chosen and measured criticism, and the irreconcilable opposition and plainly wrecking policy of Mr. Austen Chamberlain. This, therefore, is the point of tactics on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer will fix his eyes. The Protectionists might like to create a situation in which they could screw the Lords up to the point of rejecting the Budget. In this they will fail. The House of Lords cannot amend the Budget, and they dare not reject it, and it would be the end of them if they tried. But the Protectionist Opposition might by sheer obstruction force the Government into an early adoption of the guillotine, and thus provide a precedent, if not for rejection by the Lords, at least for forcing through a Protectionist tariff by closure. Here, therefore, the Government will probably think it wise to summon and organise the great Parliamentary force they wield for a long and patiently conducted argument, giving ample scope for criticism and even a long rope for obstruction, and continued right through the months when the passion for the partridge begins to outweigh even the hunger for unearned increment. The more the country sees of the naked egotism of politicians who, while they shriek for eight "Dreadnoughts," object to paying for a cockboat—the more the meaning of the Budget is explained to the mass of men who do not earn over £3,000 a year, do not live on ground rents, and do not die worth a million—the better for Mr. Lloyd George's plan.

It is, we think, equally incumbent on the Government to be fair to the opposing case and to stand firm both on the justice and the practicability of their proposals. Is the Budget just, and will it work? If an affirmative answer can be given to both these questions, it will stand all the censure that the interests can apply to it. For our part we have seen nothing in the argument on either of these heads to shake our conviction on both. The landlords are searching heaven and earth for "hard cases" and difficult cases. Well, hard cases will always arise under taxation. They arose under the corn laws, which drove the agricultural laborers of England to an occasional diet of nettles and turnips. They arose when the increase of the sugar duties half-crippled the mineral water trade in London. But it is remarkable that this doubt as to the practicability of sorting out and securing certain values for the public does not arise when it is a question of getting them for the landlord. The point could not be better illustrated than by the discomfiture which befell Mr. Pretyman, the most confident of these prophets of ill, over the classic case of the purchase of the Linlithgow estate for a naval base at Rosyth. Mr. Pretyman had made very sure that the valuers could do none or very few of the things that under the scheme of land valuation and taxation Mr. Lloyd George will set them to do. A little later he was reminded of what he and his Government had secured from them in the interests of a brother Junker. Rosyth was bought for patriotic purposes, chiefly from one patriotic Scottish landlord, for £122,500. It had a rental of £1,620, so that the price was over 75 years' purchase. This modest value resolved itself, under scrutiny, into various interesting items. The rents were capitalised at 30 years' purchase, five years more than the State allows for in assessing estate duties. Fifty per cent. was added for compulsory purchase, Mr. Pretyman stating that when land was compulsorily taken in Scotland, "the price invariably obtained was thirty years' purchase, and fifty per cent. for compulsion." The landlord was found to be liable to the loss of all sorts of interests, which were capable of extremely exact and solid definition. Mr. Pretyman said he would lose all his "unearned increment." Thus it was fair to give him compensation for feus or rents on building land, though no visible town appeared to exist in the immediate neighborhood. Then there was the loss of "amenities," arising from the fact that Lord Linlithgow's noble eyes might be affronted by the sight of buildings rising from across the water within two miles of his noble mansion, and these were calculated, we believe, at £15,000. If the land there had been in other hands, Lord Linlithgow could not have claimed a halfpenny for "amenity," had it been made into a town. What he got—above the value of the land—was some £15,000 for relinquishing the right of preventing a town developing two miles across the water. Could there be a clearer case for the tax on undeveloped land near a town? Finally, there were "ungotten minerals"—"ungotten," we are sorry to say, by the State from that day to this, but duly paid for to the extent of £17,250. The "minerals" were ultimately found to conflict with the "amenities," for as the minerals could not have been worked by the private owner without qualifying his own amenities, a deduction was made to the public purchaser. But here were many of the precise tasks of valuation arising under the Budget's plan of land taxes—the assessment of land fit for building, the assignment of "amenity" value, and the fixing of the value of "ungotten minerals," all swelling into the most definite and highly satisfying realities when the landlord wanted to dispose of them, and all shrinking to the disappearing point, like Alice when she ate the magic cake, when it was a question of the State taking them from the landlord. Let us, therefore, wait before we conclude that Mr. Pretyman's "posers" have other than a rhetorical value. It is, no doubt, important to discuss such a point as the "unit of taxation" in a hereditament consisting both of agricultural and of building land. But the answer is surely clear. The landlord will value as he chooses. If he depreciates the building portion of his estate, he will only suffer the more when his land comes into the market, and he has to pay the increment tax. Most of Mr. Harold Cox's puzzles are equally soluble. Mr. Cox, like the "Spectator," is very anxious about Holland House and Park. If these beautiful objects are fairly accessible to the public, which they are not, they will secure exemption. If their owner jealously guards them from all public enjoyment, as with one or two slight modifications, he does to-day, he will probably pay for his privilege of holding up valuable and historic land in the heart of London. What could be more reasonable?

The defenders of the Budget have no more reason to shrink from the argument as to the justice of the Budget than from the plea that it offers good working principles of taxation. What is the chief subject of the specially new taxes which enrage the Tory landlords? It is the taxation of the surplus wealth of one of the richest nations the world has ever known. The nature of this "surplus" has often been expounded in THE NATION, and it is the subject of a brilliant analysis in Mr. J. A. Hobson's new book, "The Industrial System."* It is the product that remains over from our industrial scheme when we have provided for such items as wages, profit, interest, and the "wear and tear" of capital. It arises and grows in rich industrial States, and it visibly represents, on the one hand, luxury and waste, and, on the other, a withdrawal of the means of efficient life from the body of the workers. It is not individually earned, it accrues. It takes certain clear and definite forms, such as the absorption by the Duke of Bedford of the fruit of the activities of the people of Bloomsbury, or the toll which the Duke of Norfolk takes of the workers, traders, rate-payers, and mere passers-by in the workshops and streets of Sheffield. Both these gentlemen might go to sleep while their values were being made up for them, and wake up only on "reversion day." To compare a form of wealth so obvious and so clearly "social" as this to the "unearned" gains of a skilled physician, as Mr. Cox compares it, is absurd. There may be a more or less obscure unearned element in a great doctor's £5,000 or £6,000 a year. If so, the super-tax will partly intercept it, and it is also checked by the competition of other doctors. But such a comparison only sets in a more striking light the broad distinction between the way in which the Duke of Westminster gets rich and the rewards which a Paget or an Abernethy takes for his specially skilled services to mankind.

We hope, therefore, that the Government will stick firmly to its taxes on all forms of "monopoly" value. They cannot be shifted, and if, as we believe, the licensing duties are essentially of this character, the "trade" will labor in vain to fix them on the consumer. They satisfy the conscience and the imagination of the people; and they will constitute a rich endowment for its future needs. They are moderate and bearable, and even if they break up a few estates, England can exist with fewer great landlords, more small holders, and better-fed workmen and children.

* The Industrial System, an Inquiry into Earned and Unearned Incomes. By J. A. Hobson. Longmans & Co.

THE EQUITY OF THE NEW LICENCE DUTIES.

THE position of the Government has been materially strengthened during the week by the ineffectual character of the opposition offered to what is admittedly one of the most difficult and dangerous parts of the Budget. In the proposed liquor and licence duties Mr. Lloyd George boldly challenged one of the most powerful and least scrupulous of the vested interests, and the debate of the past week has amply vindicated his courage. The battle is not yet won, and a prolonged Parliamentary struggle on these particular proposals is, of course, to be expected, but so far as issue has yet been joined, the proposals have emerged triumphant and unscathed. The feature of the debate was the absence of any attempt to challenge the principles on which the new licence duties are based. Attack was concentrated on comparatively unimportant details, such as the suggestion of an additional customs duty on imported beer—a matter of perfectly trivial financial and fiscal importance—and the excessive burden of the proposed taxation on a few large hotels. No defence of the existing anomalies and inequalities in licence taxation was so much as attempted.

The reason for all this is plain. No Budget proposal in recent years has had a greater equitable justification than Mr. Lloyd George's proposal to revise and increase the liquor licence duties. The inadequacy of the present scale is unquestioned and unquestionable. It is the outstanding illustration of the policy of improvidence by which Parliament for many years has allowed State-created values—amounting in the aggregate to an enormous sum—to pass into the pockets of privileged individuals. In the entire history of the fiscal arrangements of this country there is probably no instance of State prodigality comparable to that by which Parliament has continuously enriched the liquor industry in the simple effort to restrict a dangerous trade. Preoccupied with police considerations, we have gradually transformed an originally open trade into a close monopoly without exacting an adequate payment in return. Despite a large increase in population and a considerable growth in the aggregate expenditure on alcohol, licences have been reduced until the average value of those that remain has received an undreamed-of enhancement. In 1880 the average cost of a publican's beer licence in England and Wales was only two and a half guineas, or only a few shillings more than in 1800, and this despite the fact that in the intervening years the population had increased by 155 per cent. and the total expenditure upon alcohol by over 100 per cent. In the same year (1880) the average cost of the publican's spirit licence was only £2 17s. more than in 1800, although the quantity of spirits charged with duty for home consumption had increased in the interval by 25,000,000 gallons. In 1880 Mr. Gladstone made the first deliberate attempt to place the licence duties upon something approximating to a fiscal basis, but the total effect of his changes was to add five pounds to the average cost of a publican's licence authorising the sale of all kinds of alcoholic liquors. Since 1880, despite a further intensification of the publican's monopoly, no change of any kind has been made in the scale of taxation; indeed, notwithstanding an increased annual drink expenditure of something like twenty millions sterling, the proceeds from publicans' licence duties are, relatively to population, less than they were in 1880. Thanks to the restrictive action of the State and of local licensing authorities, licence values have risen enormously in London and elsewhere, but the enhanced values have gone direct into the pockets of the trade. Mr. Lloyd George's proposals are intended to put an end to this fiscal scandal. The new scheme of licence duties merely gives legislative force to the claim that the State, in enhancing monopoly values, shall reap some part of the financial reward of its own action. In short, the Budget proposes to follow the precedent laid down by Mr. Balfour in 1904, and to apply to existing licences the same principle of equity that the Act of 1904 applied to new licences.

The new scale of duties has been denounced as "predatory" and "confiscatory." As a matter of fact, the utmost effect of the new scale, if carried in its present form, will be to raise the average cost of a publican's licence in the United Kingdom to a level of two-thirds of the minimum sum charged in some of the thinly-peopled provinces of Canada. No doubt the scale is capable of modification in some particulars. It may be questioned, for example, whether it is possible justly to apply a uniform percentage of rateable value to all public-houses, irrespective of their size. Such uniformity will tend to be prohibitive in the case of very large houses, and it is of doubtful practicability. It is strictly logical, for the assumption underlying the basis of annual value is that rental value is a fair criterion of the trade done. In practice, however, it is not always so, and while the new valuation promised by Mr. Lloyd George will aim at adjusting the assessment to the value of the business done in a particular house, such adjustment is hardly likely to be so perfect as to justify, in a fiscal, as distinct from a logical, sense a uniform rate of 50 per cent. of the rateable value of the licensed premises. Such a criticism does not, however, weaken the merits of the scheme as a whole, for the number of very large public-houses is relatively small, those exceeding £700 annual value amounting to only one per cent. of the total number. Some modification in this direction, as well as in the treatment of hotels, may, we presume, be looked for, and it is possible that the proposed duties on "off"-licences will also undergo change. As at present framed they certainly give undue advantage to the large stores, and may allow certain wine and spirit agents who keep small stocks and do a large business in low-rented offices, to escape too lightly. Presuming it to be possible, we would like to see all such dealers, together with hotels, taxed on the amount of their sales. The rate of the tax would, however, need to be sufficiently high to act as an effective check upon the number of licences applied for.

Mr. Balfour's sudden concern for the "free" publican, whose existence, he suggests, is imperilled by the new duties, is really groundless. He overlooks the fact that a "free" publican, by buying at substantially lower prices, does a much more lucrative business than a "tied" publican and has a considerably larger margin of profit. Moreover, the competition of the brewers has practically stamped out the "free" publican as a class and left as sole survivors men of comparatively substantial means. In any case the difficulty could be met, if necessary, by a provision enabling the "free" publican to pay his annual licence duty in two or more instalments. One suggestion we would make to Mr. Lloyd George, and that is that the Government should consider the propriety of suspending for, say, three or five years the operation of the reduction clauses of the Act of 1904. That would provide an opportunity of testing the economic effect of the new licence duties, and would meantime relieve the trade of compensation levies amounting to some £1,200,000 per annum. It could not, of course, be done in the Budget, but it could be effected by a single-clause Bill.

The whole scheme will, of course, be fought, and fought relentlessly, and the cupidity of the brewers in raising prices to a wholly disproportionate extent will be used as an electoral weapon against the Government. Its force may, however, be effectively discounted by a plain exposure of the extortionate character of the demands made by the trade upon the consumer—demands which we do not believe that it can sustain—and especially by an appeal to the equities of the case. High licence is not intended as a measure of temperance reform; it is certainly not put forward as a substitute for the Licensing Bill of last Session. It is a purely fiscal arrangement, having its justification in considerations of equity which have too long been ignored.

---

THE STATE AND ITS WORKERS.

For a second time in two months the French Republic is confronted with a general strike of its postal service. As to the inconvenience of this method of settling a labor dispute between a Government and its employees there can be only one opinion. It is doubtful whether the men will again succeed in bringing about a disorganisation of communications so complete as that which marked the first strike. But it is the aim of the men to paralyse the whole corporate life of the community. It is the men who have declared war, and because they are formally the aggressors, it is they who will have to bear the burden of the responsibility before public opinion. Ever since M. Clemenceau came into power, Labor, whether in uniform or in mufti, has been engaged in a relentless and passionate war upon the Ministry. If we could adopt the simple and highly colored view which either side takes of its enemy, there could be no room for any balanced verdict. To Labor the Ministry is simply a band of conscious traitors, who to achieve power have sold their reputations as advanced politicians to the more selfish section of the middle class, and are engaged in a brutal attempt to impose authority without justice. To the Government the men are merely the dupes of anarchist agitators, who are exploiting certain professional grievances in the interests of a movement hostile alike to Parliamentary government, to fruitful and ordered industry, and even to patriotism itself. These are the angry exaggerations of the platform, neither wholly false nor wholly true. It is true that M. Clemenceau has both talked and acted as though the mere assertion of authority were the first essential of government. No Premier in any constitutional country has behind him so harsh a record for the suppression of strikes by the ruthless employment of the rifle. Teachers, postmen, labor leaders, and journalists have suffered imprisonment by the score under his rule for extravagances of language and opinion which in this country would certainly have been tolerated. He seems to have toyed with the machinery of justice in a fashion which reminded his critics of Napoleon the Little. Gay, witty, and masterful, he revels in the violent and dramatic exercise of power, and his record, when at last it closes, will be as sterile of reforms as it has been destructive to principles. On the other hand, it is true that outside the Socialist movement proper a reckless propaganda in favor of "direct action" to secure reforms by revolutionary means, has been making progress among the disorganised workmen, government servants, and even to some small extent in the army. It is a revolt alike against orthodox Socialism and against representative government.

Apart, however, from these larger grounds of quarrel which may have exacerbated but did not cause this strike, there is a clear issue of principle between the Government and the postmen. They have formed a Trade Union; the Government has suppressed it, dismissed its leaders from the service, and imprisoned for "subversive" speeches several of the pioneers who advocated its formation. The men, on the one hand, claim the same right to protect themselves by combination which workers in private employment enjoy; the Government maintains the extreme thesis that any combination which goes beyond the formation of a mere benefit society is an act of mutiny against the State. On this simple issue of principle Liberal opinion in England is necessarily against M. Clemenceau and his colleagues. We have faced the same difficulty in our own country. No Tory Minister ever attempted to take the aggressive against a postal Trade Union by suppressing it, still less by imprisoning its pioneers. There is, indeed, no legal machinery in this country by which this could be done. Arrived in power, our Liberal Government has frankly recognised Trade Unionism in the Post Office, and Mr. Buxton has maintained with it the frankest and most kindly relations. The railway dispute was another parallel. Had the companies refused the machinery of arbitration which Mr. Lloyd George created, we should all have deplored a strike, but few of us would have called in question the moral right of the men to strike. For us the question of principle is settled, and the passionate declamations of these French "Radicals" about mutiny and rebellion offend our ears like an echo from the autocratic past. A Union may be a means towards a strike; a strike in the Post Office means national disaster; therefore to avoid all possibility of a strike, Unions must be forbidden. So runs the official logic and it halts at every stride. For the first strike was not brought about by a Union. The men were quite unorganised and acted on a spontaneous impulse. No group of workers which has once reached the consciousness of its solidarity can be prevented from resorting to strikes by mere repression. It is useless to attempt to prevent strikes, save by the loyal method of recognising the right of combination, and providing for conflicts which direct negotiation cannot solve, by creating the machinery of arbitration. It is not the fact that postmen happen to be employed by the State which renders a strike among them peculiarly inexpedient. They are simple wage-earners who do their daily work for a fixed salary, and their relation to the State is morally that of any employee to any employer. The objection to their striking applies with almost equal force to railwaymen, to coal-miners, and to electricians—to any body of men who have it in their power to paralyse the industry of a nation. Such workers are bound to act with a sense of proportion and to remember that the public has rights against them as well as they against their employers. But the more the State insists that these men have duties, the more incumbent is it to respect their rights.

The view which treats this revolt as a mere outbreak of anti-patriotism, or anti-Parliamentarism, is not a tenable reading of the facts. The postmen, like the teachers, have real grievances. The worst and most pervasive of them is the system of political favoritism, by which the governing parties in France bribe their supporters and "make elections" by giving away places and dispensing promotion in the services on party lines. That postmen and teachers should revolt (as the officers less boldly did) against a spoils system complicated by delation, is rather a proof of their professional conscience than a sign of anarchy. It was incarnated at the Post Office in the person of M. Simyan, whom the men accuse of brutality towards themselves, indecorum towards the women workers, technical ignorance, and even corruption. M. Simyan had no defenders or admirers even in the Radical Press. There is no doubt that M. Clemenceau intended that the men should believe that his removal had, in effect, been promised. He was not removed. Two months went past in inaction, and as its natural consequence we are witnessing to-day a mere brutal trial of strength. M. Clemenceau will do nothing to solve the real problem of rights and duties of public servants; he will only complicate it by bitter memories. In the larger field of politics he has exhibited the bankruptcy of French Radicalism. For an assault on the Catholic Church it could combine. But its inspirations are all of them negative. Its failure to carry any social programme, to realise old age pensions, or to impose the income tax, is the main cause of the anger of the working classes. They despair of Parliamentarism for the simple reason that Parliament is impotent.

---

THE SOUTH AFRICAN UNION.

The political problem of white South Africa has found a definite and a very satisfactory solution in the terms of the Act of Union, which will shortly be submitted to the approval of the Imperial Government. The hopes and expectations of the able statesmen who in the Convention of last winter carefully moulded the framework of the Constitution have been amply fulfilled by its reception throughout South Africa. That complete unanimity should prevail was of course impossible, but a long period of full and free discussion has served to win a general acceptance of the machinery for the establishment of national unity. Mature consideration of the geographical, social, and economic conditions of the country, as well as the experience of federal government in foreign countries, and recently in Australia and Canada, induced the representatives of the several South African Colonies to sacrifice provincial sentiment at the shrine of commonwealth and to propose a Constitution in which the Central Government should exercise supremacy in all the most important fields of legislation and administration. The powers of the Provincial Councils will virtually be confined to such affairs as everywhere fall under the sphere of local self-government, and will be subject to the revision and the sanction of the Central Parliament. So thoroughgoing a scheme of unification could only have been reached by the harmonious co-operation of the leaders of the two white races, based on a clear recognition of identity of interests and a common desire for that full independence which nationality under the British flag confers.

In hammering out a suitable instrument of government each State has naturally been called upon to incur certain risks and sacrifices in return for the larger benefits, and the amended draft, accepted this week by the Second Convention at Bloemfontein, bears certain marks of compromise which mar the formal perfection of the representative machinery. Equality of electoral areas as between the several provinces is impaired by concessions to the two smaller of the four Colonies which give them a larger federal representation than they would be entitled to upon the accepted basis of population. This may, perhaps, be regarded as a part of the price exacted by Natal as a condition of her assent to a Constitution which might substitute a predominantly Dutch central government for a Colonial government in her case securely and permanently British. More serious, and, in our judgment, more regrettable, is the acceptance by the Bloemfontein Convention of the Cape amendment dropping proportional representation from the machinery of the Union elections. Although there was some force in the objections to the working of a scheme involving such large geographical areas in sparsely-peopled parts, it is pretty clear that the acceptance of the amendment was due less to this defect than to the electioneering calculations of the Bond in Cape Colony, and, perhaps, the British in Natal, whose majority proportional representation seemed likely to impair. In the give and take of the final adjustment at Bloemfontein, however, it seems likely that the acceptance of this amendment was "traded" against the rejection of another equally important amendment, proposing that the "equal rights" basis of electoral areas should be impaired by a statutory provision giving a preference of 30 per cent. in favor of rural constituencies as compared with urban. But, making due allowance for such necessities of compromise, the Act remains a sound democratic instrument within the limitations set by sex and color exclusiveness. A virtually adult male white suffrage will elect a Union Parliament which will enjoy full powers of legislative and constitutional growth under a virtually formal control of the Imperial Government. No constitution, operative in any important civilised State, either now or in the past, confers so full a power of constitutional amendment as will be conferred upon the Union Parliament of South Africa, if this Act is sanctioned in its present form.

Were South Africa a white man's country, in the sense in which Canada and Australia are, our satisfaction in this great achievement would be undimmed. But when we recollect that the vast majority of British subjects in South Africa are Kaffirs and colored people, we are impelled to inquire what provison the proposed Constitution makes to safeguard their rights and to promote their interests. Now, practically the Act makes no direct provision for any participation of the Kaffirs, civilised or tribal, in the new government of their country, with the exception of a proviso designed for the maintenance of the equal franchise at present enjoyed by educated and propertied Kaffirs and colored men in Cape Colony. Further than this, the express provisions in the Constitution assigning the number of "European male adults" as the electoral quota for Union elections, and requiring that a qualification of a member of the Assembly be that he "be a British subject of European descent," constitute a formal drawing of the color line which has aroused deep indignation, not only among educated natives themselves, but among many of their white friends, who, like Mr. Schreiner, believe that democracy as an educative principle is good for blacks as well as for whites. It was, of course, unreasonable to expect that the Colonies where natives were less civilised and white sentiments less liberal, should, at the outset of their new political experiment, adopt the more advanced policy of Cape Colony. But they might at least have kept an open mind, instead of sullying the liberality of their Constitution by the express assertion of a color line. Though it is unlikely that the power of the Union Parliament in the future to cancel the native franchise in Cape Colony will ever be put in operation, we can hardly wonder that native and colored voters should feel apprehension at the possibility of such an attack upon their rights. For though the present native franchise can only be abrogated by a two-thirds majority in the Union Parliament, the defection of a small number of Cape representatives could formally bestow that majority, if the representatives of the more backward Colonies were unanimous. But while we regret that there is no provision in this Act for any sort of representation, either of civilised natives through the franchise, or of tribal natives through councils of headmen, we admit that progress in these directions must be left to the educative influence of experience, and we entertain strong hopes that, in time, the more liberal policy of the Cape will make its good fruits manifest to the other sections of South Africa. The new nation must make its own franchise laws for the peoples under its jurisdiction. The Imperial Government is unlikely to endeavor to impose terms either now or in the future.

But as regards the natives of those territories which stand at present under direct Imperial Government, a graver and more immediate issue arises. In a schedule to the Act of Union an elaborate scheme is set forth for the future government of these territories upon the supposition that the Imperial Government is prepared to hand them over to the Union. We are not yet acquainted with the nature of the negotiations with our Colonial Office relating to this project, but we earnestly hope that the Secretary of State will not commit the Government, even provisionally, to the acceptance of this proposal until the House of Commons has had an opportunity of full-informed discussion. The major question of the advisability of disturbing the present successful administration of Basutoland and Bechuanaland, and of placing these territories, together with Swazieland, under the immediate and unfettered control of the Union Government in its untried youth, is one to which no precipitant answer should be given. We owe it to these Imperial wards to take no final steps for their disposal until ample opportunity has been afforded for consulting the interests and sentiments of the native tribes concerned, and the judgment of experienced British officials who have taken part in this recent administration. Should it, however, be decided either at once or in the early future to place these territories under the Union, the scheduled scheme for their government requires considerable amendment. As we understand the proposal, it establishes a virtual dictatorship of the Premier over native territories, for the Advisory Commission which acts with him will consist of his own nominees, and any demurrer they may make against his administrative action will be liable to be over-ridden by him in the last resort through the Governor-General's Council, while the hands of the Union Parliament are tied for all effective interference. Should the proposal go through in its present shape, a Premier with a strong Conservative bias on native questions might work grave mischief in these territories. Two safeguards are urgently required. In the first place, the Commission should be endorsed with a free right of appealing to Parliament against a decision of the Premier, and, secondly, some genuine beginning of representative self-government should be accorded to the inhabitants by improving the elective system of the Pitsos, or native councils, and by giving them some real part in the work not only of administration but of legislation. Upon these delicate issues, involving the safety, integrity, and prosperity of these important native teritories, the Imperial Government ought not to allow themselves to be hurried into a policy of rapid disburdenment.

Life and Letters.

A CHILDREN'S PAGEANT.

To those who knew Whitechapel some years ago such a thing as the Children's Pageant, now being acted every evening in the Art Gallery there, would have seemed incredible. Just a quarter of a century has passed since the first beginnings were made with a few dreary recitations, a wretched farce or two, and an occasional concert which people who cared about decency could not attend. Now if you want to see a historic display, with gallant songs and dances, all performed with the irresistible spirit of zeal, you can go to Whitechapel and see it. Some four or five hundred boys and girls from East End schools, working in shifts of alternate nights, will show you how it is done. Full of the joy of acting, they are so determined not to fail that during all the speeches the mouths of the whole company move in unison with the speaker, whispering the words to themselves. They have the zest of the amateur. They are as keen for stage perfection as Territorials are for bloodshed on a field-day. The audience is delighted, especially those who own a real child in the show. One may hope they are profited by some sort of historic interest. But, as in all art, the best delight and the best profit remain with the performers, and they are just the children for whom such a thing as this pageant would have seemed incredible only a quarter of a century ago.

That is a real "Triumph of Time," and we do not see why painters should always represent Time's triumph by a melancholy figure trampling on poets, priests, kings, and other men and women, instead of designing some joyful and exuberant creature leading in a happier breed of men with each generation. The authors of the pageant are of more hopeful mind than allegorical painters, for they have arranged their scenes to display the growth of liberty and the progress of great deeds, even on the eastern edges of London. They have written it all in the conventional heroics that give just the right touch of humorous grandeur for a children's show. The rich and great habitually address rebellious inferiors as "dogs." "Out of my sight, dogs," they cry; or "Drive off these noisy curs!" And if the people stir, it is whispered, "Foul treason is afoot." And yet, beneath the fine heroics and the splendor of old phrase, no one can miss the sense of growth, of advance from point to point, and of life becoming a finer and nobler sort of thing, from the time when Boadicea takes the poison, all through the centuries, to the scene representing Elizabeth preparing to oppose the Armada, and Shakespeare speaking John of Gaunt's familiar lines on England. In the final words of the pageant, as though to summarise the purpose of it all, Burleigh says to Elizabeth:

"Let the centuries
Set forth the scenes that fill old London's story—
The men, the heroes, great and humble folk,
Whose life is ours, whose lives have given us life.
QUEEN: So be it. We will call the vision up.
O London, mighty mother of great deeds,
O heart of England, glory of the world,
Show me your story! Let the long-dead years
Unroll themselves before me, scene by scene.
BURLEIGH: They come; may we, their most unworthy sons,
Read London's glorious future in her past."

Leading up to some glorious future, the vision of centuries goes by—the fantastic procession of the men and women who handed on life to us, and were not dreamlike things, but actually lived upon this very ground. Mankind sees the world of space contracting now. It is still a little strange to think that at this very moment the cafés are preparing at Monte Carlo, the bulls are being carted to Madrid for to-morrow's fight, the negroes are groping in deep forests, the Indians are descending with prayer into sacred rivers, and the Amazon flows murmuring through the night. But our inventions have made this earth too small, and when, starting from London, you can reach almost any point on its surface within a month, it seems hardly worth while to start. Space will fail us unless we can flit to another star. But time remains mysterious and inaccessible, nor will the aeroplane be invented that can take us where Richard Cœur de Lion's mace cracks the armour of his foes, like a boy stamping on crabs. All those scenes of the pageant have passed down Aldgate, while it was a gate, and long before it was old. Britons and Romans, bloodstained and worn with battles down Epping way; messengers with news of Hastings, and Harold's body borne to Waltham Cross, where the Rood itself bowed in sorrow for his destiny; kings and queens at war in silly rivalry, beggars' daughters, and rebel artisans, pilgrims to the saint's relics, and sailors of the queen embarking to confront the pride of Spain on rations of mouldy bread and sour beer—they have all gone their road, tramping over the same earth, drawing the same breath as ourselves, and finding day and night as sweet. Sometimes we can discover a dim trace of their hands upon an old wall or trench, but themselves we cannot find, though, as Burleigh says, their life is ours. What the Sartor said is true:—

> "Thousands of human generations, all as noisy as our own, have been swallowed-up of Time, and there remains no wreck of them any more; and Arcturus and Orion and Sirius and the Pleiades are still shining in their courses, clear and young, as when the Shepherd first noted them in the plain of Shinar."

But whilst we are in the way with the Sartor, another question rises from the pageant. If it is true that clothes are indeed the visible sign of a spiritual state, why is it that in this excellent and historic pageant, so careful of detail, the only hideous clothes are to be seen at the moment of England's greatest glory? Boadicea, as she takes the poison tabloid, is graceful in flowing and not too scanty raiment; the warriors from the Bayeux tapestry look as serviceable as men could be while they sought to ward off death in clothes of steel chain; the kings and queens and rebels and beggar-maids are all beautiful and attractive figures up to the sixteenth century; even Chaucer in black cowl and gown passed very well for a poet. But the moment we approached the great days of Elizabeth—the moment that Drake and Frobisher were to snatch the world from Spain, and Shakespeare himself walked the boards, the paragon of animals—suddenly men and women appeared in the most ludicrous and inhuman apparel that perversity ever fashioned. In padded protuberances, in slashes, puffs, and ruffs, they lumbered about the stage like distorted Dutch dolls, till one would have supposed them to represent the Saxon temperament at its grossest, at its least inspired solidity, at its nearest kinship to suet pudding. Could these stuffed and upholstered figures really stand for the most glorious age of our literature and our arms? Alas! we cannot doubt the accuracy and skill of the pageant. Drake sweated in a doublet like a pillow, and Sylvia was commended for hips at right angles to her waist. Where, then, was that subtle correspondence between the visible sign of clothes and the spiritual state that, for good or evil, they should signify?

We may take the question a little further still, and ask why it was impossible to carry the pageant beyond the days of Elizabeth. We can imagine the children acting the meeting of Cromwell and the Levellers on Mile End Waste, but the nearer we get to our own times the more difficult it would be to make a pageant at all. There are plenty of scenes in East End history to be represented—the sailing of the first steamer from London Dock, the arrival of the first Jewish refugees from Russia, Matthew Arnold opening Toynbee Hall, a Christ Church graduate casting off the first pack of "harriers" from Aldgate Pump to draw Cambridge Heath Road, the institution of the 1st Cadet Battalion of the Queen's (old 2nd Foot). But somehow we feel that a pageant of such scenes might be a little dull and colorless on the stage, as well as a little ludicrous. If it is admitted that progress is sure and obvious, if people who know Whitechapel tell us that the advance is astonishing, and such a thing as this pageant would have been incredible even a quarter of a century ago, why are our crowds so drab and smudgy that we should be ashamed to represent them in a show?

It is often embarrassing when an Indian or some other traveller from the East gives us his first impressions of our English life. His expectations have been high. He has come to the land of freedom, to a powerful race of men, happy in the fruits of the highest civilisation. He finds a dingy and ignoble-looking people, dressed in second-hand clothes which they never wash; and as to the hats of men and women, to the Eastern mind such hideousness of angle and color is an almost inconceivable offence. But those who have seen the pageant need not go to the East for reflection. In front of the show, as a kind of model audience, stand the average East End boy and girl, making characteristic remarks upon the episodes as they pass. Why is it that in not a single one of those scenes could that boy and girl be admitted among the other children without appearing instantly as an unendurable blot upon the whole? Not even among the ugliness of the Elizabethan costumes could the lower degradation of our working-class children's clothes be tolerated. It is not only the difference in class, for the pageant represents all classes with fidelity, and the contrast is too sharp for money to wipe out. We admit the advance, the astonishing improvement even within a single generation, but why is progress so dull? Why, if the inward and spiritual grace is increasing, is there so little outward and visible sign? A grubby suit, a greasy cap, a torn pinafore, and mother's cast-off boots—what would the Sartor make of those as evidences of civilising grace? What "organic filaments" of future worship do they represent among mankind?

PSYCHOLOGY AND CRIME.

WHEN a murder or a burglary has been committed, the police investigation includes a careful plan of the premises, a detailed register of all objects on the spot, a chemical analysis of bloodstains, facsimiles of finger impresses, and a similarly scientific register of other objective facts bearing on the case. The utmost care is taken to ascertain the actions and words of persons near the scene of action against whom suspicion might lie, and the formal consistency of the statements made by witnesses is subjected to the closest tests which legal logic can devise. But no serious or systematic attempt is ever made to check this purely objective evidence by examining the mind of the witness in the box. Beyond some quite crude and general inquiries occasionally made into sanity or "character" or motive, there is no endeavor to examine the instrument of evidence in order to ascertain the inherent likelihood of error in the several sorts of statement that are made. For judge, counsel, and jury the science of experimental psychology has not come into existence. Though every lawyer familiar with court practice knows that most honest witnesses will often disagree on the simplest points of ocular testimony, and that memory is capable of any degree of falsification, it never occurs to him that the reliability of eyesight or of memory in witnesses may be itself material evidence which it ought to be his duty to evoke. If we want to know whether a suspected person has fired the shot which killed a man, we examine closely the calibre and the condition of any firearms he may possess. But when a witness makes a statement which ranks as a "material fact," we never think of examining his mental calibre. Yet when the witness says that he saw the prisoner, wearing a green overcoat, leave the house with a carpet-bag at two minutes before eleven, it may be of quite critical importance to know how far his particular perceptions and memory are normal.

The degree of error in the play of the human senses, the various kinds of sense illusion, the part played by personal interest in interpreting percepts, the tricks of memory or suggestion, have been submitted to most elaborate and ingenious experiments in psychological laboratories, with results extremely disconcerting to those who are familiar with the crude justice of our courts. There is, we are aware, the usual attempt to overbear the claims of a new science by dwelling on its necessary defects, and dubbing it charlatanry. Nor can it be denied that the votaries of psychology have often made excessive and premature assertions of scientific authority in education, medicine, religion, and sociology. But it is impossible for any fair-minded person to read the powerful statement set out by Professor Münsterberg, of Harvard, in his new volume, "Psychology and Crime" (Fisher Unwin), without realising the important services which such a study, soberly pursued, can render to the cause of public justice. In America and Germany careful observers in psychological laboratories have been patiently gathering a great volume of ordered facts, relating to the voluntary and involuntary actions of the human mind, which deserve to be taken into account by courts engaged in sifting truth from falsehood in testimony. Professor Münsterberg, himself one of the foremost workers in this field, has good ground for his complaint of the obstructive conservatism of the law. "Rich material has been gathered, and yet practical jurisprudence is, on the whole, still unaware of it; and while the alienist is always a welcome guest in the court-room, the psychologist is still a stranger there. The court would rather listen for whole days to the 'science' of the handwriting experts than allow a witness to be examined with regard to his memory and his power of perception, his attention and his associations, his volition and his suggestibility, with methods which are in accord with the exact work of experimental psychology."

The illustrations of his method are both instructive and entertaining. There is no reason to distrust the genuineness of the class-tests by which Professor Münsterberg shows the extraordinary divergences of his students on simple instances of direct judgment of sensations. "Since I saw that my own students do not know whether a point moves with the slowness of a snail or with the rapidity of an express train; whether a time interval is half a second or a whole minute; whether there are twenty-five points or two hundred; whether a tune comes from a whistle, a gong, or a violin; whether the moon is small as a pea or large as a man—I am not surprised any more when I read the reports of the papers."

Everyone will recognise that the accuracy of a remembered fact must have some definite relation to the recency, the frequency, and the vividness of the original experience. But reflection will show that the relative effectiveness of these criteria with reference to different sorts of fact admits of very delicate discrimination. To measure and record this discrimination is work for the psychologist, corresponding closely to the quantitative analysis which the physiologist brings to bear in ascertaining the nutritive properties of various sorts of food. The former evidence is as relevant as the latter, and as important in many cases of crime.

Not only perception and memory can be made capable of accurate valuation, but the thoughts and intentions of men are reflected in their emotions, and these latter can be subjected to psycho-physical tests. French courts sometimes practise crude methods of surprising truth out of suspected persons or reluctant witnesses by sudden confrontations or strong dramatic suggestions. But psycho-physics will be able to proceed much more surely, if more slowly, in its reading of thoughts through emotions. Starting from the premise that every strong emotion is registered in various involuntary movements, breathing, pulse, and muscular contractions, etc., psychologists are already able to apply an ingenious apparatus for recording these physical concomitants of feeling. There are, as Professor Münsterberg well recognises, subtle difficulties in the application of these tests, for nervous innocence will be apt to produce many of the same emotional reactions as guilt itself, and the experienced sinner may acquire sufficient skill to confuse the most scientific apparatus.

We are the more encouraged to place confidence in the services which this new art may be capable of rendering because of the sane philosophy of crime with which it is associated in Professor Münsterberg's own teaching. Criminals are not born such: there is no definitely criminal disposition; there are many sorts of mental inefficiency, bad functioning of thought and feeling, which, assisted by circumstances and unchecked by education, pass into vicious or criminal habits. The multifarious irrationality and injustice of society, the physical and moral degradation imposed by its system of ill-requited toil for the bottom dog and luxurious leisure for the top dog, its regulations for the disposition and the use of property, drive into drunkenness, insanity, or crime persons who have inherited from abnormal or degenerate parents a feeble resistance of the central nervous system. "If we abstract from the effect of such life training in the social underworld, and from the traces of poor education, of bad example, of disease and neglect, we find among the criminals the same types of mind as in other spheres, only with a great percentage of all kinds of mental inferiority—stupid and narrow minds, vehement and passionate minds, minds with weak power of comprehension, and minds without normal emotions and minds without energy for work." Only when we get to understand the different sorts of these half-physical, half-mental defects which make for crime shall we adjust our thoughts and feelings towards its reasonable treatment.

---

THE MODERN HEN.

In the rick-yard, which now contains but a few slices of hay and one straw rick from last summer's store, the fowls are scattered in search of the self-hunted portion that ekes out the day's allowance of corn. The farmer's wife does not know exactly how many fowls there are. Some thirty or forty she says, and they produce now about twenty eggs a day. Still harder would it be for her to say which are the best layers. Only when a hen goes persistently broody does she begin to think that the farm might be as well off without her, though even a dozen broody hens are sometimes tolerated with quite Christian forbearance. The layers, too, in a general way are permitted to lay what sort of eggs they like. "An egg is an egg," runs the country motto. A small egg is supposed to contain as much nourishment as a large one, and no difference in taste has been discovered between a brown one and a white one. The higgler can by all means have the large brown ones, if he will, for the poor things in the town who set store by such things.

One evening last week the fox took one of our hens. We know that it was a white one because we saw the feathers in the field, so there must be a white hen the fewer. We cannot say that her absence makes much difference, if any, in the weekly tale of eggs, nor does it occur to us for one instant to make any difference in the amount of corn we scatter for the flock. It is a quaint flock when it is assembled. We cannot say what the breeder of some pure and fantastic strain would say if his eye could roam over it. Long ago, perhaps, the Brahma was king in this poultry-yard. Then a lordly Dorking brought fresh blood and new hopes in the heart of some bygone farmer's wife. There are rumpled top-knots that proclaim the reign for a space of the all-conquering Houdan; beautiful feathers that owe their origin to a gold-spangled Hamburg or wild Ancona; tumbling combs that speak of the day when Black Minorcas were the rage. To-day the White Leghorn is the prevailing type, and the flock no doubt, if the truth could be known, lays better than ever it did. Next, the latest champion winter layer, the Buff Rock, will probably have its day as soon as a sitting of eggs can be procured.

The ups and downs of the poultry-fancier's world go to prove that, just as surely as an egg's an egg, so a hen's a hen. It is likely that within a year we could send up from our mixed flock a pen of pullets that would lay against all the pure breeds that at present fight for the highest honours. Certainly we have known individual nondescript hens that would lay in a given time one-sixth as many eggs as one of those pens of six. On the other hand, the fancier could get from our yard a new scheme of feathering which he could work up into a breed that would perhaps excite the envy of all other fanciers. The more he elaborated its "points" the more, in every probability, he would spoil the fowl for all the purposes that has made it valuable to the farmer. Again, the farmyard can take the most monstrous of fanciers' productions, such as the maypole-like Langshan, or even the Japanese fowl, with sickle feathers nine feet long, and can make something of it, as the public school makes something of the boy who has been ever so quaintly brought up. Even the degenerate, from the utility point of view, may give fresh vitality to the farm-house breed. The fanciers have strained off into separate phials the various elements of fowldom. Each essence becomes by isolation so attenuated as almost to lose the power of reproduction, yet so precious in the eyes of the fancier that he will not give it the stimulus of new blood that it needs. Then that vandal, the utility man, takes two of these valueless treasures, and, mingling them, produces perhaps a fowl worth having.

It is to the Utility Poultry Club that the chief credit is given of having rescued the fowl from a false specialisation at the hands of the breeders. It is the first not very articulate voice of the farm-house protesting against a fancy that had ignored the table for the show-bench. The Orpington and the Wyandotte must now maintain supremacy, not by means of an ever-widening differentiation of shape or feather, but by increased egg-production, precocity of growth or capacity for fattening and bearing flesh. Even now, however, the farmer is not certain to get what he wants. There is a danger that the new crack layers may be over-elaborated for the one contest under conditions that are not reproduced in every-day commercial life. It is the examination system applied to hens, and, just as we are for ever coming across efficient men who were duffers in examination and duffers of prizemen, so there are, no doubt, disappointments in store for the poultry man who buys too blindly the offspring of champion layers. We suppose that the proportion of eggs that will produce healthy chicks must be smaller than in the case of a normal layer, and in many cases the tired organism of the over-layer would take a very reactionary rest in the next generation. Then the hen that lays with the fury of these champions lays only for one season. She must be replaced in the second season, and it may be that the cost of rearing an increased number of chicks must be set off against the advantage of getting even fifty per cent. more eggs per laying hen per annum.

We almost hope that there may be economic reasons against the undue driving of the hen. We no more like to think of the farm-yard population renewed every year than that the "hands" in a factory must be "pole-axed" at the age of thirty to make room for more paying material. We like to see the grandmother and great-grandmother sunning herself in the straw with her latest foster family, or taking a turn at the laying for a few weeks each year. We cannot believe that the hen of a certain hundred and fifty eggs per annum can lay really good eggs. We call upon the public analyst to report on this matter, and we say beforehand that if he finds the sweated egg as rich in food values as the other we shall take leave to doubt him. Certainly by far the best eggs we eat seem to be those that come from the drowsy, happy farm-yard, where a hen seems to be regarded as "a hen for a' that."

We do not kill the goose that lays golden eggs. If we did we must not expect it to furnish a dish as superior to common goose as its eggs were to common eggs. There are egg-laying hens and table hens, and the tendency is to make the one more and more useless for the other purpose. We are not at all sure, however, that the veriest egg-slave may not be as good to eat as the specialised, crammed Sussex fowl that Londoners have to eat. The fowl has a remarkable faculty for converting barley meal into flesh of sorts, as the goose has the faculty under highly artificial conditions of providing five times the ordinary amount of liver. It is a crucible, not a chicken, that is pumped up with food because London is in a hurry for roast or boiled. The stuff is only half converted, and is almost as much like the raw meal as like finished flesh. But even in the fattening trade the healthy life of the farm-yard chick is vindicated. None but the common fowl can stand the cramming—the fowl that as a sign of health clings to the original red livery of its wild ancestor. It is so here and it is so in America. The "Sussex Red" is one of the oldest breeds, and whether it is one that has escaped being bred for color, or whether someone, despairing of his black breeds and his white ones, poured them together, with atavistic results, cannot be known. It is an honest fowl, a good layer in winter and in summer, a breeder of healthy and hardy chicks, a maker of white and wholesome meat, a triumph of wholesome farm breeding. By its own route America has evolved the Rhode Island Red. It might sing, if hens did sing, "Cochin and Malay, Wyandotte and Leghorn are we." It is, in fact, as a reaction from many excursions into fancydom, just a hen. We hope that there will still be a place in the world for our commonplace all-round hen. We hope that the spirit of drive will not descend too fiercely on our quiet straw-yard, where a hen that is neither a mere egg-laying machine nor a mere barley-meal-converting machine is permitted to take life a little leisurely, to enjoy a dust-bath, to carol that lazy "Awk—awk—awk" that makes its haunt the most restful place on the farm.

Present-Day Problems.

AN ACADEMIC VIEW OF LORD CURZON'S MANIFESTO.

I.

Lord Curzon's "Principles and Methods of University Reform" will disappoint many expectations. In not a few cases the disappointment will be a highly agreeable one. That a Chancellor of Oxford should attempt to make his office something more than an honorific incident in the career of a Tory peer, on a level with his Garter, his Lord Lieutenancy, his Wardenship of the Cinque Ports, or the like, is an unprecedented event—unprecedented since the days of Archbishop Laud. There were those among us who feared that not merely the fact, but the matter and the manner of Lord Curzon's long-promised "scheme" might be such as to awaken memories of that famous Chancellorship. Such fears will promptly be allayed by a perusal of the present volume. It is no vice-regal ukase, enjoining what the University shall and what it shall not do. The complaint that will most generally be made among those who hoped for reform will be rather that the definite recommendations are so few. On most matters the book does little more than sum up, after the manner of a judge's charge, the various suggestions which have been made to him, and leave the University to decide between them. The tone and temper of the document are unexceptionable. The only people whose disappointment will be a cruel disillusionment are the wire-pullers who engineered Lord Curzon's election as a tower of strength against the inroads of the University reformer, the importunate woman student, and the still more dreaded working-man. These have already begun to complain that the prophet they called in to curse their enemies has ended—if with a touch of Balaam-like reluctance—by blessing them altogether.

There can be only one opinion as to the consummate ability displayed by this closely-packed treatise of 215 pages. Its point of view is naturally that of a first-rate administrator taking stock of the University machine from without. Lord Curzon is most at home when he is dealing with the extraordinarily complicated system of University government, administration, and finance: this is the side of the matter which has evidently interested him most, and it is here that he has gone furthest in the suggestion of positive reform. He definitely favors the restriction of Congregation to resident doctors and masters, so that it may become again what it was anciently—an assembly of teachers, and (somewhat less strongly) the opening of all the eighteen elective places in council to all M.A.'s of five years' standing. But the most novel and startling suggestion which he has made is the institution of a Board of Financial Control, which should not only record and analyse, but in some measure supervise and control the expenditure of all the University spending departments as well as of the colleges. When he comes to educational questions, he has too lively a sense of what he himself owes to his Oxford training to join the ultra reformers who are bent on laying violent hands, in deference to the Teutonic model, upon just the feature of our system which foreign observers recognise as meeting educational needs not satisfied by Professorial teaching—the system of college tuition. At the same time he is too well aware of what is said outside as to the demands which the University does not satisfy to adopt the tone of our self-satisfied Conservatives. He sees that the great barrier to the University throwing open its gates to new classes of students is the requirement of a miserable modicum of Greek for Responsions. He has, he writes, been compelled to refuse a contribution of £30,000 towards "a definite scientific object in Oxford," because he could give no assurance that the restriction would be removed. The throwing-off of that incubus and the establishment of a "Joint School-leaving and University Entrance Examination" is the one educational reform on which he insists with real energy and conviction. A reform of Pass Moderations is almost equally needed; but the abolition of compulsory Greek will necessarily carry with it some modification of this wretched examination. Lord Curzon speaks strongly against undue depreciation of the work that the University now performs. "It is as desirable that Oxford should educate the future country squire, or nobleman, or banker, or member of Parliament, or even the guardsman, as it is that it should sharpen the wits of the schoolmaster or the cultivated artisan." At the same time he appears really anxious that the University should spread its net more widely. He recommends the establishment of a course of commercial studies. He definitely pronounces in favor of degrees for women without votes in Convocation. He is quite in sympathy with the idea of the University providing facilities for the particular kind of education which is demanded by working men, or, rather, by that new and very important class of professional men recruited from the working classes—those who "aspire to qualify for such posts as secretaries of Trades Unions and Councils, or of friendly and co-operative societies, as members of local and municipal bodies, or in the last resort as Labor M.P.'s." To meet their needs he proposes the foundation of a new college, to be provided by a hypothetical private benefactor or by contributions from the existing colleges. On the general question of helping other poor students he is more nebulous. He appears disposed to accept the assurance of "authorities," who have told him that "the number of cases in which the holder of a scholarship could afford to dispense altogether with his emoluments, or would have completed a University course without them, is small." Personally, I am in sympathy with what he says about the stimulus afforded to work at school by the existence of these scholarships, and about the undesirability of establishing a poverty qualification in all cases; but he appears to me to underrate the extent to which scholarships are abused. Scholars who habitually travel first-class, keep hunters, own yachts, give balls (such things are exceptional, but not unknown)—who are enabled to do these things, and are often made idler in consequence, by means of valuable scholarships founded for poor scholars—are surely an abuse which should be at least discouraged. Moreover, of those men who might very reasonably accept some help towards the expenses of their University education, many do not want as large a sum as £80, while the poorer men need much more. The reduction of all scholarships to £40 or £50 a year and the conversion of the residue into a fund out of which exhibitions could be privately granted to those in need of more is a solution which would, I believe, command the support of a majority of tutors, though some are, no doubt, anxious to go further.

In proportion as the Chancellor turns from the wider problems which concern the relation of the University to the outside world to details of a more purely educational nature, his insight becomes less conspicuous. He lays it down, for instance, rather peremptorily, that "too many scholarships are assigned to Classics and History," and suggests the institution of scholarships "for Music, Divinity, the Indian Civil Service, and Research." As the Indian Civil Service is quite accessible to candidates who have taken any one of the Final Schools, it is difficult to see the meaning of the suggestion that scholarships should be appropriated to it. He hardly seems to realise that the question of scholarships is inextricably bound up with the wider question of what it is desirable that boys should learn at school. The Chancellor can hardly suppose that boys ought to be encouraged to specialise at school in "Divinity"—a subject the effective study of which presupposes not merely a good classical education, but a course of philosophy. As to "Research," it would be extravagant to impute to him the absurd suggestion that boys fresh from school are to be examined in "Research" (which appears to be treated as a separate "subject," quite independent of all others), and to be occupied in that subject throughout their undergraduate career. He must mean that a larger share of the emoluments now appropriated to college scholarships should be employed in giving scholarships or exhibitions to advanced post-graduate students. For such a scheme there is, indeed, much to be said. But the truth is that the Chancellor, masterly in his dealings with questions of administration and finance, sensible and judicious on the larger questions of educational policy, shows little appreciation of the problems which concern what may perhaps be called the highest aspects of University life—the functions of a University as a seat of learning, of advanced study, of research. About these things he writes as about something of which he has vaguely heard.

Closely connected with the question of the University's functions in the matter of research is the question of "idle fellowships." The Chancellor has nothing to say against the system by which many thousands a year—left to promote study and teaching in a University whose urgent need for fresh endowments is acknowledged on every page—are spent in assisting a certain number of its more distinguished graduates, often well-to-do persons, in no need whatever of assistance, to pursue their fortunes at the bar, in the public service, or in other well-paid careers. To this subject I hope to return in another article, but meanwhile I should like to raise the question, "What is expected to come of the Chancellor's recommendations?" The Chancellor has definitely recommended the University (1) to throw open its degrees to women, (2) to abolish compulsory Greek, (3) to restrict Congregation to teachers. All these are measures which the University (i.e., Congregation) has fairly recently—in the last two cases quite recently—refused to adopt by decided, though not large, majorities. Is there any probability that the behest of the Tory Chancellor will induce them to reverse their verdict, or that, if they do, the country parsons assembled in Convocation will confirm their decision? There is no reason to doubt that, if the Tory wire-pullers in Oxford issue the usual whip, it will meet with the usual response. Lord Curzon's suggestion that the clerical restrictions should be removed from the degrees, professorships, and examinerships of the theological faculty will serve as an excuse for the familiar "Church in danger" cry. I doubt whether those who were so eager to make Lord Curzon Chancellor will now be ready to take his advice. The reconstitution of Council and of Congregation does, no doubt, lie within the power of the University. But the proposed financial board, if it is to be really effective, will require little less than a revolution in the constitution of the University and in the status of all the colleges, and this will certainly require an Act of Parliament. Such a change could hardly be effected by an "agreed" or privately promoted Bill. Neither the country nor the University will be satisfied with a Bill based upon no further investigation than that which has been conducted in privacy by Lord Curzon himself, with the assistance of those witnesses or advisers who have been invited, or who have courageously invited themselves to favor him with their suggestions. Even upon the assumption that Lord Curzon's recommendations are sufficient, his book strengthens rather than rebuts the plea for a University Commission with a carefully defined and strictly limited reference. That his proposals are very far from sufficient, I hope to show in another article.

Lord Curzon has in general wisely avoided references to the ancient history of the University, which seldom has much bearing upon present questions; in the few allusions that he has made to it there are just one or two slips. Any senior member of the University could have told him that there was never a time when all Fellows were "in holy orders, holding office for life"; nor is it easy to see what he means by the statement that "before the time of Archbishop Laud the period of residence was nominal." But nobody will go to Lord Curzon's book for medieval history; to the future historian of modern Oxford it will be as invaluable as it is to the University politician of the present.

H. Rashdall.

Contemporaries.

THE PRIME MINISTER.

No feature of the Prime Minister's career is more conspicuous than its continuously fortunate character. It would be well below the truth to say that it contained no catastrophe. Mr. Elias's recent account of it * includes no early struggle of real acuteness, such as Disraeli experienced; no "tempest-tost" periods, such as Gladstone knew; no acquaintance with extreme unpopularity, and only an exclusion from office long enough to mature his critical powers, and give him his quickly accruing chance of attaining the highest position. From the "captaincy" of the City of London School to a Balliol scholarship; from a Balliol scholarship to a "first in Greats"; from the University and a great Oxford reputation to a rapid success at the bar and a safe seat in Parliament; from a perfect maiden speech to an early place in the Cabinet, gained without the obscure labors of an under-secretaryship; from a brief lieutenancy in political leadership to the chief command. Everybody and everything has made way for Mr. Asquith; friends and foes, rivals and predecessors in age, rank, and authority. Lord Rosebery retired; Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman died. Lord Morley did not contest his Premiership; Sir Edward Grey promoted it. Succeeding, like Lord Rosebery, to a sudden vacancy, he inherited not a precarious and fast vanishing tenure, but a mighty majority and an unexhausted inheritance of force and enthusiasm. Was ever such a combination of opportunity and talent?

Yet it cannot be said that this swift, smooth rise has been achieved through an undue suppleness of character, least of all by a sudden evolution of opinion, or a sinister change of side. Mr. Asquith remains what he was when he came into politics, a Liberal of the Centre, with an inclination now to the Right, now to the Left. Medium opinion attracts him; the exposition of it draws out his best powers of mind, and satisfies at once his belief in progress and his limited interest in large experiments in human nature or in government. Considering the combined effect of training and character, it is remarkable that Mr. Asquith has retained a sincere and thoroughly-rooted feeling for democracy. Mr. Elias, in apportioning Jowett's share in moulding the Prime Minister's nature, says truly of that remarkable man that he showed "a certain hesitation to adopt permanent positions, and a great and wonderful discretion." That is only another way of suggesting the familiar truth about the influence of Balliol under its famous Master—that men were trained for power and use, rather than for moral devotion or the finest kind of intellectual thoroughness. The great college, self-centred and self-dependent, remote even from the life of its University, breathed, indeed, a spirit of eclectic and highly critical Liberalism. But it held no contact with popular forces, and its chief chilled much young and generous blood both by direct contact with a reserved and worldly, though not unkind, personality, and by the indirect tendencies of his mind and purpose. Mr. Elias denies the oft-repeated charge that Jowett was a "snob." But, by choice, he kept a school for satraps rather than for citizens; and it says much for Mr. Asquith's Liberalism that, if anything, it is rather more pronounced at fifty-five than it was at twenty-five. What he has really wanted, and what Oxford and Balliol and his later social life indisposed him to obtain, has been something of the direct, informal, contact with life which his contemporary, M. Clemenceau, secured through a vivid literary and highly combative temperament, through journalism, a medical practice in Montmartre, and the tremendous rough-and-tumble of a long minority in French politics. Mr. Asquith's equable nature would have been the better for a more stirring introduction even to the rather drab life of British statesmanship. A broader, less sheltered, existence would have made the Prime Minister sit easier to the movement of his times, and given color and fulness to his intellect. As it is, even the Parliamentary party hardly knows him. It knew Gladstone as its hero of a hundred fights, its ideal, ever-worshipped symbol of moral energy. It knew Campbell-Bannerman as a friend, or as the Russian soldier knows a favorite general. But Mr. Asquith is withdrawn from popular cognisance, partly by a superficial shyness of address, partly because he is thought to live much the same life as Mr. Balfour.

In spite of this detachment, there is no real complexity in a character which is essentially simple and loyal. It was once said of Mr. W. E. Forster that he was a "stage Yorkshireman." Mr. Asquith is a quite untheatrical Yorkshireman. He is as middle-class as Cobden and Bright, and if he lacks their genius, and falls behind their firm humanity, he shares their general views of statesmanship, and in capacity for the science of modern government, with its incessant call on brain-force and working power, he comes nearer to Gladstone than any of his later predecessors. Mr. Asquith works, perhaps, a little too easily always to work well. And his product is not quite of the highest type. Just as his intellect wants the almost indescribable quality that gives light to the mind's eye, so his utterance lacks the communicative and sympathetic power which flows from knowledge at full play with its subject, or from feeling in close and thrilling contact with it. His speeches are more arguments than reasoning, more rhetoric than oratory. He is not a thinker in the sense that Mr. Balfour or the late Lord Salisbury could claim that rare title, for he lacks the subtlety of the one and the originality and irrepressible candor of the other. But nature gave him, cased in a frame of steel, perhaps the best working brain in the country. Resource, flexibility, it wants; and also the largest kind of judgment of affairs; and it is bound, therefore, to disappoint from time to time the curiosity of the people about the artistry of their rulers, their passion for the picturesque and the unexpected, clothed in new conceptions or adaptations of politics. But the average output is wonderfully good, wonderfully stable in substance and well-rounded in workmanship. Mr. Asquith has made some slips, and fallen into one error of consequence. But he has not failed.

* "The Right Hon. H. H. Asquith: A Biography and Appreciation." By Frank Elias. James Clarke. 3s. 6d. net.

The real problem which the Prime Minister presents is as to his future plans and attachments. He has a calm temper, secure from Lord Rosebery's over-sensitiveness. He is neither blind nor unsympathetic to popular needs; it was no calculation, but a touch of impulse in his character, which was answerable for the quick decision to adopt old age pensions. Whither will he be drawn? Now all is plain, or should be plain. Mr. Asquith has resented the suggestion made in this journal that his speech in the "Dreadnought" debate was "Palmerstonian." We think this a correct description, so far as political parallels can ever be called exact. Its cause lay rather in want of imagination—in the failure to measure the effect of strong speech and the precise bearings of a delicate conjuncture in politics—than in any purpose to draw Liberalism out of its path. But its effect was to make Radicals anxious, fearful for the maintenance of social reform, not quite certain about European peace and the future of a party continually confronted with the choice as to friends and methods and policy in which German Liberalism came to grief. The ship's head is right, but in the distance loom the rocks—the House of Lords, Ireland, Socialism, the tangle of woman's suffrage, the Labor problem, the Imperialist-Protectionist revival. What course will her steersman take through and past them? Hitherto, Mr. Asquith has only been called on for Parliamentary leadership; later on the invitation will be to interpret the signs of the times, and guide the movement of democracy.

The Drama.

AMERICA FOR THE AMERICANS.

It is extremely difficult to reduce the English and the American drama to a common denominator, or even to define their differences. But this very difficulty emphasises the fact that America has now a drama of her own, at least as national and characteristic as anything we can show in England. Perhaps, indeed, the essential point of difference might be found in the closer relationship of American plays to the everyday life of the people. Roughly speaking, our drama is a dress-coat drama, theirs a shirt-sleeve drama. Not that the American public objects to dress coats or to gorgeous millinery. The unbridled luxury of American city life certainly does not fail to find its reflex on the stage. But the really popular formula gives, perhaps, one act to dress coats, three acts to shirt sleeves; and what the public most appreciates is the racy reproduction of phases and figures from common life. On the whole, then, the American drama strikes the English observer as a little lacking in that surface polish of which we have a little too much. It is often a form of journalism, rather than of literature. It is a veritable school of slang: playwrights vie with each other in reproducing and exaggerating the catchwords of the day, sometimes picturesque, sometimes idiotic. But for my part I would much rather see drama a form of journalism than a thing remote from life, unrelated to reality, a narcotic, a sweetmeat, or a toy.

One thing is clear: that America is more and more determined to write her own plays, and not to take them, ready-made, from England, or France, or—as was the practice of the late Mr. Daly—from Germany. During a fortnight of assiduous theatre-going in New York, I saw only two plays that were not American, and I had to leave unseen some half-dozen American plays of more or less note. One of the English plays I saw was that classic imbecility, "Our American Cousin," in which Mr. E. H. Sothern reproduces with marvellous accuracy his father's Lord Dundreary, and is indescribably droll and delightful. The other was "An Englishman's Home," which, as any one might have foreseen, was a flat failure. Gallant efforts were made to puff and bluff it into popularity; but the thing was impossible. Any little chance it might have had was ruined by inefficient production. It was manifest that the American audience neither understood it nor cared two straws about it. Moral: panic-pamphlets are strictly for home consumption.

Of the American plays I saw, the most notable, as it was certainly the most popular, was "The Easiest Way," by Mr. Eugene Walter, a playwright whom the past two seasons have brought very much to the front. It might be called "Iris" Americanised, with this difference that, whereas Mr. Pinero's play showed the fall of a pleasure-loving temperament, Mr. Walter's play shows the failure of an attempt to rise. Laura Murdock, while by way of being an actress, lives in luxury at the expense of a Wall Street operator, Willard Brockton. She falls in with an honest lover, a young man from the West, named John Madison, who knows her past, but condones it on the ground that his own has not been above reproach. Unfortunately, he has not a sou, and must go off to make his fortune; she promising meanwhile to leave Brockton and live respectably by her art. Brockton is a party to this arrangement, but prophesies that it will not work, and that Laura will return to him. In the next act we have an admirably vivid and poignant picture of abject poverty in a fourth-rate New York boarding-house. Laura can make no money by her "art"; to secure an engagement, she must have the protection of a man of the Brockton class. The pinch of penury drives her back to her old life; and she omits to act squarely by her Western lover—her Armand Duval—and inform him of her lapse. In the last act John Madison arrives from the West, a rich man, and eager to carry off his affianced bride. There is a passionate love-scene between them, and Laura is preparing for an instant departure, when a latchkey is heard to turn in the door of her flat, and Willard Brockton walks in with a calm air of proprietorship. A stormy scene follows between Laura and John Madison, who turns his back on her for ever. She essays suicide, but has not the pluck for it; and at last, following "the easiest way," she puts on all her finery and goes off to a gay supper-party, where her charms will certainly meet with appreciation. The play is crude, painful, uncompromising, sincere.

Two other plays of a more or less serious order are "The Third Degree," by Mr. Charles Klein, and "The Battle," by Mr. Cleveland Moffett. "The Third Degree" attacks an alleged practice of the New York police, of part-torturing, part-hypnotising prisoners into a confession of crimes of which they may be entirely innocent. In this case a weak and somewhat dissipate youth is starved and badgered into signing the statement that he killed a friend of his, who, in fact, committed suicide. Then his wife, who is convinced of his innocence, lays siege to a great lawyer, and finally induces him to undertake her husband's defence. The remainder of the play is marred by the rather wanton introduction of the old self-sacrifice motive. It is, on the whole, little more than a melodrama, but a melodrama with a groundwork of psychology and of social purpose. "The Battle" sets forth to deal with the antagonism of capital and labor, and I have heard it praised for the impartiality with which it holds the balance between the two. This praise it scarcely deserves, for it represents Socialism as simply the heresy of the "have-nots," which they straightway recant the moment they join the ranks of the "haves." The philosophy of the play, in short, is shallow enough; but it is something that a popular drama of this sort should aspire to any philosophic purport. Another play of business life, "The Fighting Hope," by Mr. W. J. Hurlbut, presents an ably-conceived situation, but with such complete incompetence of psychology as to reduce it to a rather low melodramatic level.

Three plays of a lighter order may be grouped together in virtue of their intense localism. The best of the three is "A Gentleman from Mississippi," by Messrs. Rhodes and Wise, which shows how a simple-minded old Southerner, coming to Washington to take his seat in the Senate, baffles the intrigues of certain dishonest fellow-Senators who seek to involve him in a shady political job. In some ways the play bears a strong resemblance to Ibsen's "Pillars of Society"; yet it presents a characteristically American situation worked out in a thoroughly American fashion. "The Travelling Salesman," by Mr. James Forbes, deals with the loves of a "drummer" and a girl-telegraphist whom a villainous lawyer is trying to swindle out of some valuable "real estate." It may be said to reek of local color, and its pictures of "commercial" life in a one-horse Western town are highly entertaining. The third play of this group, "The Man from Home," by Messrs. Tarkington and Wilson, is a modern version of "Our American Cousin." The scene is laid at Sorrento, where a hatchet-faced, imperturbable Indiana lawyer defeats the machinations of sundry titled villains, English and French, and convinces an American heiress of the folly of snobbish ambition. The character of the "Hoosier" hero is highly diverting, but the play ministers unblushingly to the national vanity which holds everything American immeasurably superior to everything foreign. That is, no doubt, the reason why it has run a year in Chicago, and promises to run another year in New York.

The all-too-prolific talent of Mr. Clyde Fitch deals by preference with themes which are American in their setting rather than in their essence—which might easily be transposed into the European key. "The Bachelor" is a play which ought to suit Mr. Charles Hawtrey. It shows how a middle-aged stockbroker unwittingly falls in love with his typist, and how the intervention of her cub of a brother first reveals the state of their affections, and then bids fair to cause an irreparable breach between them. If the play is ever done in England, I should advise the toning down of the brother's cubbishness. On the other hand, there is a delightful Swedish servant-girl, who, though a local phenomenon, could not fail to be appreciated on this side. Mr. Fitch's second play of the season, "A Happy Marriage," is a variant of "Still Waters Run Deep," its characters being the somewhat neglectful husband, absorbed in business, the foolish, flighty wife, and the mean and cowardly lover. The play is very cleverly written, with both observation and wit; but unfortunately Mr. Fitch, while making the wife flighty enough in all conscience, has neglected to make her even moderately amiable, so that "A Happy Marriage" is not likely to rank among his successes.

There is always room in New York, it would seem, for a play of pretentious religiosity. Last year it was "The Servant in the House," by Mr. Rann Kennedy, in which Christ—alias Mr. Manson—appears in the character of a butler. This year it is "The Dawn of a To-morrow," by Mrs. Hodgson Burnett, a drama of English slum life, illustrating in crudely superstitious terms the efficacy of prayer. It also illustrates, incidentally, the efficacy of unselfish thought and work in warding off brain-trouble; but its main lesson is that if you "ask" for help in the dilemmas of life the police will overlook your hiding-places, and the telephone will prove an ever-present help in time of trouble. The play is redeemed by the exquisite acting of Miss Eleanor Robson; but it stands sorely in need of redemption. In "Salvation Nell," written by a Harvard undergraduate, Mr. Edward Sheldon, we pass from unreal slum life in London to real slum life in New York. Unfortunately I saw it in a vast theatre in Boston, where I could not hear one word in three of the dialogue. On its merits as a drama I am therefore a trifle hazy, but I am inclined to agree with that very able critic, Mr. Clayton Hamilton, who says: "The mirror which Mr. Sheldon has held up to nature is an ordinary flat reflector. It lacks the concavity which concentrates and the magic which selects." The staging, on the other hand, was masterly. The saloon scene of the first act, and the east-side tenement slum of the last act, were almost flawless in their realism.

These are the plays I saw; but several noteworthy plays of the season I did not see, either from sheer lack of time, or because they had had their run in New York and had gone "on the road." Among them were "Mater," a comedy by Mr. Percy Mackaye; two sporting dramas, "Blue Grass," by Mr. Paul Armstrong, and "Wildfire," by Mr. George Broadhurst; a domestic comedy, "Mary Jane's Pa," by Miss Edith Ellis; another drama of the slums, "The Regeneration," by Messrs. Kildare and Hackett; and "The Writing on the Wall," by Mr. Hurlbut, dealing with the scandal of the moment—the disgraceful tenement property held by the wealthy corporation of Trinity Church. No doubt these plays were of very various merit, and most of them of small literary pretensions; but the point is that they were one and all plays of local interest by American authors. English authors, on the other hand, had been represented during the season by "Diana of Dobson's," "The Mollusc," "The New Lady Bantock," "Jack Straw," "Lady Frederick," and "What Every Woman Knows." Of these I gather that Mr. Maugham's plays were fairly successful, but Mr. Barrie alone scored an incontestable triumph.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters from Abroad.

THE NEMESIS OF FRENCH BUREAUCRACY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—So far at least as external symptoms are concerned, the state of affairs here would seem to have been considerably exaggerated in the English Press. Nevertheless the situation is in many ways a serious one. I do not think that we are on the brink of a revolution or on the verge of anarchy, but we are at the beginning of a struggle that is likely to last a long time and may bring about profound changes. The conflict between the postal employees and the Government is only one aspect of that struggle. That particular conflict may end in a victory for one side or the other, but the struggle will go on. The immediate issue at stake is the right of Government employees to organise themselves in trade unions, but the whole principle of authority is involved and ultimately the constitution of society. The attack is on the system of authority from above and on the capitalist constitution of society, and the entrance of large bodies of Government officials into the ranks of the attackers is an event of profound significance. It signalises the break-down of the Napoleonic system of centralised administration which has so long dominated France.

It is a strange irony of fate that makes M. Clemenceau the defender of that system. Who could have foretold that, after spending his life as the champion of individual liberty and the opponent of Cæsarism, he would end his political career as the embodiment of authority and the hope of all the Conservative forces in the Republic? I say "Conservative" because the reactionaries, who always fish in troubled waters, are no more favorable to the Government of M. Clemenceau than to those which preceded it. But they are in no sense Conservative; their hope always is to turn unsettled conditions to their own advantage. They will be disappointed on this, as on previous occasions; but they have rendered the service that they usually render to Governments of enabling the "Temps" and other journals to frighten a large part of the bourgeoisie into the belief that the Republic is in danger.

It would seem to an onlooker that the Government might, by a more tactful and consistent policy, have prevented matters from reaching the present acute stage. Everyone admits that the present position of Government employees is unsatisfactory. Nominally that position is regulated by certain provisions of the Code more suitable to a Napoleonic than to a Republican régime. Nominally, Government employees have no legal right to combine, but in fact their combination has been tolerated by successive Ministries since that of Waldeck-Rousseau. For years they have been promised a statute de fonctionnaires which should regularise their position and secure them against favoritism and irregularity of promotion. Such a measure has been more or less before Parliament since the last General Election, but the Government has made no serious effort to carry it through. It is not surprising that the employees have lost patience. In the postal service the situation has been made still more acute by the personal unpopularity of M. Simyan, who has not shown any administrative ability to compensate for the universal dislike which he inspires in his subordinates.

It is not only with the postal employees that the Government has come into collision. Not since the Méline Ministry have there been so many prosecutions for speeches and publications or so many conflicts between the forces of the State and the organised workers. The policy of repression, as is always the case in a democratic country where it cannot be thoroughly applied, has only strengthened the extreme parties. Trade unionists have been driven into the arms of anarchists and anti-patriots. M. Barthou cited last night in the Chamber one or two violent speeches made by postal employees in which parliamentarism and patriotism were denounced. The postal employees, largely recruited from the small bourgeoisie, are the most pacific of mortals; they have merely been driven to exasperation by the failure of the Government and the Radical party to satisfy their just claims. M. Clemenceau's attacks on the Parliamentary Socialist party have had the same effect. With all its faults that party is a bulwark against anarchism, but, in a crisis like the present, all the elements of opposition to arbitrary authority are driven to make common cause.

There are two opinions about the action of the Government since the conclusion of the last strike. One is that M. Clemenceau has shown another example of incoherence and inconsistency; the other that he has cleverly outwitted the postal employees. The latter opinion seems the more probable. The last strike took the Government by surprise, and they were obliged to get the men back to work on any terms. But it may well be that, though forced for the moment to adopt a conciliatory attitude, M. Clemenceau had made up his mind to depart from it on the first opportunity. In any case everything that has occurred during the last month points to a determination on the part of the Government to suppress the organisation of the postal employees. If this view is the correct one the declaration of a new strike is, as I have already said, probably a mistake which will play into the hands of the Government. It is too early yet to say how far the strike will spread, but it would seem that during the first twenty-four hours only a small minority of the employees have left work, and the postal service has not appeared to-day to be seriously disorganised. The bulk of the employees believed that it was intended to postpone a decision until after the vote of the Chamber, and last night's announcement took them by surprise as much as the public. There were several thousand present at the meeting held at the Hippodrome, at which the decision to strike was arrived at, but a decision voted without due deliberation in the excitement of a public meeting may be repented of the next morning. Moreover it has yet to be seen to what extent the provinces will follow Paris which no longer leads French opinion as it once did.

It is reported that at a Cabinet Council held this evening it was decided to take stringent measures at once against all who had left work. Possibly the announcement, which may be expected to-morrow, that they have been irrevocably dismissed will restrain the waverers. This, of course, remains to be seen, but at present there is no sign of the solidarity which characterised the last strike. In any case it would now be more difficult for the Chamber to upset the Government to-morrow even if it desired to do so. I am assuming that the Government is united. There have been rumors of dissensions, and the absence from the Chamber yesterday of M. Caillaux, M. Briand, and M. Viviani was much commented upon. Should these rumors prove to have any foundation the situation would, of course, be changed.

One thing is certain: a victory for the Government will not secure permanent peace. The movement has gone much too far to be stopped by repression, and, unless the genuine grievances of Government employees are speedily dealt with, we may expect a long period of trouble. The postal employees believe that they were duped in March, and that belief engenders bitterness. Those who talk of revolution forget that Paris is not France, and forget also that the peasants are the majority of the French people. Socialism is steadily making headway among the peasants in many districts, but revolutionary syndicalism certainly is not. But the aspirations of the French proletariat have become too definite and too conscious to be suppressed. It may be hoped that we shall sooner or later have a Government able to deal with them in a more statesmanlike way than M. Clemenceau and his colleagues.—Yours, &c.,

YOUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

Paris, May 5th, 1909.

---

Letters to the Editor.

TO THE MEMORY OF THOMAS PAINE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your tribute to the memory of Paine should make impossible any further mud-throwing by Mr. Roosevelt. Only an ex-President of the United States or an English bishop would be stupid enough to-day to call Paine an "atheist"—Paine, who wrote the "Age of Reason" to recall France from its plunge into atheism, and whose declared creed was "I believe in one God, and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life."

A greater American than Mr. Roosevelt acknowledged the debt of the United States to Paine in a speech some thirty years ago, and perhaps the words may be remembered: "I dare not say how much of what our Union is owning and enjoying to-day—its independence, its ardent belief in, and substantial practice of, radical human rights, and the severance of its government from all ecclesiastical and superstitious dominion—I dare not say how much of all this is owing to Thomas Paine, but I am inclined to think a good portion of it decidedly is . . . Paine was among the best and truest of men. He served the embryo Union with most precious service—a service that every man, woman, and child in our thirty-eight States is to some extent receiving the benefit of to-day."—(Walt Whitman, "Specimen Days.")

Old Cobbett indeed hit the truth when he said Paine was the real author of the Declaration of Independence. (Only had Paine's advice been taken, with Independence would have come the abolition of slavery and the saving of America from all the misery and loss of life entailed in the postponement of that abolition.) Carlyle, in spite of the somewhat contemptuous and altogether misleading description of Paine as a "rebellious staymaker," and "needleman," notices him in the "French Revolution" as a man "who feels that he, a single Needleman, did, by his 'Common Sense' pamphlet free America; that he can and will free all this world; perhaps even the other." This very "Common Sense" pamphlet (1776) contains some of Paine's best sayings. "Time makes more converts than reason." "The fate of Charles I. hath only made kings more subtle—not more just." "Government, like dress, is the badge of lost innocence." (Curiously enough, Mr. George Meredith has paraphrased this verdict on dress in his description of clothes as "the badge of our expulsion from paradise.")

America was substantially helped by Paine. France welcomed Paine to its Convention, and though in the Terror would have guillotined him but for the happy mistake of a turnkey at the Luxembourg, did, at least, have the benefit of his appeal for a Republic and his utterances against capital punishment. England, on Paine's visit after the War of Independence, profited by the scientific inventions of the author of "Common Sense," and the iron bridge at Wearmouth was built on Paine's plans of construction.

But it is only now in 1909 that Paine's practical proposals for social reform embodied in "The Rights of Man" (written, in rural retirement at the Angel, Islington, 1791), are finding some acceptance. These proposals included: (1) Old age pensions for all over 60; (2) compulsory school attendance for all children under fourteen; (3) a graduated income-tax: 3d. in the £ on incomes between £50 and £500; 6d. in the £ from £500 to £1,000, an additional 6d. on incomes of £4,000, an additional 1s. on every £1,000 beyond £4,000—until an income of £23,000 meant an income-tax of 20s. in the £. Paine's "Agrarian Justice" (1796) attacked land monopoly, and proposed to end this evil by a tax on land values, the tax to form a national fund. The argument has a wonderfully familiar ring about it. "It (land monopoly) has dispossessed more than half the inhabitants of every nation of their natural inheritance, without providing for them, as ought to have been done, an indemnification for their loss; and has thereby created a species of poverty and wretchedness that did not exist. . . . Every proprietor, therefore, of cultivated land owes to the community a ground rent, for I know no better term to express the idea by, for the land which he holds; and it is from ground rent that the fund proposed in this plan is to issue."

There is no room here to recite the full tale of Paine's social and political activities. It must suffice to mention his advocacy of full rights of citizenship for women, and of justice for native races; his hatred of war, of monarchy, and of capital punishment. (One of Paine's many comments on war may be quoted: "He who is the author of a war lets loose the whole contagion of hell, and opens a vein that bleeds a nation to death."). Paine received the scantiest recognition and the scurviest treatment from the Governments of the nations he served with such disinterested devotion in his day and generation, and he has been pursued by malignant ignorance in high places. The centenary of Paine's death ought not to pass without our honoring the name of Thomas Paine in our praise of famous men, and our fathers that begat us.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH CLAYTON.

Hampstead, May 11, 1909.

[P.S.—Of all Paine's remarkable escapes from the ferocity of Governments, perhaps the most notable was his flight from England in 1792. It was William Blake who persuaded Paine not to return to his house in Marylebone, but to go direct to France, and following the poet's warning, Paine fled. The warrant for his arrest (for the publication of the "Rights of Man") was already out, and twenty minutes after the packet had sailed, the warrant reached Dover.]

SOLITARY CONFINEMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—All persons gifted with even the smallest amount of imaginative sympathy must welcome Mr. Galsworthy's impassioned protest in your columns against the retention of the present system of solitary confinement in our prisons. I was myself particularly glad to see Mr. Galsworthy writing in THE NATION on this subject, because a month or two ago when, in a letter to "The Times," I took occasion to refer in terms of horror to the sentence of solitary confinement for life inflicted in Italy on the murderer of the Empress of Austria (which resulted in the prisoner's ultimately losing his reason), Mr. Galsworthy wrote to me privately saying that this incident had been a nightmare to him also. My own letter on that occasion was mainly directed to a different question, namely, whether the death penalty, if painlessly inflicted, was not really a more humane and merciful thing than our prolonged terms of penal servitude. In that view I dare say Mr. Galsworthy does not agree with me, and my letter certainly drew a vehement protest from the humane gentleman who is secretary of the Society for the Abolition of Capital Punishment. But on the cruelty and the folly of solitary confinement, even for the relatively short periods sanctioned by our present practice, Mr. Galsworthy and I are absolutely at one. In the words of the phrase he quotes more than once this punishment is "absolutely opposed to mental, moral, and physical health." Everyone who knows anything whatever about psychology must know this. Everyone who knows anything about physiology must know it. Everyone who knows anything of medicine must know it. It is not possible to specify in your columns the special evils, moral and physical, to which solitary confinement is likely to lead. These could only be set down in a medical journal. But they must be obvious to anyone who has thought at all about the question. I hope Mr. Galsworthy's "Open Letter" will convince the Home Secretary of the necessity of immediately abolishing this form of punishment and introducing a system less flagrantly opposed to common sense and scientific opinion.—Yours, &c.,

ST. JOHN HANKIN.

Campden, Glos.
May 8th, 1909.

---

THE ANGLICAN CHURCH AND NON-CONFORMISTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Mr. Magrath is not the first person who, finding an argument difficult to answer, has declared it to be "unworthy of reply." With your permission I will again state the argument on which my previous letter was based, leaving it to you and your readers to judge whether it is, or is not, worthy of reply. Three Churches claim to have been founded "directly by our Lord"—the Greek, the Roman, and the Anglican—and each scorns the claims of the other two. What the Greek Church thinks of the Anglican and Roman Churches may be seen from the greeting of M. Mourouvieff, of the Holy Synod, to William Palmer, the Tractarian deputy:—

> "We know you only as heretics. You separated from the Latin Church three hundred years ago, as the Latins had before that separated from the Greeks. We think even the Latin Church heretical, but you are an apostasy from an apostasy. You are a descent from bad to worse."

What the Roman Church thinks of the Anglican is shown by the following statement of John Henry Newman:—

> "I recognise in the Anglican Church a time-honored institution, it may be a great creation, though it be not divine."

Now what Mr. Magrath has to do is to prove, not to my satisfaction, for to me, believing as I do that all three Churches are Churches of Christ, the point is immaterial, but to the satisfaction of the rival claimants, that the Anglican Church is the only Church founded "directly by Our Lord." Until he does this, my argument has not been answered; as the rock on which he stands has been shattered to pieces by there being three Churches claiming what can only belong to one. My belief, on the other hand, he has to disprove. It is that all societies claiming Jesus Christ as their head, witnessing to Him in their character and works, are Churches, and that all those who, under whatever varying forms of ritual and doctrine, worship Him in sincerity and truth, are members of, and together form the "Holy Catholic Church throughout all the world." The question as to whether the Mormons are a Christian Church is capable of decision: it depends upon whether the Mormons acknowledge Jesus Christ as Master and Lord, and whether their lives are in harmony with His teaching and example.

Mr. Magrath says that the Church, by which I take it, he means the Anglican Church, was not founded by Henry VIII. I did not say it was. I said that the Anglican Church, as we knew it to-day, had been made by Henry VIII. Mr. Magrath says, "it was the same old Catholic Church of the land continued unbrokenly, though reformed in certain particulars." If it was "the same old Catholic Church," why did John Henry Newman leave it, and why does the Pope refuse to recognise the validity of its Orders? Mr. Magrath says, "If it was a new Church, then there must have been a complete change of doctrine—service, books, bishops, and priests. Was there?" I will answer this question by asking Mr. Magrath another. If there was no change of doctrine, how is it that the "service, books, bishops, and priests" of the Anglican Church—to say nothing of the sacraments—differ from those of the Roman Church? Moreover, a complete change of doctrine was involved in the substitution of the King as head of the Church in place of the Pope. The claim of the one, resting as it did on spiritual successorship to St. Peter, could at least be understood, if not admitted, but such a claim became ludicrous when advanced by one lacking the remotest pretensions to any such spiritual descent. Mr. Magrath denies that Henry VIII. was supreme in spiritual matters, and alleges that "even in his most inquisitorial moments he was not an intruder on the spiritual functions of the bishops." This is hardly correct. The first Supremacy Act of Henry contains in general terms an enumeration of the rights which are to be regarded as implied therein. These are "honors, dignities, pre-eminences, privileges," &c., but as the essence of the whole the right of exercising every form of spiritual authority or jurisdiction for certain purposes stated in the enactment. I admit that Henry VIII., in his letter to Tunstall, Bishop of Durham, acknowledges that the supremacy did not imply potestas ordinis, and that the supremacy in the XXXIX. Articles is declared to be the right to govern all classes and orders—spiritual and temporal—and to punish the stubborn and the evil-doers with the temporal sword. But Felix Makower, the greatest authority on the Constitutional History and Constitution of the Church of England, writes, "If we adhere closely to the actual texts of the legislative enactments, which seem to favor an opposite view, we shall find that nowhere in them is it stated that the power of the King to govern the Church is of a purely temporal character." Makower further states that the reason of the ambiguity of the language used in the XXXIX. Articles lay in the fact that there was still a desire to appease uneasy consciences, to make the transference of new ecclesiastical powers to the crown as little marked as possible. "But there was no intention of surrendering such powers. In point of fact, even after the issue of the injunctions, and after the subscription of the Thirty-nine Articles had been required by statute, they were exercised just as before." Those powers were, of course, the powers implied in the claim exercised by Henry VIII. as "supreme governor of this realm in all spiritual and temporal things."

When the three Churches claiming to have been founded directly by Christ have settled which of them is the one He really did found, Mr. Magrath, if he is still alive, and I hope he may be, though I doubt it, will be able to refer to "dissenting sects" without laying himself open to the charge that he lacks a sense of humor. I note that Mr. Magrath does not deny my contention that the primitive Christian Church was a "dissenting sect," scorned and persecuted by the established Church of the day.—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD MUDIE-SMITH.

9, Clifton Villas, Maida Vale, W.
May 11th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Is not the controversy between Mr. Charles J. Magrath and Mr. Mudie-Smith quite useless? It is plainly a dispute on secondary questions—between men who differ on fundamentals. Unless—and until—they, and such others as are still interested in old questions in theology and history, can agree as to what is a "church," and as to much else, debate is vain. Perhaps it is vain in any event, and even unimportant. The sects rage furiously as of old:

"But John P
Robinson, he Says they didn't know everythin' down in Judee."

Let the "Noncons." and the "Evans." copy the example of the wider wicked world for once, and treat sacerdotal affectation of superiority with contempt or indifference. Meanwhile I turn to your review, p. 200 (M. Loisy) or p. 222 (Westermarck) and find that in the best sense "religion never was designed to make our pleasures less."—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE WHALE.

18, Vanbrugh Park, Blackheath, S.E.
May 9th, 1909.

THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—As a member of a County Council Small Holdings Committee, I am in entire agreement with Mr. Montague Fordham. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain has gone over to the Tories, taking his "blessed word" compulsion with him. But the Tories hate both the word and the thing, and there are not a few Liberals who sympathise with them. The Cambs. County Council has the reputation of being in the fronk rank of the Councils so far as the Small Holdings Act is concerned, but only last week it took back from its committee the power it had delegated to it of applying direct to the Board of Agriculture for compulsory powers of purchase, thus adding a fresh cause of delay. The first requisite to success is a sympathetic Council, and that means sweeping changes in the present representation. There is no chance of this in the rural districts until there is some form of payment of members, and I trust Mr. Montague Fordham's "powerful central organisation" will not neglect this aspect of the question.

This first requisite—a sympathetic Council—having been obtained, there will be other difficulties to face. The Cambs. County Council has times and again been outbidden in the open market when trying to buy small lots of land. It has succeeded best at auctions and by private treaty with farms of from 150 to 500 acres, but amounts like these total up slowly. The Government must itself come in as a buyer, and that on a large scale.

To pursue the matter a stage further. Land in large lots comes into the market comparatively rarely. How is this? Partly because land still brings social prestige with it, partly because it is not as marketable a commodity as it might be. With Mr. Lloyd George's revised scale of death duties, there will be an increased number of people wanting to realise property wherewith to pay them. They will sell their pictures and all their stocks and shares before they sell an acre of land, because the former are more marketable than the latter. The old demand for simplification of title, and, consequently, of transfer, is dead. It might be revived with advantage.

Here I have a further suggestion to make. Why should not estate duties on land be paid in kind by arrangement between the Treasury and the Board of Agriculture, the price being set off against the Sinking Fund? If the land were taken at what it is valued at for probate purposes, the Board of Agriculture would get some nice bargains.

The mention of valuation opens up another possibility of advance. When once the capital value of all the land in the country has been ascertained, it might be taken at that valuation plus ten per cent. for compulsory purposes, and at the valuation minus ten per cent. for probate purposes. That would save much time and trouble.

There is another plan that may be mentioned for bringing land into the market. The pulling down of cottages and the expatriation of the villagers is still going on in the interests of game-preserving. Where is the old cry for the abolition of the Game Laws? If it is to be heard no more, why not a special tax on land held for non-productive purposes, as game preserves, parks, ornamental gardens, ornamental woods, and the like, either of so much per acre or on the capital value? If Mr. Lloyd George is too hard pressed on some of his Budget proposals, he might find something to help him here. The heavier the tax, the greater the inducement to use the land for productive purposes.

When the disendowment of the Church comes, the glebe lands will be available for national purposes, small holdings among the rest.

All these are large proposals—some will call them revolutionary—but getting the people back to the soil is a big question. Has the Board of Agriculture realised how big it is? Has the Government? I doubt it. Only State action of the widest and most determined kind will achieve success.—Yours, &c., A. I. Tillyard.

May, 11th, 1909.

IS GOLF A GAME?

To the Editor of THE NATION

Sir,—It is possible, without having any feeling either for or against golf, to hold that to call it a game is an abuse of language, and I believe that this view finds strong support from a quotation in the review of Mr. Haultain's book, "The Mystery of Golf," to be found in last week's Nation. "The foe in golf," says Mr. Haultain, "is not your opponent, but great Nature herself, and the game is to see who will over-reach her better—you or your opponent." Now, I contend that the essence of a game is that it must be played against a living opponent who not merely strives to advance himself, but also endeavors to prevent you from advancing. This is the case with typical outdoor games like cricket and football and also with the real indoor games like chess. Golf is not a game; it is a pursuit. It belongs to the same category as kite-flying or postage stamp collecting, or the pseudo-game of patience. Your reviewer compares golf with art and religion. He is right. Like them it has its own priesthood who, by insisting on rules that prohibit the thrill of actual physical conflict, reduce it to a cold-blooded scientific pursuit, tempered by blasphemous invocations.—Yours, &c., Penguin.

London, May 11th, 1909.

THE BUDGET AND THE BREWERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I be allowed to point out an inaccuracy in your first paragraph of "Dairy of the Week" (May 8th). You make the statement that "brewery shares have risen since the character of the Budget was made known." This is unfortunately not the case, and it is difficult to know on what you base your assertion. I can speak on this matter with some authority, and I beg to say most emphatically that with the exception of Messrs. Guinness & Company's shares, and possibly the Preference shares of Messrs. Peter Walker & Son (Warrington and Burton), where changes have been marked—and there have been several—the prices invariably show declines. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine how brewery shares could possibly rise considering the contributions which they are henceforth called upon to make; but it must be remembered that in regard to Messrs. Guinness & Company, this wealthy firm hold no licensed houses, and if the new barrel tax costs them £25,000 per annum, they are fortunately well able to afford it; also in the case of Messrs. Peter Walker & Son, although their contributions will be very onerous, yet the Ordinary shares were never issued to the public, and as the dividend on these shares is 10 per cent., no loss will fall on the public, who hold only the Preference and Debenture. Hence a firm market is not to be wondered at for these two concerns; but in regard to many of the big London breweries the future holds very slight hopes of dividends for the Ordinary shareholders, and it is a curious mistake that responsible members of the Cabinet make when they speak of the brewer paying the extra taxation. Only in rare cases is the brewer going to pay; in nearly all cases it is the Ordinary or Preference shareholders whose dividends are going to be mulcted; and politicians are running away from facts when they ignore this situation.

You make another very curious assertion, which is true so far as it goes, but it does not cover the whole position. You say, under the article "Politics and Affairs": "Thus the new licence duties amount to a fresh tax of threepence a barrel on beer," and then you begin to criticise in a hostile manner the projected increase in the price of beer of six or seven shillings a barrel as something extortionate and unjustifiable, but you have quite omitted to consider the enormous increase of taxation for licensed houses, running into hundreds and thousands per cent. If the price of beer is raised (as to the advisability of which there may be two opinions), it will be to recover for the shareholders some portion (if possible all) of the very heavy burden they are now compelled to accept. I quite agree with you that it would be preposterous and extortionate if the brewers raised the price of beer six shillings a barrel in order to recover a small increase of threepence on such measure; but, as I have explained, this is not the case, and as I am sure you only desire to state the position justly as to all interests, you may be good enough to allow this other side of the question to appear in your columns.

Although I am bitterly opposed to these new licensing taxes, and consider them not only unfair, but altogether unreasonable; yet I quite recognise that Mr. Lloyd George and the other members of the Cabinet may think they have a just case, although I, in common with what I believe to be the majority of people, fail to recognise it; but slanging is useless and calm argument is the only means of making truth and justice prevail.—Yours, &c.,

H. Peter Bone.

28, Adelaide Crescent, Brighton,
May 11th, 1909.

[Our correspondent, who writes with authority, is correct in saying that there was no general rise of brewery shares, though he admits exceptions to his statement as to the decline. This was so slight that the City Editor of the "Times," in reviewing the Stock Exchange and the effect of the Budget for the week, said in the "Financial Supplement" of May 7th: "It is equally true that brewery shares have not gone down." In fact, the Budget's proposals led to no appreciable selling of brewery stock and shares.—Ed., Nation.]

A QUESTION OF IDEALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. Immo S. Allen, wants to know the ideal of the Free Traders. I will tell him: it is the economic form of the active living principle, viz., "The greatest good of the greatest number."

In our controversies is it not better to criticise the methods only of our opponents and give them the credit of ideals as high as our own?—Yours, &c., Eliza Delf.

10, Christchurch Road, Hampstead,
May 13th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION

Sir,—The quizzical contribution to your last issue by Mr. I. S. Allen as to the idealism of Tariff Reformers strikes quite a fresh note, it being now nearly half a decade since even the faint echoes of the claim to such a merit were heard. We may grant that originally the attempt was made to evolve something of the nature of an ideal, but NOW it is conspicuous by its absence, and the notion of culling flowers of idealism from fields sown with the tares of "lobbying" and the corruption of public life (than which there is nothing more sinister or degrading among the concomitants of Tariff Reform) is almost quaint, and is quite "melancholy."

"The infusion of new life and happiness into our country districts" by the medium of taxes upon the necessaries of life and through the medium of a system which is "all things to all men" in order to gain ulterior and selfish ends, which, for vote-catching purposes, is enunciated in terms of pseudo-Socialism (not to say Anarchism) to an audience on one side of the street, whilst on the other side it is set forth in the guise of a barely concealed demand that the poor shall pluck the chestnuts from the fire for the rich under pains, penalties, and threats of "exported capital," "withdrawn subscriptions," "foreign invasion," and so forth—all this scarcely strikes one as idyllic. Nor will the souls of the people be nourished upon the growth of essentially "soulless" trusts.

Free Traders may concede without risk that their system is not free from some anomalies, and to that extent is not an ideal one, but they can affirm with the utmost certainty that "The Laborer's Listlessness" will not be dispelled by Tariff Reform—the apotheosis of an empiricism which recks as little of the country laborer as of many another humble toiler.—Yours, &c., ERNEST W. LEIGHTON.

"Karachi," Empress Avenue,
Woodford Green,
May 12th, 1909.

A MISQUOTATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Austin Harrison in this month's "Nineteenth Century," says: "The Germans, who study Shakespeare far more than we do, have taken as motto 'Readiness is all.'" But I venture to think that if the words are to be quoted as Shakespeare's, they should be quoted correctly. Hamlet says, "the readiness is all"; meaning the need to be prepared for death. Here is the whole passage:—

"HAMLET: Not a whit, we defy augury; there's a special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, 'tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come: the readiness is all. Since no man has aught of what he leaves, what is't to leave betimes?"

What this has to do with the building of "Dreadnoughts," I cannot conceive! Perhaps Mr. Harrison gives the German people credit for being more foolish than they really are.—Yours &c., P.

THE WORLD'S SHORTAGE OF WHEAT.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Your article on the World's Shortage of Wheat is alike admirable in its method of treatment and sound in its main conclusions. But one must take exception to the following passage:—

> "For most of our readers it may be of little personal import that the price of a quartern loaf has risen from 5½d. to 6½d., or even 7d. But there is a considerable section of the people for whom this means an increase of ten, or even fifteen, per cent. in the total cost of living. And the income of these people is chronically fluctuating just above the bare physical subsistence point."

In the first place, the advance in the price of bread has not been greater than 1½d. per quartern. Again, the poorest classes of workmen spend on bread something less than one-fifth of their total food expenditure. Hence, the resultant percentage of increased expenditure is not ten or fifteen, but somewhere about five or six per cent., and that not in "the total cost of living," but only in the amount paid for food, which is a little more than one-half of that total cost.

The concluding sentence if meant as an exact statement of fact, can hardly pass muster, but it is probably only a rhetorical way of saying that wages are not as high as they ought to be.—Yours, &c., R. SHINDLER.

61, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE OBJECT OF THE GERMAN NAVY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Is not the true reason for the Kaiser's desire for a strong Navy, as well as a strong Army, the consideration of what may happen at the death of the Emperor of Austria? The addition of the German-speaking provinces of Austria, and possibly some others, to Germany would form a magnificent Empire, reaching, one may say, from the Baltic to the Mediterranean. The temptation on both sides—i.e., of the Kaiser and of the German-speaking provinces—to form such an Empire would be tremendous. It would dominate Europe. I do not suggest that any force would be necessary, but there must be a break-up of the Austrian Empire at the present Emperor's death, and it may be that the appearance of force, even if it be not used, would have a powerful effect in some quarters. The Kaiser would have nothing to do with Hungary. If the scheme I have suggested is in the Kaiser's mind, no wonder he desires to be strong, without having any evil intention with regard to England.—Yours, &c., J. F. COLLIER.

Poetry.

A DANCING SONG TO THE MISTRAL WIND.

(From Nietzsche.)

WILDLY rushing, clouds outleaping,
Care-destroying, Heaven sweeping,
Mistral Wind, thou art my friend!
Surely 'twas one womb did bear us,
Surely 'twas one fate did pair us,
Fellows for a common end.

From the crags I gaily greet you,
Running fast I come to meet you,
Dancing while you pipe and sing.
How you bound across the ocean,
Unimpeded, free in motion,
Swifter than with boat or wing!

Through my dreams your whistle sounded,
Down the rocky stairs I bounded
To the golden ocean wall;
Saw you hasten swift and glorious,
Like a river, strong, victorious,
Tumbling in a waterfall.

Saw you rushing over Heaven,
With your steeds, so wildly driven,
Saw the car in which you flew;
Saw the lash that wheeled and quivered,
While the hand that held it shivered,
Urging on the steeds anew.

Saw you from your carriage swinging,
So that swifter downward springing,
Like an arrow you might go
Straight into the deep abysses,
As a sunbeam falls and kisses
Roses in the morning glow.

Dance, oh! dance on all the edges,
Wave-crests, cliffs and mountain ledges,
Ever finding dances new!
Let our knowledge be our gladness,
Let our art be sport and madness,
All that's joyful shall be true!

Let us snatch from every bower,
As we pass the fairest flower,
With some leaves to make a crown.
Then, like minstrels gaily dancing,
Saint and witch together prancing,
Let us foot it up and down.

Those who come must move as quickly
As the wind—we'll have no sickly
Crippled, withered, in our crew;
Off with hypocrites and preachers,
Proper folk and prosy teachers,
Sweep them from our heaven blue.

Sweep away all sad grimaces,
Whirl the dust into the faces
Of the dismal, sick and cold!
Hunt them from our breezy places,
Not for them the wind that braces
But for men of visage bold.

Off with those who spoil earth's gladness,
Blow away all clouds of sadness
Till our Heaven clear we see;
Let me hold thy hand, best fellow,
Till my joy like tempest bellow!
Freest thou of spirits free!

When thou partest, take a token
Of the joy thou hast awoken,
Take our wreath and fling it far;
Toss it up and catch it never,
Let it fly before thee ever,
Till it reach the furthest star.

M. D. P

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

A TRANSLATION of the complete philosophical works of Descartes has been undertaken by Miss E. S. Haldane and Mr. G. R. T. Ross, and will be published, probably in the autumn, by the Cambridge University Press. Miss Haldane is, of course, the sister of the Minister of War, and a brilliant student of philosophy. Among her other contributions to the subject are a translation of Hegel's "History of Philosophy," and a volume on "The Life and Times of Descartes." Mr. Ross is a member of the staff of Hartley University College, Southampton.

* * *

FOR most people in this country the name of Friedrich List, the economist, is vaguely confused with that of Franz Liszt, the composer. Yet Friedrich List's "National System" has been translated into English, and as originator of "scientific" Tariff Reform and of the Infant Industry argument he had a great influence in both Germany and the United States. He was Professor of Economics at Tübingen, but was too outspoken for the Government, and went to America, where he gained wealth through a coal mine. He afterwards became United States Consul at Leipzig and attempted to establish a German national fleet. Miss Margaret Hirst, a Newnham student, has just written his biography, which is based upon considerable researches in Germany, and, along with a number of translations from List's shorter writings, it will be published next week by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

* * *

No fewer than three books upon the newest of religions —Bahaism—are announced for publication during the present month. "The Splendour of God: Being Extracts from the Sacred Writing of the Bahais," with an introduction by Mr. Eric Hammond, will be the next volume in Mr. Murray's "Wisdom of the East" series, while Messrs. Cope & Fenwick have in the press "The Universal Religion —Bahaism," by Dr. Hippolyte Dreyfus, and "The Mysterious Forces of Civilisation," a work written in Persian by a Bahai philosopher, and translated into English by Johanna Dawad of Kermanshah. The Bahai creed has won a large number of Persian adherents, and its rise presents many points of interest to students of religious psychology.

* * *

A WORK called "Revolutionary Ireland and Its Settlement (1688-1714)," by the Rev. Robert Murray, now in the press, promises to be a contribution of some value to Irish history. It is largely founded on material that has not previously been published.

* * *

AMONG Mr. John Murray's announcements is "Louis Napoleon and the Napoleonic Legend," by Mr. F. A. Simpson, a book which deals in detail with the period between the fall of the First Empire and the rise of the Second. It attempts to show that the process which bridged the gulf between the two great imperialist movements in France was largely the work of Louis Napoleon himself. The work is founded upon the diplomatic correspondence between the English Foreign Office and the British Embassy in Paris, despatches from the British Legations in Switzerland, Tuscany, and other States visited by Louis Napoleon in his exile, and other similar material. Some hitherto unpublished letters of Louis Napoleon will also be included.

* * *

NEXT week will be published Mr. W. C. Braithwaite's Swarthmore Lecture on "Spiritual Guidance in the Experience of the Society of Friends." The Swarthmore Lecture was founded in memory of the wife of George Fox, and its object is to make known the spirit and fundamental principles of the Society of Friends. Mr. Braithwaite's topic is well chosen, in view of the interest now evident on all sides in religious mysticism.

* * *

A BOOK on "The Wars of Religion in France," by Mr. James Westfall Thompson, will be issued in the early autumn by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Though it treats of the Reformation period, the book does not deal with the religious conflict, except in so far as it influenced the political and economic activities of the time. A useful feature will be an appendix containing several hitherto unpublished documents from the archives of Paris and London.

* * *

THE same publisher has in preparation a work called "Town Planning in Practice: An Introduction to the Art of Designing Cities and Suburbs," by Mr. Raymond Unwin, architect of the Letchworth and Hampstead Garden Cities. Mr. Unwin traces the ancestry of town planning back to the days of the Greeks and Romans, and gives a survey of the historical tradition of the art. The book will have a large number of plans and sketches which are likely to be of great use to those interested in a movement that is rapidly gathering force and influence.

* * *

THE German publishers of Professor Harnack's "History of Christian Dogma" (J. C. B. Mohr, of Tübingen) have just announced that they are about to issue a new edition of that great work. It is now nearly twenty years since the first edition was completed, and, although it has passed through two editions since then, the time has again arrived for bringing it up to date. The work is to be issued in parts, and the first part will be ready this month.

* * *

BJORNSTJERNE BJORNSON has just completed a new drama in three acts and has forwarded the manuscript from Paris to his Copenhagen publishers. It is not often that a single firm has been simultaneously publishing for writers of so much distinction as Ibsen, Jonas Lie, Kielland, and Björnson.

* * *

"THE HUNDRED WORST BOOKS," is the title of an article which that charming essayist, Mr. Samuel McChord Crothers, is contributing to the next number of the "Atlantic Monthly." The subject is rich in possibilities, and is well suited to Mr. Crothers' whimsical humor, though we anticipate that there will be as much disagreement about the hundred worst as about the hundred best books. But why stop at a hundred?

* * *

MR. JAMES FORD RHODES whose "History of the United States" in seven volumes is one of the most important contributions made to American history in the present generation, has decided to continue the work from the year 1877, the point at which the seventh volume, published in 1906, was brought to a conclusion.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Industrial System: An Inquiry into Earned and Unearned Increment." By J. A. Hobson. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The History of England from the Accession of Anne to the Death of George II., 1702-1760." By I. S. Leadam. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Life and Times of Master John Hus." By Count Lutzow. (Dent. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Commonwealth of Australia." By the Hon. Bernhard R. Wise. (Pitman. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Bancrofts: Recollections of Sixty Years." By Marie Bancroft and Squire Bancroft. (Murray. 15s. net.)

"The Philosophy of Long Life." By Jean Finot. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Essays of Poets and Poetry." By T. H. Warren. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

"A Short History of the Royal Navy." Vol. II. 1217-1815. By David Hannay. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Parenthood and Race Culture: An Outline of Eugenics." By C. W. Saleeby. (Cassell. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Servia and the Servians." Edited by Alfred Stead. (Heinemann. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Bretons at Home." By Frances M. Gostling. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"London's Lure: An Anthology in Prose and Verse." By Helen and Lewis Melville. (Bell. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Peter Homunculus." By Gilbert Cannan. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"Much Ado About Something." By C. E. Lawrence. (Murray. 6s.)

"Vers la Verité: Sully Prudhomme, Pascal, Le Nouveau Christianisme." Par Paul Stapfer. (Paris: Editions du "Foyer Solidariste." 3 fr. 50.)

"A Travers L'Angleterre Contemporaine." Par Paul Mantoux. (Paris: Alcan. 3fr. 50.)

"Madame, Mère du Regent." Par Arvède Barine. (Paris: Hachette. 3fr. 50.)

"Les Unis." Roman. Par Edouard Rod. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

AN ILLUSTRIOUS MIDDLEMAN.*

NEARLY thirty years ago the writer of this review was staying at a riverside town on one of the great highways of China. Inland letters were then carried by postmen in the employ of private trading firms, at a charge of not more than a penny per hundred miles. The correspondence thus conveyed, rarely, if ever, went astray. Hearing that the arrival of the post was due, he went down to the landing, to find that the small boat, in which the courier had completed the last stage of his journey, had been overturned in a sudden squall of wind. The capsized boat had been brought up to the bank and the body of the poor drowned letter-carrier was stretched out with legs still in the edge of the stream and trunk on the gravel. Superstitious dread of death, or the fear of being incriminated if anyone touched the corpse before an inquiry had been made, led to this neglect. The poor fellow, however, had been relieved of the canvas letter-bag slung across his shoulders and of the belt containing valuable and important parcels. At the shop, about a hundred yards away, to which the correspondence had been consigned, letters and packages were being carefully dried over a charcoal fire in a brazier, before being delivered at the addresses they bore. The Englishman recovered his own home mail, sent under cover of a Chinese address, and went away, thinking how much more care was bestowed upon the contents of the letter-bag than upon the body of the carrier.

This was a bit of old China. Telegraph wires now run through that riverside town, and letters bearing the Imperial Maritime Customs stamp are delivered there according to the methods of the West. The Rowland Hill of this new postal system in the Far East is Sir Robert Hart, the subject of the deeply interesting biography before us. It was not the fault of this unobtrusive and indefatigable worker that a universal postal system for the Chinese Empire, and mints to give the eighteen provinces a common currency, did not form a part of the "Chefoo Convention" settlement. The Chinese were not the obstructives, but certain people who did not care for Robert Hart to do too much. In addition to this, by grants from the revenues of his department, he has lighted the Chinese coast from Newchwang to Hainan, organised an accomplished staff of international helpers, whose reports upon the trade of China, and the soils, climates, and products of some of the remoter parts of the empire are a mine of information. And as if this were not enough, the versatile Irishman has been an uncommissioned ambassador in the diplomatic background of Peking for the last thirty years, and has not infrequently carried through negotiations of supreme importance, when duly accredited ministers had failed. It is no exaggeration to say that when the New China emerges it will bear a deep imprint from the hand of Sir Robert Hart, Inspector-General of Chinese Maritime Customs. He has had a freer access to official life than the most popular of European ministers, and one might almost describe him as a nineteenth-century Marco Polo, if the name did not suggest the pet of a palace rather than the organising genius of a department.

The man whose romantic career is sketched in the book before us went out to China in 1854, as a student-interpreter under the British Superintendent of Trade. He afterwards served in the Consulates of Ningpo and Canton, resigned, and entered the Chinese Maritime Customs, of which he soon became the head. In those days the position did not mean much, but with the growth of foreign trade and the opening of new treaty ports it became the most influential appointment in the Far East.

To fill such an office for nearly half a century without a single set-back, whilst Chinese statesmen have been rising into honor and falling into disgrace, must have demanded great gifts and prodigious tactfulness. The claims of other nationalities had to be recognised in the remarkable service he organised. For the greater part of his time he was not liked by the Foreign Communities, who looked upon him as a species of adventurer in Chinese pay, not quite a patriot, and perhaps more zealous for the interests of the East than of the West. The members of the different Legations at Peking, although finding it politic to keep on good terms with him, were naturally a little jealous of his prestige; for he twice or thrice settled international disputes when a peaceful solution seemed impossible, in one case behind the backs of those commissioned to act for their country. When the long disputes over the Margery murder and the other issues had reached a stage of irritation and apparent hopelessness, and the British Minister had gone off in dudgeon to Shanghae, to await final instructions from home, the Chinese Government, within twelve hours, had sent their astute servant after him to soothe his sensibilities and make fresh proposals. He was like Ah Sin's trump-card, kept up the departmental sleeve, ready to be played at the psychological moment. Asiatics like to do things by a "peace-talker" just when the last grains of sand are running out. The Chinese rulers felt that they had in Hart a servant of great shrewdness and unwavering fidelity; and yet now and again mercenary officials of the old school hungered for the pickings of his department, and unsuccessfully tried to undermine his influence. The tasks of our viceroys and pro-consuls, of Rajah Brooke in Borneo, of Lord Cromer in Egypt, were child's play in comparison with the problems settled by this man behind the screen. Early one morning when he went out ostensibly to buy Christmas toys for the children of a friend, he negotiated a loan with the representative of a British bank for sixteen millions sterling, and no one had the slightest suspicion of what was going on. He had to think in continents, not in continents on the make, but in swarming, civilised, and vigilantly administered continents.

One is tempted to search into the reasons of his amazing success. He was no courtier. When received in farewell audience by the Emperor and the Empress Dowager, he forgot to say thanks for the costly presents which were promised him, and had to be prompted by the Chinese official at his side, just as a remiss child is told by the nurse to say "thanks" for a toy or a sweetmeat. And yet he had an instinctive sense of courtesy. He refused to set foot in the palace at Peking and in the Temple of Heaven when those wonderful buildings were occupied by the Allies and were the show-places of the hour. He loved peace like a Confucianist, and began his work as a great go-between by bringing together General Gordon and Li Hung Chang, after Gordon had been incensed by the treacherous execution of the Tae Ping princes. In the best sense of the word he was "slim." There was a Dutch strain in his blood, which, perhaps, helped him to habits of reserve and deliberation. Slow in speech, he often failed to make his meaning quite clear, but always performed at last more than he had promised. Whilst the Chinese are, at certain times, great gossips, they nevertheless worship at the shrine of the silent man. His power of self-restraint was almost imperturbable in its smoothness. He abounded in personal kindnesses, and his magnanimity towards his Chinese masters, when they strangely left him to his fate in the Legations after nearly fifty years of faithful and priceless service, is a phenomenon that we cannot quite fathom. He commiserated the Empress Dowager, made himself one of her apologists after the return from flight, and, unlike one or two good and notable men who had no special claim upon the gratitude and protection of the Chinese throne, has uttered no word of complaint or recrimination. No wonder the ruling authorities of the Chinese empire have recognised in him qualities of character that come near to their historic ideals. There was something in his temperament which made him half a Chinaman. His indulgent self-adaptation to Chinese ways through a long life-time all but completed the process, without perhaps destroying the essential virtues inherited from his own race.

In late, as in early life, he came into contact with Sir Harry Parkes and Sir Thomas Wade, who as diplomatists at Eastern courts were not entirely successful. Parkes was a frank, chivalrous, high-souled gentleman, who went by short paths to just goals. He was the idol of the British communities for many years after the second Chinese war. But he was not at all inclined to allow the Chinese to palaver according to their wont, and, honored and beloved by his own countrymen, he was disliked by the Chinese. Sir Thomas Wade had just views, strong humanitarian instincts, insight into Chinese idiosyncrasies, mixed with much abstract charity, but his temper was pungent and explosive. His fits of temper are gibbetted in at least one memorial to the Chinese Throne. Hart was patient, shrewd, tranquil, and no wonder the Chinese accepted him as "the honest broker," without spot or blemish. After he had settled the dispute with France by direct negotiations at Paris, carried on through his London agent, the British Government offered this ever-victorious negotiator the post of British Minister at Peking, which he declined, upon finding that the Chinese Government was dismayed at the prospect of losing their old servant. There would have been no Boxer outbreak and no siege of the Legations if Sir Robert Hart had accepted the post he was offered.

* "Life of Sir Robert Hart." By Juliet Bredon. Hutchinson. 6s. net.

From one standpoint Hart would have been a better man, although perhaps less acceptable to some of his Chinese chiefs, if he had shown an intenser passion for progress. His early moral and religious enthusiasms passed through a process of unhappy glaciation in the days of his Consular service. When there were few voices to denounce the opium trade he was silent, and he had no public witness to bear to the work of the missionaries till it became evident they were to be factors in the regeneration of the Chinese civilisation. He put undue emphasis upon the finance of his department, and twenty-eight years ago, when the uncle of Yuan Shih Kai brought forward a scheme for the abolition of the opium trade, he advised caution from the revenue standpoint. The present-day native reformers, whilst recognising his disinterestedness, look upon him as belated in his views and methods.

Miss Bredon's sketch of her uncle's life and work fills in with many interesting details the broad outlines of a career already well known to the Anglo-Chinese public. The book is written with grace and pardonable admiration for one who has been a hero within his own family circle, as well as a notable figure in the history of the Far East. She trips now and again in her explanation of Chinese phrases, as also in ascribing the expression about "the desert blossoming" to a Psalmist. An interesting story is told of Hart missing Wade from the Legation Church when the negotiations which finally took shape in the Chefoo Convention were trembling in the balance. Suspecting that things were going wrong, he sought out the British Minister in the afternoon, and suggested a new interpretation of a phrase in a Chinese despatch which had seemed to make agreement hopeless. As far as outsiders can judge Wade was the greater Chinese scholar, although he may have stuck to the least hopeful interpretation of a phrase in a fit of irritation and disgust. When Sir Robert Hart received a decoration from the Chinese Government his ancestors were ennobled, according to official custom. Miss Bredon says the Chinese argue a man's forefathers must have had many good qualities if the descendant rises to honor. This is true in part, but the vital reason for the ennoblement of posthumous ancestors is connected with the filial cult. It would be unfitting for a son to worship ancestors of a rank inferior to his own.

---

SIDELIGHTS ON THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.*

Here is abundance of lively and authentic documents on the people and times of the first French Revolution. Did Napoleon, penniless in Paris, glad of a dinner, and, perhaps, even a coat from Barras, propose marriage to that amusing and very full-blown actress and adventuress, Mlle. Montansier? Who was the second Mme. Fouquier-Tinville, and how came Tinville himself to authority during the Terror? What was the true behavior of Mlle. de Robespierre to her brother Maximilien? How far may we credit the reiterated declarations of old Mme. Simon that she and her husband smuggled the Little Dauphin out of the Temple? What was the old age of Tallien? In what circumstances did Roland commit suicide? Was Gamain, the locksmith, lying when he said that Louis XVI. had tried to poison him? How fared Santerre (Carlyle's "sonorous brewer") in his declining days? How died Zamor, the famous black dwarf of Mme. Dubarry, whom princes had flattered? What were the real crimes of Le Bon at Arras and Cambrai? These are but a few of the questions presented by M. Lenôtre, that indefatigable delver into archives and explorer of historic mansions. The French title of his new work, "Vieilles maisons, vieux papiers," gives an even better notion of the contents than the one which Mr. Frederic Lees has chosen for his admirable English version.

The reader whom the subject interests will peruse these volumes at his leisure, and we hardly think he will need advice of ours to leave no chapter unread. All we can do here is to offer certain points in some that seem to us the most noteworthy. The fate of the Little Dauphin, Louis XVII., is still to some extent in controversy. Reasons have been shown in these pages for the belief that he was either done slowly to death in the Temple or (M. Turquan's supposition) was murdered there by Simon. The half-fledged Republic had very strong motives for getting rid of the child, and no especial motive for squeamishness in accomplishing this end. But did the Simons achieve the little king's release? M. Lenôtre devotes one of his longest chapters to the question, but admits in a postscript that he has made "no pretence whatever of solving the problem of the death in the Temple or of the survival of the son of Louis XVI." It was under the Empire that the widow Simon began first to make her revelations, but the days were not propitious, and they were received with silence. Tales of the Terror were out of fashion. Different was it, however, when the Bourbons returned. Visitors flocked to see the old woman in her closet in the Hospital for Incurables, and "until a fit of asthmatical coughing interrupted her narrative, she chattered unceasingly." By-and-bye the authorities intervened and the widow Simon was interrogated at the Ministry of Police:—

> "She declared her entire conviction that the prince did not die in the Temple Tower . . . but when pressed to explain the circumstances of his escape she began to be reticent."

In brief, we have to choose between the old woman's gossip in her bedroom in the hospital, and her officially recorded declaration, which gives no details whatever as to how the prince escaped. M. Lenôtre thinks she spoke the truth, but the fact remains that her meagre official statement is valueless for any purpose of argument. So far, therefore, as Mme. Simon is concerned, the story stands where it did.

The Revolution brought fame or notoriety to sundry persons who in a less troubled era would have died unheard of. One is tempted sometimes to the rather idle inquiry what fate would Napoleon's have been had he first entered the arena at the age, say, when he was crowned Emperor. A Danton, it is easy to think, might have won distinction under any order; a Mirabeau was framed by nature for the rôle of tribune of a people in the state of oppugnation. Marat was a man of considerable attainments and desperate convictions. Robespierre (who, by the way, was of Irish descent) had both taste and talent; he would have made a very decent and successful notary in a provincial town. But what a poor starveling rogue seems Fouquier-Tinville, whose place is nevertheless with the mighty under the Terror! In connection with his second wife, M. Lenôtre tells us something of Tinville's pre-revolutionary history. When the storm broke over France, Tinville, an out-at-elbows lawyer, was at his wits' end for a living. He was, says M. Lenôtre, quoting from the "Famous Trials" of Desessarts:

> "a disgraced procurator, and a past master at conducting a case, however unjust it might be, through all the mazes of chicanery. His life was divided between this shameful, but lucrative, charlatanism and the filthy pleasures of licentiousness."

This was Fouquier-Tinville's position and reputation in the autumn of 1792; yet, in March, 1793, when the revolutionary tribunal was created, he was installed in the office of public accuser. His is one of the strangest and most repulsive figures in that pandemonium which was at Paris at the end of the eighteenth century. It is necessary to remember that the whole period of the Revolution is crowded with needy fortune-hunters, some of them Paris-bred, others the protégés of wealthy godfathers who had sent them up as scholars from the provinces, who, when the old world had begun to crack, were on the look-out and ready for anything in the capital. Fouquier-Tinville is conspicuous in this parcel of hungry adventurers; Hébert ("Père Duchesne"), d'Herbois add themselves naturally to the ignominious list, which could be extended to a most nauseating length. Fouché, the regicide, who scraped with an infinitely clever cunning through the Revolution, and must have been a little amazed to find himself a Duke under the Empire, is another man of the era whose rise and progress are a tale past all invention. Some few persons in this dreadful roll (Tinville, Hébert, and Barère among them) have come down to posterity as images of an infamy almost as spotless as Iago's. Macaulay's essay on Barère will be remembered; its exaggeration is not so great. Other names, meriting all execration, have been less widely bruited, in part because the exploits of their owners were removed from the theatre of Paris, whereon attention has been fixed. It is but here and there, for instance, that Joseph Le Bon has had his fair measure of chastisement.

* "Romances on the French Revolution." From the French of G. Lenôtre by Frederic Lees. Illustrated. Heinemann. Two vols. 20s. net.

The slaughter of the Swiss Guards at the Tuileries, the September massacres in the prisons, have stormed the sensibilities of two or three generations of readers. Certain episodes in the provinces, such as Carrier's noyades in the South, have had their share of notice. But not all the provincial work has been scrutinised as closely as this, and the hecatombs of Le Bon at Arras and Cambrai were on the way to oblivion. In some twenty poignant pages M. Lenôtre restores them. They form, as he says, "one of the most terrifying chapters in history."

Le Bon was an ex-Oratorian, and one of the first of the renegade priests who had married. With his wife, "Mimie," a red-haired strapping fury, he went as the Convention's commissioner to Arras. There were mock trials and wholesale executions, which were arranged as a spectacle:—

> "There was a gallery for the spectators, and a refreshment bar at the foot of the guillotine. When the massacre was over, the executioner and the bailiffs sometimes amused themselves by disposing the nude and decapitated bodies, thrown upon the gory pavement, in obscene or ridiculous attitudes."

In the evening Madame Mimie gave parties, the refreshments, china, and silver at which had been "seized at the houses of those executed on the previous day"; and if Madame had been prevented from witnessing the day's guillotings, she would ask: "How many calves' heads have we to-night?"

From Arras the apostles of the Republic journeyed to Cambrai. At the proceedings of the tribunal, Mimie placed herself beside her husband, opposite the jurors, to whom, after each examination, she indicated her opinion by passing her hand across her neck:—

> "From the time the first victim left the prison until the last head had fallen, the great bell of the town—formerly the King's—solemnly tolled. A crowd of children stood around the guillotine, and, as at Arras, there was music, with a theatrical performance, immediately after the executions."

"Brothers," cries Carlyle, in one of his dramatic apostrophes, "your wrath is cruel!" Le Bon's own head fell amid the Thermidor, but for years after the Terror the people of Cambrai were haunted by the memory of the "hyena" his wife.

The story of Gamain, the locksmith, is not like this. Gamain was merely one of the weak-hearts of the day, who denounced the King to preserve his own life. When Louis XVI. was kept almost a prisoner at the Tuileries he was sorely in need of a safe place for his papers. He bethought him of Gamain, a locksmith at Versailles, who had long been in the royal service. Gamain, fetched secretly to the Tuileries, contrived a cupboard in a panel of the King's bedchamber, Louis himself holding a candle while the man worked. Shortly after the sack of the Tuileries the locksmith revealed the hiding-place to Roland, and on the documents that were taken from it Louis was brought to trial. Gamain then declared that, when he had finished making the cupboard, the King gave him "a large glass of wine," which he drained. On his way home he was seized with pains, and at Versailles lay five months in bed, paralysed in all his limbs. This tenebrous romance lived on into the nineteenth century. "Bibliophile Jacob" (Paul Lacroix) wrote a little book on it, in which Gamain is picked up in agony on the road to Versailles by "a rich, mysterious Englishman." Here Marie Antoinette plays the part of the assassin, and to make matters a trifle more certain, a slice of poisoned cake is added to the poisoned chalice.

But Gamain was neither poisoned nor paralysed. Twelve days after his interview with Louis XVI. he was in his place in the general council of the Commune, of which he was a member, and continued to attend the sittings. Gamain, like Falstaff, was "a coward on instinct," and sheer cowardice had inspired his dreadful lie. Despite the Greek poet, some lies live to be old, and in the suburbs of malicious fiction Gamain's may still survive.

In the very curious chapter on Charlotte Robespierre, we could wish that M. Lenôtre had given less heed to the "Memoirs" which bear her name. Are they not flat forgery? The story of Napoleon and Mlle. Montansier is one of the most amusing in the book, but we decline to believe that Bonaparte had any stuff of marriage in his mind on that adventure. He was, to be sure, in search of a wife long before he encountered Josephine; but Mlle. Montansier, of the theatres, was fat, frowsy, and sixty-five years of age. The authority for the legend is Barras, and on the unsupported testimony of Barras we know what reliance may be placed!

---

THE ROMANCE OF YOUTH.*

In "Peter Homunculus" Mr. Cannan interests us by his treatment of an exacting subject—youth with its growing pains and incurable self-consciousness—but we remain doubtful in what degree our interest is a plain testimony to his art. A youthful work may affect us much as a day in spring when the sun is over-glaring, the wind chill, the fields rawly green, while still from all this crudity and glare floats the magical spring atmosphere. Youth is in itself a virtue, however irritating it may be to its representatives to be reminded constantly that it is the turmoil in their heads and the bloom on their cheeks that attract all who must look backwards or outside themselves to find it. And the very basis of the charm that youth has for age, seems, indeed, to lie in youth's right to be egotistic and excessive.

The originality of Mr. Cannan's novel lies in his endeavor to trace his hero's spiritual development through the stages of boyhood, hobbledehoyhood, and early manhood, while ruthlessly exposing youth's fatuities, torturing self-consciousness, and the conceit that serves it as armor against the indifference of the crushing world. The subject is difficult to treat, for when we are in these immature stages we cannot pronounce on them, and when they are outgrown they seem to us confused and hazy. And it is in its artistic proportions and perspective that "Peter Homunculus" is weak. The novel has intellectual breadth and vigor, but much of the detail is casual and scrappy, and the changes in Peter's outlook are hastily indicated and carelessly flung at us.

The first few chapters that introduce Peter, the gawky lad of promise, as shop-boy and assistant in the second-hand book shop of old "gentleman" Cooper in Shaftesbury Avenue, are more ingenious than convincing, but these first pages, as, indeed, all that follow, thrill with that passionate aching hunger of youth when the horizons of life seem illimitable. Youth's impotence and youth's potentialities amidst the struggle and reek of London—this, indeed, is real romance, and Mr. Cannan is, rightly, not afraid of picturesque incidents, as in the pages on old Cooper's forgotten love-story, by which youth's sensitive egotism is happily reflected. Old Cooper dies, leaving Peter heir to his little all, and the lad of nineteen becomes a student at King's College, picking up a circle of friends, chief among whom are Parson Scott, his wife, and daughter, Matty, Murray Wilson, the novelist, and Mary Dugdale, the young "star" actress, "a woman worn by flattery, hungering for love." These characters, Miss Dugdale excepted, are sketched with a lightness yet vagueness of touch that leaves us in doubt as to whether the author has a strong gift for characterisation. Mary Dugdale, however, arrests us, and the sweet, subtle charm of this woman is rendered, along with the finest shades of emotional mood. Mary is separated from her husband, Bertram Bond, not a very convincing figure, and for a network of reasons, not fully explained, she and the man she loves, the enigmatic Murray Wilson, cannot come together. We are a little suspicious of the reality of this strong, silent man who smokes innumerable pipes and conceals deep, incommunicable emotions, but Peter's part as the infatuated, boyish admirer of Mary Dugdale is to draw her and Murray Wilson together, and the success of the book lies in the analysis of Peter's pure-hearted devotion and gauche jealousy in contact with his divinity. The real stuff of Romance is here in the day-dreams and moody egoism and youthful ferment in the blood of arrogant youth, youth which collapses like a pricked bladder at a touch, and then soars aloft, inflated at a favoring breath. To paint this ferment while exposing the illusions and conceit of youth to merciless analysis is the author's central motive, and this double aim is responsible for a certain jerkiness that suggests the influence of Meredith. While Mr. Cannan takes Peter's moods seriously enough, we find ourselves questioning whether his hero's self-consciousness is not over insisted upon. Perhaps not, for the modern young Englishman is a strange fowl with the perpetual contest between his senses and his reason. He cannot kiss a girl, as Peter kisses Matty, without inward speculations as to whether it is "It," and it is true that youth is always fearfully self-critical and bristling with half-fledged ideals. Its adorable softness, introspection, and its difficulty of finding its place in the world, when all the power of joy seems at its hand, make youth often a period of tragic waste. Something is wrong in the civilisation which deprives youth of its spontaneity, and stunts its emotional freedom and growth. In his main thesis Mr. Cannan has succeeded better than in its subsidiary parts, which are occasionally thin in texture and uncertain in drawing. All the love passages are, however, very well done, and the passages on children show an individual quality.

* "Peter Homunculus." By Gilbert Cannan. Heinemann. 6s.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Anyone who has once known the charm of "the Coast" will welcome the book called "We Two in West Africa," by Major and Mrs. Guggisberg (Heinemann, 12s. 6d. net). It is another instance of the advantage the new-comer has in describing the scenes and life of far-off lands. Major Guggisberg himself has been known for some years to all travellers and white residents on the Coast on account of his official work upon the survey and the numerous wanderings it entailed. He knows everything that is to be known about the country, but probably he would never have written a word if he had remained alone. In a year or two the strangest sights appear quite natural, and after two voyages out the Coaster will not look up from his book or cards to see the negroes swarming round the ship in their "dug-outs" off Liberia or Sekundi. But Mrs. Guggisberg was fresh to it all, and, happily for the reader, she does the talking and description in the book, while her husband keeps the knowledge straight and adds such serious information as is wanted. The result is a very accurate and charming account of the ordinary life of British officials on the Gold Coast, together with a gay description of a longish official tour inland by Coomassie, and through the uplands and forest round by Bompata and Abetife to Accra. Gay is the right word, though people do not usually connect gaiety with a country where the damp heat keeps everyone in a perpetual sweat and the staple conversation is of fever and death. Still, even the horror and danger of the country have a rather exhilarating effect on a brave spirit, and Mrs. Guggisberg is never anything but gay. Since Mary Kingsley left the world the sadder for her loss, we think no better book has been written on native and British life upon the Coast. Though speaking from a knowledge of Central rather than of West Africa, the reviewer would question just one small point. The writers mention that an orderly at Abetife had his teeth filed into points, and like most writers, they attribute the filing to cannibal habits or to the marking of slaves. But in Central Africa, south of the Equator, the reviewer has found the various ways of filing or chipping of teeth simply used for tribal marks; and if there is any other origin he is inclined to attribute them to imitations of a totem—a sharp-toothed fish, a crocodile, or even a hippo. Mrs. Guggisberg remarks that when the orderly laughed his mouth looked like that of a crocodile, and that was probably the precise object of himself or his ancestors.

Mr. William Toynbee, in his "Glimpses of the Twenties" (Constable, 12s. 6d. net), goes to the period immediately succeeding that dealt with in his former racy volume, "Vignettes of the Regency." The present book is, like its predecessor, agreeable reading of a light and gossipy kind, though Mr. Toynbee's dislike of the Whigs is more than once needlessly obtruded, and such judgments as that Fox's "violent whiggery was in large measure the consequence of his services having been summarily dispensed with as a Tory office-holder," and that "when his record is dispassionately considered, it is difficult to credit him with any really high qualities either in his private or his political capacity," are nothing less than absurd. Even the bitterest Tory cannot deny him the quality of a great debater. Burke, at the time of their quarrel, said that he was the most wonderful debater the world ever saw. Mr. Toynbee ought not to have allowed political prejudice to blind him to admitted facts. On the other hand, he is inclined to add his share to the white-washing of George IV., which two or three recent writers have attempted. No man is less deserving of the effort. Other figures of whom Mr. Toynbee gives us glimpses are Canning, Lord Liverpool, Eldon, Castlereagh—with whom he deals fairly impartially—Goderich, Lady Jersey, and the Duke of Wellington. The book, as we have said, is written in a pleasant and easy style, but we regret that its author has not held the balance more evenly in his historical judgments.

* * *

"A Holiday in Connemara," by Mr. Stephen Gwynn (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net), is a delightful record of a stay of "something over a fortnight" which Mr. Gwynn spent in West Connaught. The book is a medley of history, geography, descriptions of scenery, fishing incidents, conversations with the people, and reflections upon their state and prospects, all woven together in the style of which Mr. Gwynn's preceding volumes on Ireland have shown him to be a master. "I have written of Connemara con amore," he says, and every visitor to that paradise of the angler will agree that to have done otherwise would be churlish. The sport is excellent and he who follows it will find himself surrounded by magnificent scenery and will come into contact with the best type of Irish peasant—genial, industrious, hospitable, and full of interest in the sportsman's doings. There are besides several ecclesiastical ruins on the shores of Lough Corrib and Lough Mask, while the social condition of the people, just at the stage when the landlord and all that he stands for is on the point of disappearing, gives a special human interest to the district. The English tourist will find many useful hints as well as entertaining glimpses of the real Ireland in Mr. Gwynn's pages. "A Holiday in Connemara" is one of the best books of its type that we have seen.

* * *

It is a trifle more than five years since the United States Government came to an arrangement with the Province of Panama, whereby the ownership and control of the Panama Canal Zone passed completely into its hands, and the long and troubled history of the Canal entered on its latest phase. The American management of the undertaking is duly appreciated by Professor Vaughan Cornish in his volume on "The Panama Canal and Its Makers" (Fisher Unwin, 5s. net), which embodies a concise and informative survey of the works, based on material gathered during a recent stay on the Isthmus. The Panama question, it is interesting to recall, existed in the sixteenth century, when the possibility of a shorter route to the East engaged the attention of European navigators. With the opening of the Suez Canal, the necessity for a Panama Canal almost vanished so far as Europe was concerned; but, correspondingly, its importance to the States became greater than ever, the Suez Canal not benefiting American commerce, but rather placing it at a disadvantage by the benefits conferred on European nations. Hence the enormous amount of money and labor that is now being spent on the Panama undertaking; it will cost more than the aggregate expenditure on the Suez Canal and the Manchester Ship and Kiel Canals, and will take another six years to complete. Professor Cornish gives a more or less detailed account of the engineering operations, in regard to which he does not omit a tribute to the French engineers employed on De Lesseps' notorious undertaking of 1879.

NOW READY. THE FIRST VOLUME OF

THE COUNTY COASTS SERIES.

The Norfolk and Suffolk Coast.

By W. A. DUTT. With about 40 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

In "The Norfolk and Suffolk Coast" the author deals with the history and romance of coast life, telling true tales of famous shipwrecks, deeds of life-saving, smuggling adventures, and landings and defeats of foreign foes. Making a peregrination of the coast from Landguard Fort to the border of Lincolnshire, he describes the towns and villages, the life and means of livelihood of the fisherfolk, the changes the coast has undergone in consequence of the gaining or retreating of the sea, the striking natural features of the coastline, and the wild life of the creeks, bays, estuaries, cliffs, beaches, and salt marshes. Places and objects of archæological interest, such as prehistoric and Roman camps, castles, monasteries, and noteworthy churches and old houses, are also described, and literary and other associations are not neglected. Decayed or vanished towns or seaports, such as Orford, Dunwich, Cley, and Blakeney, are specially noticed, and something is said about the lives and adventures of Cavendish, Shovel, Vancouver, and other famous Norfolk and Suffolk admirals and navigators.

THE PLACE OF ANIMALS IN HUMAN THOUGHT. By Countess MARTINENGO-CESARESCO. With Photogravure Frontispiece with 32 other Illustrations. 12s.6d. net.

The book, while it is the outcome of years of study and research, will appeal not only to folk-lorists and students of religion, but to the general reader, particularly if he be a lover of animals.

THE BURIED CITY OF KENFIG. By THOMAS GRAY. With a Map and Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

There is a fascination about a lost town. This work is an attempt to snatch from the past something about the town of Kenfig in South Wales, long since covered up by the sand-fiend.

HAILEYBURY COLLEGE

By Rev. L. S. Milford. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

THE STORY OF THE NATIONS.

TURKEY. With a New Chapter on Recent Events. By STANLEY LANE-POOLE, M.A., Litt.D. With Maps and many Illustrations. 5s.

HOLLAND. By Professor J. E. THOROLD ROGERS. Fifth Edition. With 57 Illustrations and Maps. 5s.

THE BOOK OF THE HOUR.

TURKEY IN REVOLUTION. By CHARLES RODEN BUXTON. With a Map and 33 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

The Daily Chronicle says:—"Mr. Buxton had an opportunity of seeing and hearing things in the best quarter for information, and the result, whether or not it be history as time will finally write, is a very vivid, picturesque account of the transformation of Turkey."

OLIVE IN ITALY.

"Mr. Fisher Unwin has introduced many new writers of good fiction in his 'First Novel' series. We venture to think that Moray Dalton will take high rank in the list. 'Olive in Italy' is vivid and picturesque, and the writer has a rare sense of the inevitable nature of all real tragedy. The name 'Moray Dalton' on the cover of a second book should ensure an instant welcome."—Pall Mall Gazette.

OLIVE IN ITALY. By MORAY DALTON. 6s. A new volume in the "First Novel" Library.

The wise Traveller uses

BAEDEKER'S GUIDES.

Now published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

THE INTERNATIONAL.

MAY. PRICE 1s. NET.

Principal Contents.

Social Insurance. By the EDITOR.

State Regulation of Wages. E. R. PEASE.

Some Economic Aspects of the Women's Suffrage Movement. By REV. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A.

The Origin of German Naval Enthusiasm. By GERMANICUS.

THE "CHATS" SERIES. NEW VOLUME.

CHATS ON ENGLISH EARTHENWARE.

By ARTHUR HAYDEN, Author of "Chats on English China," &c. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 80 full-page Plates. 5s. net.

A companion volume to "Chats on English China." This practical guide deals with the rise and progress of earthenware in England.

SHILLING EDITIONS OF FAMOUS NOVELS.

SOME EMOTIONS AND A MORAL AND THE SINNER'S COMEDY. By JOHN OLIVER HOBBES.

A STUDY IN TEMPTATIONS AND A BUNDLE OF LIFE. By JOHN OLIVER HOBBES.

DREAMS. By OLIVE SCHREINER.

THE BLUE LAGOON. By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

MEMOIR OF THE RIGHT HON. COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY, P.C., M.P. Edited by WALTER DURNFORD. Large crown 8vo, with Illustrations, 3s. 6d. net.

NOTES FROM A PAINTER'S LIFE. Including the Founding of Two Galleries. By C. E. HALLÉ. With Illustrations. Square demy 8vo, 6s. net.

SCENES AND PORTRAITS. By FREDERICK MANNING, Author of "The Vigil of Brunhild." Crown 8vo, 6s.

Three New 6s. Novels.

THE SHUTTLES OF THE LOOM. By K. M. EDGE (Mrs. Caulfeild), Author of "Ahana."

MUCH ADO ABOUT SOMETHING. By C. E. LAWRENCE, Author of "Pilgrimage."

THE ROMANCE OF A PLAIN MAN. By ELLEN GLASGOW, Author of "The Battle Ground," "The Deliverance," &c.

AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF

THE EARLY HISTORY OF THE CHURCH. By the ABBÉ L. DUCHESNE. Demy 8vo, 9s. net.

This important History has hitherto only been available in the original. The author is well known in England for the interest he has shown on the subject of Anglican orders, and his opinion on historical questions is absolutely trustworthy and helpful.

A Second Edition.

CAVALRY IN FUTURE WARS. By His Excellency Lieut.-General FREDERICK VON BERNHARDI, Commander of the Seventh Division of the German Army. Translated by CHARLES SYDNEY GOLDMAN. With an Introduction by Lieut.-General SIR JOHN FRENCH, K.C.M.G., K.C.B., G.C.V.O. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST

Memoir of the Late General the Right Hon. Sir HENRY REDVERS BULLER, G.C.B., P.C., V.C., &c.

With Three Portraits and a Facsimile Letter, demy 8vo, 3s. 6d. net,

SIR REDVERS BULLER.

By LEWIS BUTLER.

Daily Chronicle.—"This sketch of his life is very welcome . . . It is both informing and readable, and it has a revealing personal touch, not to speak of stories."

The Great Tariff Reformer.

READY MAY 18th.—Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

LIFE OF FRIEDRICH LIST,

And Selections from His Writings.

By MARGARET HIRST,

late Scholar of Newnham College, Cambridge. With an Introduction by F. W. HIRST, Editor of the Economist.

On MAY 18th.—Small demy 8vo, 9s. net.

THE ENGLISH WOMAN,

Studies in Her Psychic Evolution.

By DAVID STAARS,

Translated and Abridged by J. M. E. BROWNLOW.

Englishwoman.—"A patient, accurate, fearless, and well-balanced inquisition into the mental and spiritual development of women in England. M. David Staars has the penetration and wit to state quite fairly and plainly those situations which often remain incomprehensible to men, but to which most women hold the key."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

While the great Panama scandal is not yet forgotten, in France, at any rate, much of the excavating and other work accomplished by French workmen affords eloquent testimony of what might have been accomplished under fairer auspices. Not less interesting is the sketch of the present labor conditions and that of the successful fight against yellow fever and malaria. On the engineering side there are some instructive comparisons drawn between this and other notable achievements in canal construction, while the merits of the "high-level" and "tide-level" schemes, of which the former was ultimately selected, are debated with technical knowledge and insight. A lucid map of the "Zone" and a number of small photographic blocks complete this exposition of a mighty enterprise.

* * *

From old books and manuscripts chiefly at the Record Office and the British Museum, the author of the "Life of Sir Kenelm Digby" has compiled a short biography of the daughter of Sir Edward Coke who became the wife of Viscount Purbeck, Buckingham's brother. The title of the volume is "The Curious Case of Lady Purbeck: A Scandal of the XVIIth Century" (Longmans, 6s. net), and it throws some interesting light upon the bitter rivalry, which extended to love as well as to law, between Coke and Bacon. Coke married his daughter against her wishes to Sir John Villiers in the hope of winning over Buckingham, and thus regaining his position at Court. Sir John became insane after being given the title of Viscount Purbeck, and Lady Purbeck gave birth to a child of whom Sir Robert Howard was the father. The case was brought before the High Commission, and Lady Purbeck was sentenced to do penance, barefooted and clad in a white sheet, in the chapel of the Savoy. She managed to escape, and later on was pardoned, and returned to live with her husband who had then regained his reason. The story is a dramatic one, and some writer of fiction would be well advised to adopt the author's suggestion and use the material now brought to light for an historical romance.

* * *

The latest volume in the "Cambridge Historical Series" treats of "Italy from 1494 to 1790" (Cambridge University Press, 5s. 6d. net), and has been written by Mrs. H. M. Vernon, the author of a biography of Cosimo de' Medici in the "Foreign Statesmen" Series. The usefulness of the work for the general reader is somewhat marred by the plan adopted. Mrs. Vernon rightly says that the history of Italy during the period falls naturally into two parts, 1494 to 1559 when Italy for a time became "the focussing point" of European history, and 1559 to 1790 when she sank into obscurity except for a few short intervals. The first of these periods is dismissed in about seventy pages—hardly sufficient for a reader totally unacquainted with its history—and Mrs. Vernon gives up the rest of the book to the later years which have been neglected by most preceding historians. With the reservation we have made the book is a contribution of great value to Italian history. Foreign policy, domestic affairs, and social and intellectual progress are all handled with firmness and breadth. We may notice particularly the author's skilful treatment of the intricate relations between Italy and France in the reign of Louis XIV. The book is furnished with maps and a good index.

* * *

The twenty-one "Stories from the Greek Legends" (Werner Laurie, 3s. 6d. net), which C. Gasquoine Hartley (Mrs. Gillichan) has collated and illustrated with a few reproductions of classic statuary, make a pleasant little volume for young readers. Older and more critical ones may perhaps complain because it is not explained that the names of the Greek gods had their correlatives in Latin, and because sentences like "Father Zeus, who was afterwards called Jupiter," and "Venus was born from the foam of the sea, and for this reason she was often called Aphrodite" might be misinterpreted; but after all, the stories are the thing, and with the telling of these pretty legends no serious fault can be found. The authoress has already earned reputation as the collaborator of Mr. Calvert in the "Spanish Series," and the present volume reveals her literary talent in a new and graceful light.

We noticed M. Edmond Lepelletier's "Paul Verlaine: His Life—His Work," at some length in June, 1907, when it appeared in French. It has now been translated into English and published by Mr. Werner Laurie. Miss E. M. Lang, who has done the work of translation, has produced an easy and faithful version, though she now and then keeps too close to the original for good English. M. Lepelletier's work is the only biography of Verlaine we have, and it has the further merit of being written by one of the poet's most intimate friends.

---

The Week in the City.

The issue of London County stock is the most interesting event of the week in the City. It is the third made since the present Council was elected, and the terms obtained are naturally more favorable than in either of the two previous years. The Council has been offering 2¼ millions of 3½ per cent. stock at 102, and the applications have been so numerous that the money market is left comparatively short. Imaginative statisticians have been busy calculating exacty how many times the issue was over-subscribed, but as some say a hundred times, some fifty, and some a mere twenty, the safest course is to assume that the 2¼ millions have been amply covered. In the stock itself there does not seem to be anything especially attractive; it is a good security yielding less than 3½ per cent.; but it gives a turn on the existing London County 3½ per cents., and no doubt dealers had for that reason sold short of the old stock and so were anxious to make sure of an allotment of the new. A firm, but not an extravagant, premium has been established. Meanwhile the Stock Exchange has been remarkably busy with its settlement, for the account that ended this week was quite the busiest of the year. The capitalist, "crushed," "harrassed," and "overwhelmed," by the Budget, has evidently made up his mind to die game and increase his commitments up to the end. Anyhow the volume of buying is extremely large, and both in the investment and speculative markets prices are buoyant. The particular favorites of the week are Chartereds, which, both in London and the Provinces, are being dealt in on a great scale. Rumors are going round to account for the buying, but what truth they may contain no one exactly knows. Kaffirs generally are very strong, and there is so far no sign of the rubber boom coming to an end. It is to be hoped that the people who are rushing in to buy now will not burn their fingers. Money rates are rather firmer and discounts a shade up, but the movement seems to be due to temporary causes.

Progress on the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. E. J. Chamberlin, general manager of the Grand Trunk Pacific, after a six weeks' tour of inspection of the new road, has stated publicly that by next autumn the Grand Trunk Pacific will have 1,365 miles of completed road. Every bridge between Winnipeg and Edmonton has been completed, and the track is now being laid on the last miles, which constitutes the one gap between the two cities. This work will be pushed rapidly and Mr. Chamberlin says there is little doubt of the road being completed by June from the Red River to Saskatchewan. Fifty stations are now under construction between Winnipeg and Wainwright. Before the summer is over some 200 miles of branch lines in Alberta and Saskatchewan will also be completed and ready to carry freight and passengers in the autumn. All this means more wheat from Canada.

Lucellum.

IMPERIAL

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION 1909

AT THE

GREAT WHITE CITY

Shepherd's Bush London, W.

Enlarged Grounds. New Buildings.
Novel Attractions and Entertainments.

Thursday Next at 3 p.m.
GRAND OPENING CEREMONY and Dedication of the New Imperial Pavilion
by His Grace The Duke of Argyll.

Grand Chorus and Six Military Bands.

Admission from 2 to 5 p.m. 5s. After 5 p.m., 1s.

SPECIAL SEASON TICKETS

including admission to The Opening Ceremony and all other occasions, also to seats in the Concert Arena Elite Gardens.

Ladies or Gentlemen £1 1s. Children 10s. 6d.

NOW ON SALE.

at the Exhibition and all Ticket Agencies.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

BOOKSELLERS.

10/6 FOR 5/6 Post Free. ABROAD 6/-

THE VARIORUM REFERENCE BIBLE

With Footnotes giving a Digest of the Various Readings and Renderings.
Edited by Cheyne, Clark, Driver, Goodwin and Sanday.
Handsome Morocco Yapp. Specimen Page post free.
THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'
BOOKSELLERS.
NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS AT SPECIAL PRICES
Catalogue No. 354. May, 1909. Now ready.
CONTAINING MANY NEW AND ATTRACTIVE LINES IN PUBLISHERS REMAINDERS
WILLIAM GLAISHER, Limited, (Remainder and Discount Booksellers),
265, High Holborn, London, (and 14, George Street, Croydon)
The books are on view at both addresses.

The Daily News

is now printed simultaneously in London and Manchester.

This means that Liberals all England over are able to get the representative Liberal organ every morning at the same time as their local daily.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

London Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.
Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

FIVE LECTURES ON CO-EDUCATION.

By ENNIS RICHMOND, Principal of West Heath School for Boys and Girls, Hampstead.

1. A NATURAL EDUCATION.
2. FOR OUR DAUGHTERS.
3. TWO ASPECTS OF CO-EDUCATION.
4. CO-EDUCATION AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
5. WHY NOT CO-EDUCATION?

Price Threepence each, post free.

Issued by the Women's Printing Society, Brick Street, Piccadilly.

AN ARGUMENT FOR THE PRINCIPLES OF THE BUDGET

See THE INDUSTRIAL SYSTEM: An Enquiry into Earned and Unearned Income.

By J. A. HOBSON. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net (inland postage, 5d.)

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.

Six Scholarships (£60 and under) will be offered on June 16th. Examination at Giggleswick, in London, or at Preparatory Schools. Particulars from Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle Yorkshire.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

MALVERN COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATIONS, JUNE 1st 2nd, and 3rd, one of £37, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Boys) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in Examination. Council Nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well but fail to obtain a Scholarship.—For particulars apply to the Head Master or Secretary

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines Thorough Education with individual care and character training Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

MILL HILL SCHOOL, LONDON, N.W.

The NEXT EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS will be held on JULY 8th, and the two following days. Applications should be made at once to the Bursar.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Moulton and other Scholarships in July.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

Modern Methods, e.g., Languages taught conversationally, practical Science and Mathematics.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.
Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13, Waltershauser, Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Principal: MISS AMY KEMP.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills. & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£18 18s. NORWEGIAN and NORTH CAPE CRUISE.
£11 11s. NORWEGIAN FJORDS CRUISES.
Sailings:—June 26, July 17, July 31.
£18 18s. ST PETERSBURG for MOSCOW, STOCKHOLM, COPENHAGEN, CHRISTIANIA, etc., August 14.

Full particulars from the Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor s). Scotland s leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners. Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

Buy The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because
it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London. E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

VOLUME 2. No. 2. MONTHLY, 2s. 6d.

ENGLISH REVIEW

For MAY

CONTAINS AN IMPORTANT ARTICLE BY

PRESIDENT TAFT,

ENTITLED

"An Answer to the Panama Canal Critics."

Further Contents of the May Number:—

Modern Poetry—
"ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE"
T. STURGE MOORE
DOLLIE RADFORD OSMAN EDWARDS

NORMAN DOUGLAS - The Sirens
FYODOR DOSTOÉVSKY An Honest Thief
JOSEPH CONRAD - Some Reminiscences (part ii—vi)
W. H. HUDSON - - Goldfinches at Ryme Intrinsica
P. WYNDHAM LEWIS The "Pole"
PERCEVAL GIBBON - Afrikander Memories
BARON IGNATZ VON ASCHENDROF - The Nature of a Crime (ii)
GERTRUDE BONE - An Experience
STEPHEN REYNOLDS The Holy Mountain (ii)

THE MONTH.
LITTLE STATES AND GREAT NATIONS.
THE DRAMA OF THE MONTH.
TURKEY. By H. N. Brailsford.
THE RISE OF THE PAN-POLISH PARTY. By G. W.
GREECE. By J. G. B. Lynch.

Contributors to the preceding numbers have included Messrs. Thomas Hardy, Henry James, Joseph Conrad, Geo. Meredith, T. Watts-Dunton, John Galsworthy, Violet Hunt, Count Tolstoi, Anatole France, Emile Verhaeren, D. G. Rossetti, Gerhart Hauptmann, W. B. Yeats, Granville Barker, H. G. Wells; and among the contributors to the early numbers of Vol. II. will be found M. Camille Pelletan and the President of the United States.

Copies of the MAY ENGLISH REVIEW and Back Numbers may be obtained through all newsagents or of the Publishers,

DUCKWORTH & CO., HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 8.] SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Diary of the Week | 261 |
| Politics and Affairs:— | |
| Meredith and English Life | 264 |
| Is the Budget a Blow to Industry? | 265 |
| The Break-up of the Poor Law | 266 |
| The Wail of Wealth | 267 |
| A Russian Dreyfus Case | 269 |
| The Question of Crete | 270 |
| Life and Letters:— | |
| Meredith and Adventure | 271 |
| On the Decay of England | 272 |
| The Soul of Brittany | 273 |
| To Vindicate Leigh Hunt | 274 |
| Present-Day Problems:— | |
| An Academic View of Lord Curzon's Manifesto.—II. By Dr. Hastings Rashdall | 276 |
| The Drama:— | |
| Repertory Theatres and the National Theatre. By William Archer | 277 |
| Communications:— | |
| The Death of George Meredith. By Richard H. P. Curle | 279 |
| Letters to the Editor:— | |
| "The Object of the German Navy." By B. | 279 |
| The Anglican Church and Nonconformists. By J. R. Chitty, A. Neave Brayshaw, and Charles J. Magrath | 280 |
| A Suggestion for the L.C.C. By John Lewis | 281 |
| The Salvation Army's Social Work. By Ronald H. Kidd and Social Reformer | 281 |
| Is Golf a Game? By Arnold F. Jones | 282 |
| Thomas Paine. By W. Wyse | 282 |
| "Glimpses of the Twenties." By William Toynbee | 283 |
| The Snowdrop and the Bee. By N. W. Hill | 283 |
| The Defects of Liberal Propaganda. By Frederick Tombs | 284 |
| The Budget. By J. Houston Fulwood | 284 |
| Poetry:— | |
| Clouds. By William H. Davies | 284 |
| The World of Books | 285 |
| Books to be read | 285 |
| Reviews:— | |
| German Literature | 286 |
| Paris | 286 |
| The Paper-marks of Provence | 287 |
| Three Novels | 288 |
| Books in Brief:— | |
| The Life of Sir John Ardagh | 290 |
| A Dickens Dictionary | 290 |
| Servia and the Servians | 290 |
| Notes on the Companies Act | 292 |
| The Week in the City. By Lucellum | 292 |

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

George Meredith died at his modest home in the Surrey hills early on Tuesday morning, after a very short illness, at the age of eighty-two. His body is to be cremated, and there is to be a Memorial Service to-day in Westminster Abbey. Owing, apparently, to an unexplained decision by the Dean and Chapter, a very general desire that the Abbey should be his place of burial will not be fulfilled. This resolve, abruptly announced to the press, has caused both pain and anger, for it is thought, we hope wrongly, to cover the Dean's decision that Stanley's broad view of the uses of our Valhalla is to be abandoned. Meredith's many-sided and most fascinating genius, full of life and humanity, has been amply celebrated. It is enough to speak here of his high, generous, and manly spirit; of his warm affectionateness, especially for the young; and of the dignity and independence of his personal life. In this journal we may be pardoned for speaking of him also as one of the greatest of Liberals, as a steadfast Nationalist, and as the poet and eulogist of the national spirit. Meredith was a glorious physical image of the poet he was, and his radiant love of the natural world and of the dumb things in it was reflected no less in his daily habit than in his works. His closing years were attended by physical weakness, and also by the strength and sunshine of mind which inform and illumine his books. He was a most noble Englishman in speech, in thought, and in life.

* * *

On Wednesday Mr. Churchill took advantage of a motion on unemployment to expound at length both his measure for establishing Labor Exchanges and the first form of the Government's related scheme for setting up a system of industrial insurance. The plan of Exchanges is voluntary, that of insurance for unemployment compulsory. The Exchanges are to be national, not, as in Germany, municipal, and they will be organised as a system of clearing-houses, one at headquarters in London, ten in divisions of the country, and a series of dependent Exchanges for greater and smaller industrial places. Capital and Labor together will man the Advisory Committees which will meet in the principal centres. Mr. Churchill hoped that the Exchange would become the industrial market of each town, the meeting place for Trade Boards and Trade Unions, as well as a well-equipped resort for unemployed workers, both men and women.

* * *

Still bolder and more brilliant is the policy of Unemployment Insurance which Mr. Churchill foreshadowed for next year. It is not, of course, to begin as a universal plan. The Government have rejected the scheme which places the responsibility for organisation on the Trade Unions, and propose a method involving all the workers in the selected trades, unionists and non-unionists, skilled and unskilled. These trades are house-building, engineering in all its groups, and shipbuilding. They include 2½ million adult males and cover a third of the industrial population and nearly one half of the whole field of unemployment. The benefit funds are to be made up of contributions from three sources—the workers, the employers, and the State, and must amount to about sixpence per man per week. The German system of working by stamps and insurance cards is to be followed. The finding of employment and the payment of benefits will be conducted through the Labor Exchange. There are to be conferences next autumn of all the parties to these great schemes, and a rearrangement of the Labor Department of the Board of Trade to suit the new organisation of State intelligence and effort. This adumbration of a most beneficent plan of social reform was well received in the House, the Labor members accepting it warmly, and a Conservative member, Mr. F. E. Smith, bespeaking a non-partisan welcome for it. On Thursday Mr. Churchill formally introduced his Labor Exchanges Bill.

* * *

The chief feature of the national and Parliamentary debate on the Budget, which we analyse elsewhere, has been the letter to the Prime Minister of a number of London bankers, merchants, and business men in the City. The memorial bears some well-known names, but all of them seem to us to belong to Conservatives or Unionists. The memorial declines to discuss taxes, such as those on land, beer, spirits, and tobacco, which do not specially affect capital, but it objects to the diversion of the old Sinking Fund from the reduction of debt to internal development, and while stating vaguely that "we are prepared to bear our full share of necessary new taxes," objects to the increase and graduation of the death duties and to the raising of the income tax, coupled with a surtax. "These imposts," says the memorial, will prove "seriously injurious" to commerce and industry, and may mean that the supply of industrial capital will be reduced so much as to discourage enterprise and thrift, and so depress wages and produce unemployment. We deal with these statements, which we believe to be unfounded, elsewhere.

* * *

On Monday, Mr. Asquith, nominally answering Sir Frederick Banbury, subjected them to a suggestive analysis. Taking as a test an income of £4,000 a year, the Prime Minister showed that in France, under the new Income Tax Bill, proposed by M. Caillaux, it would pay a tax of 1s. 5d. in the £, against our 1s. 2d., while an income of £20,000 a year would pay in France 1s. 7d., an equivalent of our own charge. In Prussia an income of £5,000 would be taxed on the average to the extent of about 2s. in the £. Moreover, in England the average rate under the new scheme would only be 10¾d. in the £, or, including the super-tax, 11½d. in the £. Was such taxation going to drive capital away from the City? No plan could be more equitable and less injurious to trade and commerce.

* * *

On Thursday the Chancellor was able to secure all his Budget resolutions, a triumph of good management and good temper. He concluded the debate on the new scale of death duties with a pointed reply to Mr. Balfour, showing that the whole armory of "scare" figures and ideas which has been furbished up against his plan was originally forged against Sir William Harcourt's. On the question of the actual burden he imposes he made an interesting calculation:—

> "An hon. member speaking with knowledge of the subject said that since Sir William Harcourt's Budget £250,000,000 of capital had been squandered or wiped out. But since then, on the authority of Sir Robert Giffen, we had been adding 250 millions annually to our capital, and not extinguishing it. Since that date we had added £3,500,000,000; and taking Sir Robert Giffen's estimate of 250 millions added year by year to the capital of the country, what was his poor increase of the death duties? It meant an increase of sixpence in the pound taken out of the annual increase of 250 millions. He proposed to take £6,000,000 of the sum which swelled the amount of capital every year. To speak of that as the wasting away of capital laid by was absurd. What was the capital of this country? It was £15,000,000,000; and the £6,000,000 which he proposed to put on represented one-third of a farthing in the pound on the capital. At that rate it would take 3,000 years to expend it, even assuming that we were not adding to it."

* * *

On Friday week the House of Commons passed by 133 votes to 123 the second reading of a Bill, proposed by Mr. William Redmond, for removing the chief remaining civil disabilities of Roman Catholics in this country, and for amending the Accession Declaration. Mr. Asquith put the point as to the Declaration admirably when he said that when the King ascended the throne he was obliged by law to wound the feelings and insult the faith of about twelve millions of perfectly loyal subjects. The Prime Minister said boldly that the time had now come to put an end to the Royal Declaration on the Mass, which has, of course, only an obsolete dynastic purpose. On the other hand, if the nation wished to retain it in any form, a special Committee, drawn from all sides, might be appointed to revise, if not to delete, the offending formula. The two other main objects of the Bill are to throw open the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland and the Lord Chancellorship to Catholics, and to remove the exclusion of religious orders from this country, and the restrictions on their action. All three disabilities belong to past passages in British history, the Protestant succession and supremacy being amply guaranteed. But a Nonconformist whip was issued against the Bill, and a Nonconformist so representative and so cultured as Mr. Massie opposed it on the familiar ground that Roman Catholicism, while asking liberty for itself, denied it to other faiths. The Low Churchmen in the House joined in this protest.

* * *

Our Paris correspondent writes:—"The trade union leaders have committed almost every conceivable blunder in their struggle with the Government. Had not a postal strike been declared on the 11th, the Government might have been defeated on the 13th; but the Chamber, as I anticipated, refused, in the circumstances, to dismiss the Cabinet. The precipitation of a strike, when the matter was actually being discussed by the Chamber, had all the appearance of a threat and a defiance to Parliament. The strike, though it dislocated the postal service to a limited extent for a few days, was a failure from the first. The Socialist deputies further strengthened the position of the Government by their childish performance in the Chamber, which M. Jaurès viewed from the tribune with scarcely concealed disapproval. The Confédération Générale du Travail, not to be outdone, has decreed a general strike, which shows little sign of beginning, in support of the postal employees, who have all gone back to work except those who have been dismissed."

* * *

"The net result of all this folly is a sharp setback to revolutionary trade unionism, which will further discredit those who are exploiting the trade union movement in the interest of anarchism. Even Socialism has temporarily suffered. The capture by the Radicals of a former Socialist seat at Montpellier on Sunday was probably connected with recent events, and it seems quite likely that the Radicals will also win the seat in the twelfth arrondissement of Paris next Sunday. The motion in favor of a general strike was carried on Tuesday by 86 votes against 11, and five abstentions, but the three delegates of the miners, the textile workers, and the railway-men, who voted in the minority, alone represent one-third of the whole forces of organised labor. Meanwhile the Cabinet is hurrying on the preparation of the Statut des Fonctionnaires, which will very shortly be brought before the Chamber. There will be a severe struggle over some of its provisions, such as that which prohibits unions of Government employees from affiliating themselves with other trade unions, and it is probable that the measure will be amended in a progressive direction."

* * *

The news that Austria intended to build four "Dreadnoughts" immediately provoked very serious comment in Italy. The step was taken as a threat to Italy's naval position in the Mediterranean, and the Italian papers and the Italian Naval Minister declared that Italy must retaliate. Italy is losing no time in replying. The Italian Navy Estimates for 1909-10 provide for an expenditure of £13,000,000. Four "Dreadnoughts" of the largest size are to be laid down, and though at present it is not designed to complete the whole of the programme before 1915, the estimates for 1909-10 are generally understood to be only a prelude to more vigorous action. The spectacle of intense naval rivalry between two allied Powers is very curious, but once Austria had begun it was inevitable. Any movement by Austria in the direction of disturbing the balance of naval Power in the Mediterranean must be resented by Italy, and it may well prove that the new Austrian programme struck pretty hard at the fabric of the Triple Alliance, which the Kaiser's interviews with the Emperor Francis Joseph and the King of Italy are thought to have strengthened. From the English point of view, of course, the Italian and Austrian programmes must be treated, not as cumulative, but as cancelling one another.

* * *

It would be interesting to know precisely what is happening in Somaliland. On Monday the "Standard's" Aden correspondent telegraphed that "organised action by the British forces against the Mullah will commence next month. The operations will take the form of flying columns composed of mounted infantry and irregulars, which will endeavor to round up the elusive enemy. Practically everything is now ready; ample native troops are on the spot, and are being supplied with white officers." This was explicit enough, but on Monday an equally explicit official denial was issued that any expedition against the Mullah was contemplated. The next day, however, Reuter's correspondent telegraphed that "a British force has attacked the Mullah, recovering 600 camels. Six British Somalis were killed." Is there or is there not an expedition? On March 16 Colonel Seely told the House of Commons that the Government's policy in Somaliland was to remain on the defensive; but he admitted that the garrison had been heavily reinforced, and that thousands of rifles had been distributed among the "friendlies," doubtless the "natives" of the "Standard" telegram who are being given white officers.

* * *

The crisis in Portugal continues. Senhor Lima, it is true, has managed to form a Cabinet, but it is a Cabinet which has no party following, and every member except the Premier is a stranger to office. The Telles Ministry which has been displaced held office only three weeks, and the Henriques Ministry, which preceded it, just four months. The duration of Ministries has become ridiculously short, because they represent no principle, and the whole of Parliamentary politics in Portugal is a mere struggle for the loaves and fishes. Before the dictatorship of Senhor Franco and the murder of King Carlos, the system in vogue was "Rotativism"; each of the two great parties, Conservatives and Liberals, succeeded one another in power in regular rotation as the appetite of the one was sated and the appetite of the other became ravenous. After the murder of King Carlos, an attempt was made with the Amaral Cabinet to unite all parties in the indispensable work of reform.

* * *

It broke up in less than a year, having done practically nothing, because both the parties itched to return to "rotativism." The Henriques and Telles Cabinets were practically Conservative, so the Liberals, led by Senhor Vilhena, made life impossible for them by systematic obstruction. The new Lima Cabinet has been chosen outside parties, like the Amaral Cabinet, in the hope of existing by virtue of its very weakness. The Vilhena Liberals are likely to support it, and perhaps the other Liberal groups, but the Conservatives are openly at war with it because it does not satisfy their leader, Luciano de Castro, the arch-politician of Portugal. If the Lima Cabinet is destroyed, the probable alternative is a dissolution. Meanwhile, the disgust and discontent of the nation grow and the Portuguese papers are full of rumors of revolutionary plots.

* * *

Mr. Wells has much to answer for. He has produced a state of mind in rural England which, with the help of the sensational journals, sees airships, or, as they have been well christened, "scare ships," hurtling through the midnight air. This psychological effect has broken out in two places, first in Lowestoft, and then in the neighborhood of Cardiff. The half-expressed idea behind these phenomena is the arrival of the advance guard of the German invasion. The rest is probably made up of the imaginative spirit which "goes strong," as most of us know, at night. The discrepancies in the narrative dispose of the idea of any reality more serious than a possible passing balloon. Thus, we have two stories of the Lowestoft airship, one discoverer signalling it early on Sunday morning, another looking at it at Yarmouth, about ten miles distant, about the same hour on Saturday morning. In no case have regular night-watchers, like policemen or coastguardsmen, seen anything of it.

* * *

This last development of the morbid disease, anti-Germanism, has provoked Lord Northcliffe to appear as a rebuker of sin. "Dating" from Berlin, he issues a manifesto to the "Daily Mail" imploring the British Press and nation to be calm, lest Germany should have ground for her growing opinion that England is exclusively inhabited by a race of "mere nervous degenerates." As this idea might conceivably be fostered by a prolonged perusal of Lord Northcliffe's papers, their proprietor will have the power as well as the will to re-establish our lost reputation. Meanwhile, he quotes to advantage some very serious extracts from responsible German papers, showing that the malicious light-mindedness which he and others daily cultivate in our people is at length producing real alarm in the German nation.

* * *

The High Court, by a majority of two to one, has affirmed the decision of the Court of Arches, calling upon Canon Thompson, the rector of Eaton, not to refuse Communion to Mr. and Mrs. Bannister. The question now is how long will this cleric, backed by the Bishop of Norwich and financed by the English Church Union, be able to brand two of his parishioners as "open and notorious evil livers" on account of a lawful act, which he, the servant of a State Church, repudiates. He can, if he please, take them to the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords. The historical point as to the original prohibition of marriage with a deceased wife's sister in this country was well put by Mr. Justice Darling. The Act of Convocation of 1532 and the Act of Submission of 1534, the real authorities for the Rubric, are, as he said, "from a moral point of view," "suspect."

> "For in the days of the Tudors the moral attitude on this question fluctuated, and statutes touching this matter were by turns passed, repealed, and revived, just as it suited the Parliaments of King Henry, and of his Protestant or Catholic children, to approve as holy, or to denounce as incestuous, his marriage with his brother's widow, Katharine of Aragon. The result so far is that a marriage of a man with the sister of his deceased wife was bad since 32 Henry VIII., as being 'against the law of God.' Yet bad in law, not because it always was against the law of God, but merely because the statutes of the realm declared it to be unlawful; giving the King's, and his Parliament's, interested interpretation of the law of God for a reason."

Politics and Affairs.

MEREDITH AND ENGLISH LIFE.

Many men and women in the second generation of their lives will feel that, with the death of George Meredith, the intellectual scene has changed for them, and that they now look back on a great expanse of country through which they have travelled with much happiness, and which they will never see again. They know that they have set behind them the land of romance, and that they have moved, barely reckoning their progress, into a sterner, more barren, region. The distance between the two may be measured by comparing the work of Meredith and Hardy—the tragedy of Richard Feverel with the tragedy of Jude the Obscure. The two books were written by men who were poets as well as novelists, and who alike disowned kinship with mere photographic writers of the type of Zola. But how far apart is their outlook! How variously they measure the forces in English life, how differently, allowing for their contrasted temperaments, they paint its atmosphere! Both were reformers and revolters, anticlerical, inheriting in some degree the revolutionary strain in English letters which descended to them through Byron and Shelley. Yet we know that Meredith's criticism of life, expressed with a feeling of beauty to which Hardy had no claim, belongs to another order of ideas from that accepted by his friend and contemporary. Do we express the change too crudely when we claim Meredith as the last of the English Romanticists, and Hardy as the first of the latter-day English Realists? Meredith mixed his poetic and idealised vision of the world with a subtle and most eloquent intellectual comment upon it. But it was an ideal; and though it touched warm earth, its vivid and abundant coloring was taken, not from reality, but from romance.

Meredith, though one of the most fascinating members of his school, was hardly its greatest. He produced no book so broad and so tender in its humanity as "Les Misérables." Even his devoted and self-abandoning heroes of action and politics, his Alvans and Beauchamps and Carlo Ammianis, tend to lose their highest selves in a maze of half-serious entanglements. England, while he loved her, limited him. The comic spirit, waiting on his tragic muse, forbids us to remember Meredith as Hugo is remembered, by types and scenes terrible or deeply refreshing to the soul. Yet his comedy was not always world-comedy. His two most perfect works, "Evan Harrington" and the "Egoist," are satires of insular snobbishness, the entrancing "Shagpat," his most brilliant poetic phantasy, is akin to them, and his best short story, "The Case of General Ople and Lady Camper," is a treatise on that inexhaustible theme. He felt and chafed against his bonds; in England, he said, the rebel's blow fell not on rotten wood, but on a "cushion on springs." The mood to which his nature, his literary style, and his observation of English society most constantly led him as a writer of fiction and as a moralist, was irony; and of that great force he was a master. Comparatively ignorant of the workmen's lives, and divided between admiration of the aristocratic and conservative forces in the country and a sense of their intellectual barrenness, he drew most of his pictures from the aristocracy or from the manufacturing classes that fifty or sixty years ago seemed to be joined in grim battle with them for the supremacy of our State. Artist as he was, the political Liberalism of that time might well have claimed him as a splendid ally, a great vindicator. The human side of the social struggle somewhat escaped him, as it did not escape the more democratic Dickens; its later developments he hardly foresaw. It was characteristic of him that in his noble sketch, "The Old Chartist," he sets forth not the sufferings of the silenced and banished agitator, but his reconciling passion for the home and soil of his birth. When he touched congenial foreign ground he expanded, not indeed as a poet, for his beloved Surrey woods and uplands had all his heart, but as a friend of national liberty fighting gloriously for its own. It was something more than an author's feeling for a favorite child of fancy that made him declare to the writer that the passage in his books which he liked best was the description in "Vittoria" of the duel between Angelo and Captain Weisspriess.

Romantic in his literary attachments, as well as in his method, Meredith shared the anti-supernaturalism of the school to which most of his greater friends belonged. He was no more of a materialist than Wordsworth. But his overflowing sense of Nature's desirableness, his man's and poet's delight in the wonder and beauty of the physical universe, made him impatient of man-made explanations of them. Nature spun no "runes" for man to unriddle in metaphysical formulae; she was a spirit, to be spiritually discerned, a truth which reappears in Nietzsche, with other of the robust conclusions of Meredith's creed. Of her ultimate beneficence he had no doubt, and he expressed this lifelong faith in the lines—some of the loveliest in the language—which revealed his noble cheerfulness about death:—

> "Death shall I shrink from, loving Thee?
> Into the breast that gives the rose
> Shall I with shuddering fall?"

But Meredith went no further than to read on the face of the visible world the smile which no poet ever denied her. This apparition of joy was enough; on it he built a gospel of fortitude, of resignation, of self-forgetfulness, and of spiritual delight.

It was this natural optimism which distinguished his work from the pessimistic religious poetry of his contemporaries, from Clough and Arnold, and from the reasoned and less pantheistic meliorism of Tennyson. No such note of spiritual Nature-worship had been struck in English verse since "Queen Mab." Meredith's passion for natural life linked itself with a special love of English scenery and its characteristics, and here, as in the immortal love-story which made him famous, he touched Shakespeare. His lineage might have been more widely and more easily traced had his wonderful powers of expression stopped short at something like the same measure of luxuriance. But he had a zest for refinement and explanation, and he would furnish his main themes with a half-poetic, half-critical embroidery, like the harmonised and re-harmonised "motives," proceeding from the great organ-note of Earth, in Wagner's "Ring" music. Here Meredith made his wilful departure from the line, from the centre. No language, even the wildly tangled beauties of our tongue, rich as those of a country lane in midsummer, could quite accomplish what he asked of English speech. His medium mastered him; he became almost a wild, as he had been a glorious, colorist and rhetorician; and his ideas about human society not being always the greatest and most general ideas, he was led out of the way where Tolstoy walks, in old age, as firmly as ever. His men and women, always a little puppet-like, began to talk strangely in the later books. But grace never left them; their creator could not help dispensing them, from the abundant richness of his nature, something of the great gift that kept him a poet even when he most obscured its expression. Meredith was "full of the joy of living." Mawkishness, unmanliness touched him no more than the sadness, the want of good spirits, of our later time, and of much Victorian poetry. In this respect he was a renewing force, fresh from the all-sustaining bosom that he loved, and belonging to no special time in our story, but only to the undying glories of the English land.

---

IS THE BUDGET A BLOW TO INDUSTRY?

It is the chief merit of the Budget that it proposes to take the larger part of the increased revenue required for purposes of State from the incomes and property of those who have the most ability to pay. Of course, it is only natural that most of those called on to bear this increased taxation should object, and that they should represent their loss as a national calamity. In this spirit must be read the protest which a number of rich bankers have thought fit to address to the Government. The claim that their craft entitles them to proffer disinterested, authoritative advice upon national industry and finance is not likely to be seriously entertained by anyone acquainted with the sharp divergencies of opinion which divide them upon most fundamental issues relating to gold credit and currency which fall within their special province. They are entitled to respectful attention as successful money dealers in financial touch with many sorts of business. But they cannot seriously be regarded as authorities upon the incidence of taxation. However, since their protest puts succinctly what may be termed the general capitalist attack, it deserves examination. The gravamen of the charge is that an excessive burden is put upon the rich, which, by curtailing both their expenditure and their investment of capital, will "tend to discourage private enterprise and thrift, thus in the long run diminishing employment and reducing wages." A most deplorable result indeed, if it be true! But is it?

Let us probe the charge, converting the generality of its menace into particularity. Will actual capital shrink or take wings before the demand for a larger contribution from its more remunerative employments, and will land remove itself or sulk in idleness? No such thing. The land provisions of the Budget will bring more land, not less, into effective employment, and Mr. Asquith has disposed of the foolish suggestion that such capital as is moveable will gain increased immunity from taxation by betaking itself to France or Germany or any other modern industrial country. Everywhere the growing needs and functions of the State involve large increases of public revenue, and everywhere the same forces are urging that the lion's share shall be borne by those who have the power to pay. We readily admit that there are limits to the economic efficacy of this policy. Any encroachment upon such remuneration of capital or ability as is necessary to evoke an adequate output of these productive forces would entail those evil consequences which the bankers threaten. But the Budget policy does not approach these limits, nor are its taxes applied in any such indiscriminate manner. And the rising taxation of the last decade, the income of the well-to-do classes, has been rising at a faster rate. The great spread of luxurious expenditure indicates the positive and rapid growth of large quantities of unearned or surplus income, capable of contributing to the needs of the public purse without injury to those who spend it.

But turning more closely to the question, "How will the Budget affect the available supply of capital, the demand for labor and employment?" we cannot see by what process of argument the bankers can sustain their allegation. Either the money taken in fresh taxation from "a numerically small class of the community" would have been spent, or it would have been saved for investment. When it is taken by the State and spent or invested for the public good, will it be less productive or afford less employment and remuneration to labor? The issue here is not that of a general comparison between the efficiency of private and public enterprise. It is whether the transfer of the topmost layer of the incomes and property of the rich to the uses of the State will or will not be a more socially profitable application. Assuming that the effect of this increased taxation were to reduce the present expenditure of the rich in luxuries, the trades engaged in producing these luxuries, goods, and services would suffer, and some unemployment would be caused. But the expenditure of this same money by the State, not in luxuries but upon sound public services, would be a substitution of productive for unproductive expenditure, and would entail no reduction in the aggregate employment of labor. Taking what is, in our judgment, the weakest case for the Exchequer, we ask the patriotic bankers why they should assume that to take five millions from wealthy citizens which would have been spent on motor cars, and to apply the same to building "Dreadnoughts," which in their hypothesis help to maintain national security and credit, causes any diminution to the employment of capital and labor, or any reduction in national efficiency?

Or take, again, the increased taxation upon liquor and tobacco, transmitted by this same fiscal process into old age pensions. Either the brewers and the tobacco firms or the consumers are going to bear these taxes.

Suppose the former, failing in the long run to recoup themselves by higher prices, are obliged to pay in a reduction of their net incomes. Will the pensioners whose needs they unwillingly supply exert by their expenditure a smaller or a less desirable demand for the employment of capital and labor than would have proceeded from the shareholders in breweries or tobacco firms? Or, supposing that the bulk of these taxes are borne by the workers, is any waste involved in thus converting some expenditure on working-class luxury into the pensioners' expenditure on the prime necessaries and comforts of old age?

If, on the other hand, it be alleged that the increased taxation will not come out of the expenditure, but out of the savings of the rich, thus starving the supply of capital and diminishing demand for labor, we reply that two false assumptions underlie this allegation. In the first place, it is probable that as large a proportion of the money will be applied by the State to what should properly be regarded as capital expenditure, if the great policy of National Development and Social Reform, to which these financial proposals are indissolubly wedded, is fearlessly and fully carried out. Not to dwell upon the directly material improvements in land, means of transport, afforestation, and other capital expenditure upon our economic fabric, expenditure in the shape of insurance against invalidity and unemployment, together with those related reforms of our poor and our education policy which make for the permanent improvement of the condition of the people, must be regarded as capital expenditure, invested in improved national power which will produce a rich return even in terms of industrial productivity. There will be no real reduction of capital expenditure or of true national thrift. The other false assumption consists in an ignorant resurrection of the exploded economic doctrine that the volume of employment and wages is directly dependent upon capital. Wages are not advanced out of capital. The recent condition of a money market congested with capital while every trade is thronged with unemployed workers, is a sufficient practical refutation of the notion that any interference with the growth of capital must correspondingly impair employment. We may, indeed, admit that the proposals by which the Government will raise the required increase of revenue must involve some injury to certain trades, either by a direct repression of their rate of growth, as in the motor trade, or indirectly through a reduced consumption of their goods. But this is an injury incident to any change or increase of taxation. It is far less serious in the case of taxes mainly imposed upon rents, monopoly profits, and unearned incomes, than in any other alternative taxation, and infinitely less than would ensue upon an attempt to raise, by protective duties, a corresponding quantity of income.

Apart from this unavoidable dislocation, we repudiate the attack of the protesting bankers as destitute of economic force. The effect of the Budget will not be to reduce the effective capital, employment, or wages, of the nation. On the contrary, if the constructive social policy of the Government, for which this money is required, is faithfully pursued, the net effect will be to take certain elements of surplus wealth, representing unearned or excessive income, which would have been put to unproductive expenditure on luxury or to wastefully speculative investments, and to apply them to improve the condition of labor and the land, the true parents of national wealth.

---

THE BREAK-UP OF THE POOR LAW.

The two Reports of the Poor Law Commission have now been before the public for three months. If they have not as yet set going any clear and unmistakable movement of opinion it is partly owing to the deep fissure of principles between them, and partly to the preoccupation of the public with more exciting matters—the close of the football and beginning of the cricket season, the bye-elections, and the "Dreadnought" scare. Under an enlightened democracy, instructed by a centralised Press, the mere happiness of millions and the general health of the social organism must be postponed for topics such as these. Nevertheless, certain matters in which the two Reports are agreed have already found their way into the Ministerial programme. The important statement by Mr. Winston Churchill on Wednesday outlined the policy of the Government with respect to two important items. A national system of Labor Exchanges is to be set up, on a scale and with accessories designed, we think wisely, to attract the trade unions and the efficient workman generally. Success in this point is, of course, vital to the whole scheme. Further, there is next year to be a scheme of insurance, limited to those trades which together contribute one-half of the volume of unemployment, but within those trades compulsory, and resting on contributions from employers, employed, and the State. The acceptance of the principle of insurance marks a great step in advance, but the details of Mr. Churchill's scheme will be awaited with keen interest. The Minority Report preferred the Ghent system, and it is well that from the first, the public, and especially the Labor world, should recognise clearly what is involved in either proposal. We shall deal with the subject more fully next week. Meanwhile it is also clear that, in spite of the quaint and characteristic speech of Mr. Burns on Saturday, the whole question of Poor Law Reform must be taken in hand by Parliament next year. It is therefore time for the public to understand and choose between the principles underlying the two Reports. Mrs. Webb, who is largely responsible for the Minority Report, has accordingly issued an appeal for the co-operation of all those who wish to see the proposals which she and her colleagues have set forth made the basis of practical reform.

There is, of course, a considerable measure of agreement between the two Reports. That of the Majority was, considering its composition, surprisingly liberal. Both reports are agreed in recommending a fundamental change in existing Poor Law administration by the abolition of Boards of Guardians and of the general workhouse. Nevertheless there is a clear and significant divergence of principle, to grasp which is essential to the understanding of every practical proposal of reform. The principle of the Majority has been best and most succinctly stated by Prof. Bosanquet in the current number of the "Sociological Review." The proposals of the Majority, he writes, "are founded on the conviction that there is a problem common and peculiar to the entire range of destitution and necessitousness, demanding a common and peculiar method of dealing with it." According to them, that is to say, there is a fundamental unity in the needs of a school-child who is discovered to have ringworm, a deserted wife with half a dozen children, a congenitally blind man who has not been taught a trade by which he can maintain himself, a feeble-minded girl who is above the level of idiocy, and a displaced cabman who is too old to turn chauffeur. In all such cases public assistance is to be invoked when and only when, because and only because, there is destitution. It is to be invoked not merely because there is suffering or degradation to be averted, but because there is destitution, and not until there is destitution. The prime object must be to restrict the area of help as far as possible, by keeping people from becoming necessitous, and when help is given, since it is one and the same character of necessitousness which is at the root of the trouble, it must be one and the same authority that administers the assistance. Thus in the case of ringworm it will not do for the school authorities to deal with the children, though they may be able to organise collective inspection and treatment efficiently, swiftly, and directly. If the child is to be cured by a public authority it must only be because it is necessitous, and it must go through the mill for treating the necessitous. It must go to the Charitable Aid Committee or the Public Assistance Authority.

The principle of the Minority is quite fairly described by Professor Bosanquet as consisting essentially in the rejection of this supposed unifying principle of destitution. For a positive summary of it we may turn to Mr. Sidney Webb's brilliant statement of the Minority case in the article which forms a pendant to Professor Bosanquet's in the same number of the "Sociological Review":—

> "We have come to believe that the universal maintenance of any standard of civilised life cannot safely be left to individual self-interest. The universal maintenance of a definite minimum standard of civilisation, and the progressive elevation of that minimum is regarded as the joint responsibility of an indissoluble partnership. The community, far from washing its hands of the individual, finds itself forced, in the interests of the community as a whole, to assume definite duties with regard to him."

These duties are not defined or limited by his destitution. They are at bottom a part of the mutual aid which is a necessary and a growing factor in the civilised life of the State. The nature of this aid and the means of giving it have certainly to be determined by the whole character and circumstances of the individual. But destitution is not the one essential fact among these circumstances which is to govern all the rest. On the contrary, it is far better that aid should be given before the stage of destitution is reached. Nor is there one generic type of character that becomes "necessitous." On the contrary, there are many and most various circumstances which render it desirable that men and women should be able to rely on certain forms of public assistance without any impairment of moral self-respect or legal independence. What is to be required of the individual is not that painful though heroic rejection of all assistance which the present system has induced among the best of the poor, but an adequate response to aid that is freely given. The conditions must be such that the individual does his part in return for anything that is done for him, not that he deems it his part to keep away till the last possible moment from all public aid, and then to collapse into a pauper. The Minority would, in fact, generalise the principle adopted now by the nation in regard to the aged. The destitute poor have been kept from starving since the 43rd of Elizabeth. But destitution remained the condition of relief, and those who were just not destitute fared so little better than the pauper that they had but a very small motive to maintain the struggle. The pension system frankly throws over the destitution test, and makes it the business of the community not merely to shield the absolute pauper from starvation, but rather to combat poverty by securing to all men and women of good moral and industrial record a minimum independence in old age. The Minority Report would do the same for the child, the sick, the widow, the feeble-minded, the deserted wife, and the legion of the unemployed. It recognises that the needs of all these classes are not one but many, and that the treatment required is not general but specific. All these causes at present help to swell the one class of paupers. So far the effect is the same. But, though the effect is one, the cause is not one. The pauper by nature is a person of shiftless character, who needs discipline, and for whom the Minority provide the appropriate institutions. But the destitute person may also be a sufferer from various external causes with which his own character has little to do. He needs very different treatment, and he needs it before the destitution point is reached.

---

THE WAIL OF WEALTH.

Since the introduction of the Budget the correspondence columns of the "Times" have afforded remarkably good reading. Eloquence, invective, sarcasm, pathos, every versatile faculty of the pen is there deployed before the reader, and the workings of what we may call the Mind of Property are exposed to the day. There is the stern denunciation of the Anti-Socialist Union, liberally besprinkled with highly seasoned epithets, wherein the State, embodied in Mr. Lloyd George, figures as a "common highwayman," waiting on the investor in land to "plunder him," where the Government "fleeces" the liquor trade, "robs" recipients, and "loots" dead men's possessions. These are pretty lively doings for a Budget which Lord Dunraven describes as "the dying throes of a moribund superstition." There is Lord Redesdale, who knows of a builder who has lost contracts for the erection of three country mansions since the Budget was brought in. There is "the owner of a similar estate" who "can endorse all Mr. Pretyman says" about estates with a rental of £4,000 producing less than £1,000. This gentleman's case is arithmetically peculiar, for it appears (a) that the balance of his income from land is devoured by his aunt and sisters, (b) that "like most landowners," he has been "living on capital" for the last thirty years, and that nevertheless (c) he has been "able to employ annually during the slack months of the year labor in planting, roadmaking, draining, fencing, &c.," all on land which apparently brought him no return. What a Monte Cristo it must have been at the outset!

On another flank there is Lord Russell, whose grievance is petrol, and whose controversial style, if not precisely a thing of beauty, is yet a joy for ever to his opponents. He wonders whether the "supposed justification of the new taxes" is anything better than "the dislike by the envious poor of the conveniences of the better off." When the poor cannot send their children to school in reasonable security, nor take a walk along a country road without being smothered in dust by "the conveniences of the better off," they may take some objection to those conveniences without being charged with the meanness of envy. To be able to inflict the same annoyance on other people is not precisely the compensation that they desire. Then, again, there is "A Victim," who wishes to know why Mr. Lloyd George does not offer compensation for the "unearned decrement," as though it were the business of Budgets to make good the losses of unfortunate speculators.

Then there is Lord Heneage who rather spoils the effect of the lamentations of property by urging that "the working-man will have to pay very considerably more," and calling upon him, and especially on his wife, to beware of Radical Socialist finance. Then, finally, come the gems of the collection. If you have tears, prepare to shed them over "Coram Latrone," and "A considerable Taxpayer, and the Father of a large family." "Coram Latrone" prefaces that he is in receipt of an income, derived from house property and other investments, of "well over £5,000 a year." This does not sound a pathetic opening, but wait. He has saved money every year for forty-five years past, and very justly thinks himself "entitled to benefit by the prudence and self-denial" whereby he joined thousand to thousand. This is, indeed, a form of self-denial which it is given to few of us to imitate. It may, therefore, justly be termed a rare virtue. But in all these years of penury and privation, it seems, he has allowed himself one luxury, the luxury of charity, of "helping poor, meritorious persons." He has "contributed liberally" —we have his own word for it—to hospitals and soup kitchens, and by expending £600 a year on agricultural improvements has given employment to hundreds of poor people. Now this "luxury" is "to be taken from" him and "conferred on a body of Government officials." His "agricultural improvements will come to an end." "I shall discontinue my subscriptions to all charities which were intended to benefit the very poor, and I shall confine my donations exclusively to a class which has not come within the purview of Mr. Lloyd George's humanitarian schemes, such as underpaid curates, distressed gentlefolk, and poor professional men." If the underpaid curates get no relief under the rebatement for children under sixteen, they are a much maligned class. But that is a side issue. "A considerable Taxpayer and the Father of a large Family," whose signature we give ourselves the indulgence of transcribing in full a second time, is more precise and arithmetical than "Coram Latrone." He spends seven per cent. of his income on charity, "a proportion which I deem sufficient." His method of dealing with Mr. Lloyd George is simplicity itself. He proposes simply "to debit my charity account" with the amount—threepence in the pound he calculates—of which Parliament divests him to pay for old age pensions. He is sure that he speaks for a large number. "I believe I know the charitable world," and "numbers" he is convinced will reduce their voluntary gifts "to the extent that the State renders their benevolence obligatory."

